The testimony in the case now here presents a state of facts quite unlike those in the case cited. The deed was not only not made "in the execution of a purpose long entertained" by plaintiff, but in direct opposition to his frequently expressed desire—expressed, indeed, at the very time defendants were suggesting that he convey the property to his daughter; nor was the deed made in appreciation of the daughter's "devotion and services," for no such consideration appears. And it may be doubted whether the deed was made "with full knowledge of all the facts and comprehension of the nature and effect of the transfer." There was testimony, accepted by the court as the findings show, from which it appeared that defendant Mrs. Wyatt conceived the plan of possessing herself of plaintiff's property before she urged him to take up his home with defendants. She said to Mrs. Charles Soule:

"They think they are going to get it all, but wait until I get him down there; if he lives a week you bet I'll get it."

To this same witness, speaking of how to manage plaintiff, she said:

"You can't ruffle his feathers; you have to smooth him down the right way and you can do anything with him. Q. Did the old gentleman in his talks with you ever make any statement before he went down there as to the way he wanted to leave his property? A. It seems like that was on his mind all the time; yes, he always wanted share and share alike. 'They are all my children.' Q. Did they write any letters to Washington asking him to come down there? A. Yes; she wrote about every day when he was so bad; begged him to come down."

It appeared that soon after plaintiff took up his residence with defendants the question of disposing of his property was brought up by his daughter, and it was she who proposed that it should be conveyed to her alone, but, as plaintiff testified, with the understanding that he retained the right to sell or dispose of it. She did not accomplish her purpose quite as soon as she said she would, but did so in about two or three weeks. The letter she wrote to her brother three days after the deed had been executed harks back to her original purpose and tends strongly to show her design in bringing her father under her own roof to live.

The complaint sets forth with much particularity the facts brought out by the evidence, and the averments were by the court found to be true. We think there was evidence sufficient to support the findings.

The judgment is affirmed.

MACGILLIVRAY v. OWEN. (Civ. 1656.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 15, 1916.)

JUDGMENT $\S$ 143(17)—DEFAULT JUDGMENT—SETTING ASIDE ORAL AGREEMENT WITH COUNSEL.

Setting aside a default judgment is within the court's discretion, where there was no direct denial of defendant's claim that he orally stipulated with an attorney for plaintiff, now deceased, that no judgment would be entered against him, and, in fact, none was entered for several years after such attorney's death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 290; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 143(17).]

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by W. H. MacGillivray against A. D. Owen. Order setting aside defendant's default and vacating a judgment entered upon such default, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Royle A. Carter and Thos. F. Lopez, both of Fresno, for appellant. M. B. Harris and E. M. Harris, both of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order setting aside the default of the defendant and vacating a judgment entered upon such default.

The grounds of the defendant's motion for such relief consisted of the showing made by him that in the month of March, 1908, shortly after the commencement of the action, an oral stipulation had been entered into between himself and Stanton L. Carter, Esq., one of the attorneys for the plaintiff in the action, to the effect that it would not be necessary for said defendant to appear in the action, and that no judgment would be taken against him, and upon the further showing that for a period of more than six years thereafter, during which the defendant had made no appearance, relying upon such stipulation, no default was entered and no judgment taken against him, but that in the month of September, 1914, the action was dismissed against the other defendants therein, and default and judgment entered against this defendant, which he made this motion to have set aside immediately after his discovery of the fact and within a few days after the entry of the judgment. Upon the hearing of the motion the affidavit of defendant with certain evidence was offered, strongly tending to prove the existence of such stipulation and of the defendant's reliance thereon. It further appeared that Stanton L. Carter, Esq., had died in the meantime, and hence no affidavit could be presented from him denying the existence of said stipulation. The plaintiff did, however, present some evidence—mostly hearsay—having some tendency toward proving that such an oral stipulation had not been made; but in so far as the defendant's affidavit positively asserted the existence of the stipulation, it was undenied, except upon information and belief. The trial court found that such stipulation existed, and thereupon set aside the default and judgment taken and entered in contravention thereof.

We find no error in such ruling. While it is true, as the appellant asserts, that the courts of this state have early and often applied the rule that verbal stipulations as to pleadings and evidence will not ordinarily be regarded and enforced in the courts, except when admitted by the parties against whom they are invoked, the courts have been indisposed to give this otherwise general rule application to default judgment (Johnson v. Sweeney, 95 Cal. 306, 30 Pac. 540); and in such cases have allowed to the trial courts a wide discretion in determining whether the defendant should not be relieved from such default and allowed to defend upon the merits. Craig v. San Bernardino Inv. Co., 101 Cal. 124, 35 Pac. 558; Reclamation Dist. v. Hamilton, 112 Cal. 610, 44 Pac. 1074; Durbrow v. Chesley, 24 Cal. App. 418, 141 Pac. 631; Jergins v. Schenck, 162 Cal. 747, 124 Pac. 426.

In the case at bar the direct proof of the defendant as to the existence of the oral stipulation is unmet by an equally direct denial of its existence for the reason, as the appellant contends, that Stanton L. Carter, Esq., with whom it is claimed by the defendant to have been made, is dead. But, on the other hand, it is shown by the record that Mr. Carter lived for several years after the time when the entry of the default might properly have been made and judgment taken against him if such stipulation to the contrary did not exist, and that during the lifetime of Mr. Carter no such steps were taken. Under these circumstances we are of the opinion that the court did not abuse its discretion in setting aside the default and judgment, and in permitting the respondent to defend this case upon the merits.

We see no force in the other points presented by the appellant.

Judgment affirmed.

Ex parte JUNE. (Cr. 359.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 15, 1916.)

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION $\S$ 153—ALLOWANCE OF DEMURRER—FURTHER PROCEEDINGS—STATUTE.

Where, on demurrer to the information, the court made an order that the demurrer was sustained, and directed that the district attorney file a new information on the proceedings had, or any other proceedings that he might elect, as prescribed by Pen. Code, § 1008, such order was sufficient to justify the district attorney's proceeding further in the matter by procuring an indictment by the grand jury; the only discretion given the district attorney by the order being the making of an election as to which of the courses pointed out by the Code he should take.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 500; Dec. Dig. ☞153.]

In the matter of the application of John June for writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and prisoner remanded to custody.

R. L. Thompson and Phil Ware, both of Santa Rosa, for petitioner. G. W. Hoyle, Asst. Dist. Atty., of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, C. J., and HART, J. Petitioner was informed against by the district attorney of Sonoma county for the crime of obtaining money under false pretenses. Upon demurrer to the information the court made the following order, January 10, 1916:

"This cause came on regularly for the defendant to plead. The district attorney and Phil Ware and R. L. Thompson, Esq., being present, it being agreed that defendant was present; whereupon it is ordered by the court that the demurrer filed herein be and the same is hereby sustained, and the court directs that the district attorney may file a new information on the proceedings heretofore had, or any other proceedings that the district attorney may elect, as prescribed by section 1008 of the Penal Code."

Pursuant to said order the district attorney procured the indictment of petitioner by the grand jury for the same offense as that charged in the information, and petitioner was thereupon arrested upon a bench warrant and taken into custody by the sheriff and is now held in imprisonment thereunder.

Petitioner seeks his discharge by writ of habeas corpus on the ground that said order was insufficient to justify the district attorney to proceed further in the action for the reason that said order left the matter wholly in his discretion, whereas section 1008 of the Penal Code requires, as has frequently been held by the Supreme Court and the district courts of appeal, that such order should be mandatory, leaving no discretion whatever with the district attorney.

We think the order in question, fairly construed, was sufficient authority to justify the further proceedings taken by the district attorney.

The court filed an opinion, on January 10, 1916, giving its reasons for sustaining the demurrer. The concluding paragraph reads:

"The court will sustain the demurrer to the information. I will make an order provided by section 1008 of the Penal Code. If the district attorney desires to amend it, he may, or take such other course as he may be advised. The court directs that a new information be filed in this case upon the examination already had, if the district attorney desires, or the defendant may be re-examined by a magistrate or the matter may be submitted to a grand jury, or such course as the district attorney may elect to take, as provided by section 1008 of the Penal Code of this state."

As we understand the record, the order entered was that first above quoted. But whether that be treated as the order in the case or the statement made in the opinion be the order, we still think that the district attorney was directed by the court to proceed further under section 1008 of the Penal Code, and the discretion given him, if any, was merely to make an election as to which one of the courses pointed out in the section he should take.

The writ is discharged, and the prisoner remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

Proceeding by Herman Albers against the Superior Court in and for Humboldt County, and others, for certiorari. Application denied.

Pierce H. Ryan, of Eureka, for petitioner.
J. Charles Jones, of Sacramento, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an original application for a writ of certiorari, and the question here is whether the petition herein states facts sufficient to warrant this court in making an order requiring the above-named respondents to certify to this court their respective records in the case of the People v. Albers (the petitioner), and thus show cause why the judgment of conviction of the petitioner of a misdemeanor rendered by the above-named justice's court and the judgment rendered by the above-named superior court on appeal in said cause, affirming the judgment of the said justice's court therein, should not be vacated, set aside, and annulled.

The petition shows that petitioner was, on October 21, 1915, charged in the justice's court of Union township, Humboldt county, with violating the state law making it a misdemeanor to drive an automobile over a highway in said county in excess of the speed prescribed by said law; that, on the 18th day of November, 1915, and after the defendant had entered a plea of not guilty to the charge, the district attorney moved to dismiss the action for the purpose of amending the complaint (Pen. Code, § 1387), and on the same day filed a new complaint, purporting to charge the same offense; that, on February 26, 1916, the petitioner was tried on the complaint as so amended before a jury, that the jury disagreed and were discharged without arriving at a verdict; that, on the 7th day of March, 1916, the action was again dismissed on the motion of the district attorney for the purpose of further amendment of the complaint and on the same day a new complaint was filed charging the petitioner with precisely the same offense as that charged in the two complaints previously filed and dismissed.

The complaint last filed and upon which the petitioner was tried, convicted, and sentenced, charged the offense in two separate counts, each being precisely in the same language, as follows:

"* * * That said Herman Albers, on the 21st day of October, 1915, at and in the said county of Humboldt, * * * did then and there willfully and unlawfully drive and operate a motor vehicle, to wit, an automobile, at a rate of speed in excess of thirty miles an hour upon a public highway in said county," etc.

The petitioner moved to strike out the second count, which was introduced into the complaint with the language:

"And for a further, separate, and second count, affiant alleges," etc.

The motion was denied and the petitioner then objected to the court proceeding with the trial of the case and moved to dismiss the same on the ground that the action had not been brought to trial within 60 days after the filing of the first complaint, nor within 60 days after the filing of the second or first amended complaint. The objection and the motion were overruled, and the petitioner thereupon entered a plea of not guilty, and also a plea of once in jeopardy. The jury found the petitioner guilty under the second count of the complaint, but made no finding upon the plea of jeopardy and none as to the first count.

The petitioner, after verdict, moved the justice's court for a new trial, the motion was denied, and judgment thereupon rendered that he pay a fine of $75, and that in default of the payment of said fine he be imprisoned in the county jail for one day for each dollar of so much of said fine as might remain unpaid, and that he be imprisoned in the county jail for the period of 25 days. The petitioner then appealed to the superior court from said judgment upon questions of law alone, and said court modified the same by striking therefrom so much thereof as would have required the petitioner to suffer imprisonment in default of the payment of the fine of $75, and, as so modified, the judgment was affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

The points made in support of the application for the writ are: (1) That the justice's court exceeded its jurisdiction in permitting the district attorney to add a second count to the complaint, and that, therefore, the conviction and the judgment "had and entered on such added count are clearly void"; (2) that, the petitioner having interposed a plea of "once in jeopardy," it was the duty of the jury to make a direct and specific finding on said plea, and their failure to do so rendered their verdict and the judgment thereupon entered absolutely void; (3) that the complaint last filed did not in fact or in law constitute an amendment, but amounted in both substance and form to an entirely new complaint. And it is further declared, though the point does not appear to be pressed, that the justice's court exceeded its jurisdiction in the imposition of a penalty in that when said court imposed a fine of $75 with the alternative of one day's imprisonment for each dollar of the fine, it exhausted its jurisdiction, and therefore had no jurisdiction to impose an additional punishment.

[1] It is first to be remarked that, since the whole "controversy here presented for review was presented to the superior court, and by the judgment of that court of general jurisdiction was determined adversely to the petitioner's contention," the judgment of the latter court operates as an estoppel and the matter so adjudicated becomes res adjudicata, "with all the binding force and effect by way of estoppel which attaches to every such judgment. * * * So long as the judgment of the superior court stands unassailed, that judgment formally decreeing the validity of the judgment of the justice's court cannot be ignored nor in another proceeding swept aside. The appeal from the judgment of the justice's court, heard and determined by the superior court, was in all respects the equivalent of a writ of error, and the application to this court for certiorari is but an attempt to obtain a second writ of error directed, not against the appellate judgment, but against the judgment of the justice's court upon matters adjudicated by a court of general jurisdiction under the first appeal or writ of error. It is well settled that this cannot be done." Olcese v. Justice's Court, 156 Cal. 82, 86, 103 Pac. 317. See, also, Hayes v. Collins, 114 Mass. 54; State v. Water Commissioners, 30 N. J. Law, 247; Illingworth v. Rich, 58 N. J. Law, 507, 34 Atl. 757. It follows that the writ here applied for cannot be granted for the purpose of reviewing the judgment of the justice's court.

The remaining question, then, is whether the respondent, superior court, was without jurisdiction to review and enter a judgment on appeal in this case.

[2] It is manifest that, since the law authorizes appeals to the superior courts in criminal cases of which the justices' and police courts are by law invested with jurisdiction (Pen. Code, § 1466), the only ground upon which the jurisdiction of the superior court may legally be impeached and denied in any such case is either that the case is one of which the justices' courts have no jurisdiction and in which, therefore, they have no power or authority to enter a valid or any judgment, or that the justice's court, while having jurisdiction of the offense, in some way acted beyond its jurisdiction in entering its judgment, or that the superior court had failed to acquire jurisdiction of the appeal because, in taking the appeal or attempting to do so, there had been a failure to observe some vital and necessary rule of practice or procedure in the matter of taking appeals to such courts. In this case there is no claim that jurisdiction was not acquired by reason of the omission to observe or follow in a material respect the procedure prescribed for taking appeals to the superior courts; but the whole theory is that in no event did or could the superior court have jurisdiction to hear and determine the appeal because the justice's court in the first instance was wholly without jurisdiction of the action for the reasons above stated, and was therefore without authority to render the judgment which was reviewed and affirmed by the superior court.

[3, 4] That the sole office of the writ applied for here is to test the question of jurisdiction is well understood. And the jurisdiction of the justice's court of the offense of which the petitioner was convicted will not and, indeed, cannot be questioned. Section 32, act regulating motor vehicles, St. 1915, p. 413. And it is equally clear that said court acquired jurisdiction of the action, even though the complaint might not be what it ought to be as a criminal pleading.

[5, 6] Conceding that the justice's court improperly allowed the motions of the district attorney to dismiss the first and second complaints filed for the purpose of amending the same and conceding that the last complaint filed and upon which the petitioner was tried, convicted, and sentenced was faulty because it stated the offense of which the petitioner was convicted in two separate and distinct counts, and that the court erred in not granting the petitioner's motion to strike out one of the counts, still none of these matters affected the question of jurisdiction or divested the justice's court of jurisdiction of the action. They involved or amounted to mere error, reviewable and correctible only by appeal. It cannot, of course, be doubted that, notwithstanding the alleged duplicity of the complaint, it nevertheless stated a public offense known to the law of this state; nor is there any possible logical ground for holding that, merely because a criminal pleading is amenable to the charge of duplicity, the jurisdiction of the court of the action is ousted. The law provides a remedy for the correction of the defects of a complaint or an information or an indictment, and where the court fails or refuses to heed the objections and so to correct the defects, the action of the court in that regard is error, correctible, as before stated, not through the instrumentality of a jurisdictional writ, but by review on appeal.

[7] What is thus said applies with equal force and pertinency to the point that the jury failed to find upon the special plea of "once in jeopardy" interposed by the petitioner.

[8] As to the point that the justice's court lost jurisdiction of the action because there was a failure to bring the case to trial within 60 days after the filing of the first or original complaint or after the filing of the purported first amended complaint, a reply thereto is that section 1382 of the Penal Code, upon the terms of which the petitioner bases his claim in that particular, is applicable alone to criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or information and has no reference to the trial of low-grade misdemeanor cases cognizable in justices and police courts.

It thus being shown that the justice's court had the authority to render judgment against the petitioner in the action before it, there is, obviously, no ground upon which it can be maintained that the respondent, superior court, was without jurisdiction to review said judgment on appeal.

The application for the alternative writ is accordingly denied.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT—171(4)—RATIFICATION—ACCEPTANCE OF BENEFITS—KNOWLEDGE OF FACTS.

Where C., in promoting, without any authority, an exchange of properties between plaintiffs and defendant, which they, when brought together, negotiated on terms fixed by themselves, made misrepresentations to defendant as to plaintiff's property, of which plaintiff never knew, plaintiff is not liable therefor on the theory of ratification; mere acceptance of the fruits of a transaction neither constituting, nor by itself being evidence of, ratification, but knowledge of the material facts of the transaction being necessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by Kate Huffman against Peter Knapp and another. From an adverse judgment and order, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Gallaher, Aten & Devaul, of Fresno, for appellants. Harris & Hayhurst, of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from an order denying the defendants a new trial and from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff in an action to foreclose a mortgage executed by the defendants in the usual and ordinary form to plaintiff's assignor, as security for the satisfaction of three promissory notes of the defendants aggregating the sum of $7,700.

The notes, contemporaneously with the mortgage, were executed by the defendants to plaintiff's assignor as payment for the difference due under the terms of an exchange agreement, wherein and whereby plaintiff's assignor transferred to the defendants some 40 acres of land situated near Clovis, Fresno county, in consideration of the notes and mortgage and the transfer by the defendants to plaintiff's assignor of a 5-acre orange grove subject to a $1,000 mortgage, situated near the town of Glendora, Cal. The defendants having defaulted in the payments due under the mortgage, plaintiff elected, as the mortgage permitted, to declare the whole debt due and payable, and accordingly instituted foreclosure proceedings. The defendants Knapp, answering and cross-complaining, admitted the making of the exchange agreement and the execution of the notes and mortgage as alleged in the complaint, but pleaded that they were induced to enter into and execute the same by false and fraudulent representations made to them by the agent of plaintiff's assignor concerning the character, quality, and value of the land covered by the mortgage, the age of the trees and vines growing thereon, and the annual income which the land had produced and would produce. Upon the trial of the case the evidence disclosed that the alleged false representations were made by one W. L. Chappel; and it was the contention of the defendants that he was the agent by direct authority of the plaintiff's assignor in the negotiations which culminated in the exchange of the properties, and that in any event the subsequent ratification of his conduct by plaintiff's assignor made the latter responsible to the defendants. The record discloses evidence sufficient to support the finding of the trial court that the relation of principal and agent did not exist prior to and at the time of the exchange between plaintiff's assignor and Chappel; indeed, it was in effect conceded by defendants' counsel during the progress of the trial that the agency, if any, relied upon to support the defense pleaded was not created by previous authorization, but if it existed at all, resulted from subsequent ratification. Upon the assumption that such ratification had been established the defendants endeavored to introduce evidence of the false representations alleged to have been made to them by Chappel. The trial court, however, upon the objection of the plaintiff, rejected such evidence upon the ground that no proper foundation therefor had been laid, in this, that it was not shown that the relation of principal and agent existed between plaintiff's assignor and Chappel, or that the former accepted the fruits of the exchange with knowledge of the fact that the alleged fraudulent representations were the inducing cause of the defendants entering into the exchange agreement and subsequently executing the notes and mortgage. Undoubtedly it was incumbent upon the defendants to establish the existence of the relation of principal and agent between plaintiff's assignor and Chappel before evidence as to what the latter had stated and done during the negotiations would be admissible for any purpose; and, failing in this, it was an essential prerequisite to the admissibility of the proof proffered in support of the theory of ratification to show that plaintiff's assignor accepted the fruits of the transaction with knowledge of its material facts. This is elementary; and the rule is thus because ratification necessarily presupposes a knowledge of the thing ratified. Manifestly the alleged fraudulent representations sought to be shown in evidence in the present case were, in so far as the defense pleaded was concerned, the material facts of the transaction. The mere acceptance of its fruits did not constitute ratification, nor was such acceptance, standing alone, any evidence of ratification. Upon this phase of the case the evidence at its best shows that Chappel was nothing more than a mere go-between for the defendants and plaintiff's assignor, who, when brought together, proceeded to make, and did make, their own bargain for the exchange of their respective properties; and it is not claimed, nor does the evidence show, that plaintiff's assignor had at any time prior or subsequent to the making of the exchange agreement any knowledge whatsoever of the character of the representations made by Chappel when promoting the exchange. This being so, the trial court rightly rejected the evidence referred to.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

Ralph Day was charged with a crime, and from the judgment rendered both he and the People appeal. Affirmed.

B. V. Sargent and John Rutledge, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. [1, 2] We find from a review of the record that the evidence in this case sufficiently supports the verdict; that even if the evidence warranted and would have supported a charge of burglary upon the theory that the defendant was an accessory thereto, nevertheless it also shows that the defendant subsequently received the fruits of the burglary from the actual perpetrator thereof knowing them to be stolen; that as a consequence he was guilty of receiving stolen goods; that therefore he cannot be heard to complain that the people elected to charge him with the latter offense rather than with the former. We further find that the testimony of the admitted accomplice of the defendant in the commission of the crime charged was amply corroborated by other and independent evidence, and that there was no error in the charge of the court or in its refusal to give certain instructions requested upon behalf of the defendant.

Upon these grounds the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

3. PLEADING — 248(4) — AMENDMENT — NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

Changing a complaint upon a note, by amendment, to one for goods sold and delivered, does not set up a different and new cause of action, where the note was given for the purchase price of the goods.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by Joel Roullard against Donly C. Gray. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Larkins & Bailey, of Visalia, for appellant. Kitt Gould, of Clovis, and C. K. Bonestell, of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to recover the balance due on account of the sale of an automobile alleged to have been made by the Roullard-Brown Auto Co., to the defendant, the account having been assigned to the plaintiff.

The transaction for the purchase of the automobile was conducted by Hazel I. Gray, the wife of the defendant, and as part of the purchase price the sellers took her promissory note for $440; the machine was delivered to her, and the balance due thereon, as evidenced by the note, was charged to her personally upon their books. Notwithstanding these facts the plaintiff seeks to hold the defendant upon the contract.

[1, 2] A husband or wife may enter into any engagement with the other or with any other person respecting property which either might if unmarried. Civ. Code, § 158. It would appear from what is above narrated that the transaction was one between defendant's wife and the vendors of the automobile for which she alone was responsible. The only evidence in the case tending to show that Mrs. Gray was acting on behalf of the defendant in the transaction consists of two inferences to be drawn, one from a letter written by him, and the other from an admission claimed to have been made by him to one of the plaintiff's assignors, and an offer on the part of the defendant to compromise the claim. Evidence of this offer went in without objection, and was made, according to a declaration imputed to the defendant, with a view to help reach a settlement of domestic troubles which he was having at the time with his wife. As to the inferences just referred to, they are as consistent with the claim that the automobile was the property of Mrs. Gray as with any other theory; but assuming that the court was warranted in construing the offer to compromise and claimed admissions against the defendant, still we think they amounted to no more than slight evidence insufficient to support the findings. Code Civ. Proc. § 1835. There was no evidence introduced at the trial that there was any delegation of authority from the defendant to his wife to represent him generally or in this particular transaction; and as, under the circumstances of this case, an automobile cannot be deemed one of those necessities that a wife is authorized to purchase upon her husband's responsibility, it follows that she had no implied authority to represent him; hence evidence of what she said when she purchased the machine was hearsay and inadmissible as against the defendant.

[3] With regard to the original complaint, considering it as being founded upon the promissory note alone, still it will not be held that plaintiff, in setting forth in the amended complaint an action for goods sold and delivered, has declared upon a different and new cause of action. A declaration counting on a specialty, as a note, may be substituted for one in the form of a common count; the cause of action being the same. Vaughn v. Rugg, 52 Vt. 235; Schieffelin v. Whipple, 10 Wis. 81; Nelson v. Webb, 54 Ala. 436; Gray v. Bass, 42 Ga. 271; Clarkson v. Morrison, Adm'r, 24 Mo. 134; Born v. Castle, 22 Cal. In a suit on a written contract for the construction of a building, the plaintiff may be allowed to amend at the trial by adding a quantum meruit count for labor and materials furnished. School Dist., etc., v. Boyer, 46 Kan. 54, 26 Pac. 484. In New York it has been held that in an action on a note an amendment of the complaint by inserting a count for goods sold and delivered, which formed the consideration of the note, may properly be allowed at the trial; it being in furtherance of justice and not changing substantially the plaintiff's claim. Vibbard v. Roderick, 51 Barb. (N. Y.) 616.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Mandamus proceedings by Clarence C. Burr against the Board of Supervisors of the City and County of San Francisco and others. From a judgment directing the issuance of a peremptory writ, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Percy V. Long, City Atty., and Harry G. McKannay, Asst. City Atty., both of San Francisco, for appellants. Drown, Leicester & Drown, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment directing the issuance of a peremptory writ of mandate, commanding the defendants, as members of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, to approve and allow the claim and demand filed with said board by the plaintiff, for the payment by said city and county of a judgment for the recovery from said corporation of certain taxes illegally collected by it.

[1] It is the contention of the appellants that its demurrer to the complaint upon the ground of uncertainty should have been sustained, said uncertainty consisting in the absence from said complaint, as appellants insist, of a statement of the nature of the claim and demand the detail of which was presented to the board of supervisors. An examination of the complaint, however, shows that the pleader set forth with great circumstantiality the history and nature of his claim, and after doing so averred that "he presented his claim and demand to said board." We think this statement sufficiently shows that it was the detailed claim and demand of the plaintiff which was before the board for its approval, and that the complaint was therefore sufficient as against either a general or special demurrer.

[2] We are of the opinion also that the claim and demand of the plaintiff was one which was not required to be payable out of the revenues of any particular year or fund, but was a claim that the board of supervisors was bound to audit and approve, and that the city was required to pay, irrespective of the provisions of the charter relative to the incurring of indebtedness or payment of claims in excess of the revenues of the city for any particular year.

[3] The final contention of the appellants is that this claim being of that nature, was not one which it was requisite should be presented to the board of supervisors at all, and hence that they were not called upon to act upon or approve it. It is conceded, however, that the usual procedure in said city with reference to the allowance and payment of claims is that they shall first be presented to the board of supervisors for its approval, and that the plaintiff herein was pursuing such procedure. This being so, he was entitled to have the writ issued requiring the board to follow the usual custom in respect to the approval and payment of claims against said city.

Judgment affirmed.

SCHNEIDER et al. v. MONCUR, Superior Court Judge. (Civ. 1537.)

1. JUDGMENT $\S$ 564(2) — CONCLUSIVENESS — FINALITY — INTERLOCUTORY DECREES — ACCOUNTING.

An interlocutory decree finding that plaintiff was not entitled to an accounting nor to have trustees removed, but that defendants held property as trustees for plaintiff, is not a final adjudication of the rights of the parties or conclusive against right to accounting two years later.

2. TRUSTS $\S$ 327—DUTY TO ACCOUNT—ACTIONS—DECREE.

Since from the very nature of a trust there is implied a duty to account, if the court intends to declare that there is no such duty the decree should specifically so find.

3. ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS $\S$ 364—DUTY TO ACCOUNT—PRESUMPTIONS.

It cannot be presumed that, in the absence of any provision for accounting in the instrument creating the trust for creditors, the trustee could hold and enjoy the use and incomes of trust property for an indefinite period and account to no one; it being his duty to account to the trustee as well as to the creditors whom he represents.

Prohibition by B. Schneider and another against the Superior Court of Plumas County and J. O. Moncur, Judge thereof. Writ denied.

H. B. Wolfe, of Quincy, for petitioner. L. N. Peter, of Quincy, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert T. McKisick, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiffs bring the action to prohibit defendant from "compelling defendants or either of them to render an account of receipts and disbursements of and pertaining to a saloon and hotel business carried on by defendants since the 14th day of February, 1910, in a certain action pending in the superior court of Plumas county and entitled 'Della R. Edwards, sometimes known as Della R. Harding, plaintiff, v. B. Schneider and Mrs. Abbie Schneider, defendants.'"

It appears from the petition that, on January 4, 1913, respondent, as judge of said superior court, made and entered findings of fact and conclusions of law in the action above referred to and, on January 4, 1913, filed a decree therein. Among other facts it was found: That on February 14, 1910, plaintiff, Mrs. Edwards, was the owner of certain real estate (full description given) which included certain hotel property "and all furniture and fixtures therein and all personal property connected therewith used in the conduct and operation of the hotel on said property." That on said day, plaintiff, Mrs. Edwards, conveyed said property, by deed duly executed and delivered, to defendant Mrs. Abbie Schneider, one of the petitioners herein. That immediately after said conveyance was made, defendant in said action, B. Schneider, agreed with plaintiff, Mrs. Edwards, "to hold said property in trust for the plaintiff, and to sell the same, and then to pay to plaintiff the residue of the amount obtained at said sale after deducting the plaintiff's indebtedness to said defendant B. Schneider, and such sums as were paid by said B. Schneider to discharge the debts owed by plaintiff to divers other parties. * * * That said trust was, after the said conveyance and prior to the 1st day of May, 1910, declared by several written instruments subscribed by the said defendant B. Schneider." (These instruments do not appear in the petition.) It was further found:

"That it is not true that defendant B. Schneider agreed with plaintiff to sell the said property for any given sum, or at any given time; and it is not true that defendant B. Schneider agreed that he would pay to plaintiff a fair, or any proportion of the rents, issues and profits of said property during the continuance of the said trust."

It was also found:

"Sixth. That the said property was conveyed by plaintiff to the defendant Mrs. Abbie Schneider at the request of the defendant B. Schneider, who then represented to plaintiff that that course would be safer than a conveyance direct to the said last-named defendant; and the said conveyance was made with the understanding that the said Mrs. Abbie Schneider should acquire no title to said property in her own right, and that the said property should be held in her name subject to the control of said defendant B. Schneider. That the said defendant Mrs. Annie Schneider, at the time of the execution of the said conveyance had full notice and knowledge of the conditions under which said conveyance was made."

It was then found that defendant B. Schneider took possession of said property "and has since managed the same and has made no sale of said property or any part thereof." That on or about October 15, 1911, "the said defendant B. Schneider repudiated the said trust." As conclusions of law the court found that defendants, the Schneiders, "should be declared trustees of said property, to have and to hold the same in trust for the plaintiff (Mrs. Edwards); that defendants should be required to sell the same at the earliest practicable date, and for the best available price, and after said sale to pay to plaintiff the residue * * * after deducting plaintiff's indebtedness to said B. Schneider and such other indebtedness as he had assumed, owed by plaintiff to other parties."

The court directed and entered what is termed an interlocutory decree in accordance with the findings of fact and conclusions of law. It will be observed that no accounting by the trustees was ordered by this decree.

It further appears that, on February 19, 1915, on the petition of plaintiff Mrs. Edwards, and in the same action, for an order "requiring defendants to render an account herein and for the recovery herein of the value of the use of the property described in the petition" and the "said matter having been submitted to the court and taken under advisement," the court found "all the allegations of the first, second, third, and sixth paragraphs of said petition are true." (The petition does not appear in the record.) Further:

"That the said trust was created and the defendants accepted the same on the 14th day of February, 1910, and ever since that said last-named date said defendants have continued to and do now hold possession of the said trust property, but it is not true that such possession has been held without the consent of plaintiff, and it is not true that said defendants have dealt with and used the same for their own personal profit and advancement, or appropriated to their own use the rents, issues, and profits thereof. It is true that defendants have neglected to account to plaintiff or to this court for any rents, issues, and profits of said property; that it is not true that the interests of defendants in said trust property are antagonistic to the interests of plaintiff therein, or that said defendants have taken no interest in said trust except for the purpose of obtaining from said property the amount of their own financial interest therein, or have taken no interest whatever in the right of plaintiff in said property. That it is true that defendants have endeavored to sell and dispose of said property in accordance with the terms of said judgment, and that they have been unable to sell or dispose of the same for a sufficient sum of money to enable them to recover the amount paid out by them in connection therewith as set forth in said judgment, and it is true that they have at all times used due and reasonable diligence and have used all possible efforts to sell and dispose of the said trust property."

Further:

"That the court is unable to determine from the evidence herein the value of the use of said property from February 14, 1910. That it is true that the cost for taxes and insurance on said property since February 14, 1910, is $1,120 per annum; that it is not true that said property does now or since said 14th day of February, 1910, has paid a profit over all expenses connected with the same of $450 per annum.

"As conclusions of law from the foregoing facts, the court finds: (1) That the defendants should be required to render to this court within fifteen days, a full, true, and correct account of all matters pertaining to said trust from February 14, 1910, to the date of the filing of said petition. (2) That the defendants should not be removed from said trust at this time. (3) That plaintiffs should recover nothing from defendants at this time for the use of said property. Let a decree be entered accordingly."

No further proceedings appear until November 8, 1915, when an order was made by the court reciting that: appears to have been February 19th), and plaintiff having filed a contest and objection to said account, and said matters coming on regularly to be heard upon the said account * * * and evidence having been introduced and it appearing to the court, from said evidence and from said account, that no sufficient or any account has been filed herein in accordance with the decision and decree of this court heretofore made herein. Now, therefore, it is ordered: That said account be, and the same is, hereby declared to be an insufficient accounting of the receipts and disbursements, rents, issues, and profits resulting from the carrying on of said trust, as referred to in said decision and decree. It is further ordered that said defendants be, and they are, hereby ordered to account to the court for all the receipts and disbursements, rents, issues and profits resulting from the operation of the said trust and that said defendants return to and produce before this court, on Thursday, the 11th day of November, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m. at the courtroom of said court, all the books, accounts, checks, receipts and other evidences of the receipts or expenditures in any wise relating to or bearing upon the carrying on of said trust from the 14th day of February, 1910, to the date of the filing of plaintiff's petition herein for an accounting. Done in open court, this 8th day of November, 1915."

"That the decree set forth in the application as of date January 4, 1913, * * * is a final adjudication of the matter and finally settles the rights of the parties; that this decree is not elastic and cannot be enlarged for the benefit of plaintiff nor can it be reduced or made effective for the benefit of defendants."

The instruments creating the trust are not set forth in the application for the writ. We know nothing of the nature and extent of the trust except as we learn the facts from the findings and decree entered January 4, 1913, and the subsequent proceedings. Petitioners rely upon the following finding:

"It is not true that defendant B. Schneider agreed that he would pay to plaintiff a fair, or any proportion of the rents, issues, and profits of said property during the continuance of said trust."

The concluding paragraph of the findings is as follows:

"Let an interlocutory decree be entered accordingly."

In the decree, which is entitled "Interlocutory Decree," the court adjudged and decreed:

"That the defendants be and they are hereby declared to be trustees of the property in plaintiff's complaint and herein described, to have and to hold the same in trust for the plaintiff and to sell the same at the earliest practicable date," and to discharge the debts owing by plaintiff, and to pay plaintiff any residue remaining after such payment; "that plaintiff is entitled to have such trust enforced by this court in this action."

A full description of the property follows:

"Together also with all and singular the tenements * * * and the rents, issues and profits thereof, * * * also all the water, water rights, ditches, flumes, pipe lines, reservoirs, easements, and appurtenances therewith belonging or used and enjoyed in connection therewith, together also with all improvements thereon or any part thereof and all furnishings and fixtures therein and all personal property connected therewith used in the conduct and operation of the hotel on said property."

The petition or complaint, and answer if any there was, in the action in which the findings and decree of January 4, 1913, were made, do not appear. It is only by inference drawn from the findings that the liability of the trustees to account for the rents, issues, and profits of the property confided to their control and custody was a question then before the court. The property consisted in part of an equipped hotel and saloon, concededly an income-producing property, which was taken possession of and operated by the trustee. The court found:

"That immediately after the execution of said conveyance (the trust instruments) the said defendant B. Schneider took possession of said property, and has since been managing the same, and has made no sale of said property or any part thereof."

The finding now relied upon is not an explicit or express finding that no liability of the trustees to account for the rents, issues, and profits of the property arose from the trust. The finding is:

"And it is not true that defendant B. Schneider agreed that he would pay to plaintiff a fair, or any proportion of the rents, issues, and profits of said property during the continuance of the said trust."

This may mean that the trust conveyance contained no express agreement to pay to plaintiff the rents, issues, and profits. The court, by its subsequent orders, seems to have treated the issue as undetermined. In its decree following this finding no mention is made of the rents, issues, and profits of the property.

[2, 3] If the court had intended to adjudge finally that the trustee named was relieved from any liability to account for rents, issues, and profits during his trusteeship, the decree should have so adjudged, for upon every principle governing trusteeship there would be an implied duty so to account. It cannot be presumed that, in the absence of any provision in the instrument creating the trust so to account, the trustee could hold and enjoy the use and incomes of trust property for an indefinite period and account to no one. Distinctly, the duty of the trustee was to manage the property in the interest of the trustor as well as of all the creditors whom the trustee represented. Nothing short of an adjudication by the court that no such duty rested upon the trustee could relieve him therefrom. All the proceedings show that the trust was a continuing trust over which the court retained its power of direction and control when properly invoked. The decree shows that, for reasons then no doubt appearing, the trustee should not be removed; that he was not blameful for not having sold the property during the three intervening years. Why an accounting for rents, issues, and profits was not then ordered we do not know. We must presume that the court then found no necessity for so ordering. It will be observed that the property, the subject of the trust, is fully set forth in the decree and therein are mentioned, as part of the property, "the rents, issues, and profits." The next step taken, so far as the record shows, was on February 19, 1915, on which date findings of fact and conclusions of law were made and entered and decree entered in accordance therewith. These proceedings seem to have been taken in the same action as that in which the findings and decree of January 4, 1913, were made but apparently by a further petition. The pleadings are not set forth, but it appeared from recitals in the findings of fact that:

"A petition for an order requiring defendants to render an account herein" was heard, "upon testimony produced by plaintiff and defendants."

The court found that:

"All the allegations of the first, second, third, and sixth paragraphs of said petition are true."

What these paragraphs set forth does not appear. The court found further that:

"The said trust was created and the defendants accepted the same on the 14th day of February, 1910, and ever since said last-named date said defendants have continued to and do now hold possession of the said trust property."

The findings are set forth in full upon an earlier page of this opinion. It was found that:

"Defendants have neglected to account to plaintiff or to this court for any rents, issues, and profits of said property."

And as conclusions of law, among others, it was found:

"That the defendants should be required to render to this court within fifteen days a full, true, and correct account of all matters pertaining to said trust from February 14, 1910, to the date of the filing of said petition; * * * that plaintiff should recover nothing from defendants at this time for the use of said property."

The decree ordered:

"That defendants render to this court within fifteen days from the date herein a full, true, and correct account of all matters pertaining to said trust," etc.

On November 8, 1915, the court made and entered the order hereinabove set forth and is the order the enforcement of which petitioners now ask to have this court prohibit. The court therein recited that:

"Defendants having filed an account in obedience to the order of February 23, 1915, * * * that no sufficient or any account has been filed herein in accordance with the decision and decree of this court heretofore made herein. Now, therefore, it is ordered * * * that said defendants be and they are hereby ordered to account to the court for all the receipts and disbursements, rents, issues, and profits resulting from the operation of said trust * * * and to return to and produce before this court * * * all the books, accounts, checks, receipts and other evidences of the receipts and expenditures in any wise relating to or bearing upon the carrying out of said trust from the 14th day of February, 1910, to the date of the filing of plaintiff's petition herein for an accounting."

The point now urged in support of the petition for the writ is that the court was without jurisdiction to make the order last above referred to for the reason that by its order of January 4, 1913, it adjudged that the trust did not require an accounting of the rents, issues, and profits of the property; that such order was final and the court thereby lost jurisdiction to impose upon the trustees the duty of rendering such account.

We cannot accede to this construction of the decree referred to or of the proceedings of the court in the matter. Apparently the principal purpose of the trust was to bring about a sale of the property and thereby the payment of the trustor's liabilities. In January, 1913, no sale had been effected and the court refused to remove the trustees, being satisfied that they had used all proper efforts to effect a sale. In 1915 no sale had yet been made and the court still retained its confidence in the trustees and continued their trusteeship by refusing to remove them. But the court now believed that, after holding the property for five years, it was due to all parties interested that the trustees should render an account of receipts and disbursements, as we think the court had the power to do. We cannot assume, as petitioners seem to fear, that they will be unnecessarily annoyed in being obliged to bring into court the evidences of their transactions respecting the property. It must be presumed that at the hearing the court will hold the scales of justice at equipoise and accord to all the parties alike the equal protection of the law. Petitioners may have adjudicated all their rights involved at the hearing and fully preserved, for review if necessary, by the record therein made. It may turn out that the necessary expenses and disbursements and just compensation to the trustees in administering the trust will exceed the receipts, but with the result, whatever it may be, the court cannot now concern itself.

The writ is denied.

We concur: HART, J.; ELLISON, Judge pro tem.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John E. Richards, Judge.

Suit by Edward C. Goldner against William Crane Spencer and others. From a decree for complainant, defendant Thomas E. Curran, administrator, appeals. Affirmed.

Henry N. Beatty, Francis Dunn, and Thomas E. Curran, all of San Francisco, for appellant. L. W. Lovey and Walter E. Dorn, both of San Francisco, for respondent. Walter H. Robinson, of San Francisco, for defendants Spencer and Estorff.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the defendant, Thos. E. Curran, as administrator of the estate of Elizabeth Cullen, deceased, from a judgment in plaintiff's favor, and from an order denying said defendant's motion for a new trial. The facts of the case as disclosed by the record are these: In the month of November, 1904, the defendant, William Crane Spencer, borrowed the sum of $3,000 from Elizabeth Cullen, giving his promissory note therefor. In the month of December of the same year, he received the additional sum of $7,000 which he was to invest for her. Mrs. Cullen died in the year 1906, and the defendant, Thos. E. Curran, was appointed her administrator with the will annexed, and in that capacity brought an action against William Crane Spencer to recover both the money he had borrowed and the sum which had been intrusted to him. In that action judgment was rendered in favor of the administrator for the sum of $10,946.46 with interest and costs, on March 22, 1908. A transcript of this judgment was recorded in the county of Placer, on the 6th day of April, 1908, and it then became a lien upon whatever interest said Spencer then had in the property lying in said county and being the subject of the present action.

In the meantime, and in the early part of the year 1907, William Crane Spencer had gone to Paris, France, and there and during that year had executed his note and mortgage for the sum of $21,000, covering the Placer county property, to Edward C. Goldner, plaintiff in this action, who was a half-brother of Spencer, and a resident of Paris. The mortgage was recorded in the county of Placer on March 16, 1908, prior to the recording there of the transcript of the judgment obtained by Curran. The present action to foreclose said mortgage was commenced in the month of September, 1909, in the county of Placer. The defendant, Curran, appeared in said action and set up the issue of fraud in the transaction between the plaintiff, Goldner, and William Crane Spencer, invalidating said note and mortgage, or at least subordinating the same to the Curran judgment. The trial court found upon this issue in Curran's favor, but, upon appeal to the Supreme Court, this finding was held to be unsupported by sufficient evidence and the judgment was reversed. The case is reported in Goldner v. Spencer, 163 Cal. 317, 125 Pac. 347. The cause was then transferred to the city and county of San Francisco for a second trial, and from the judgment therein rendered in the plaintiff's favor, and from the order denying a new trial, the defendant Curran prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The first contention made by the appellant, Curran, is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the judgment against his contention upon the issue of fraud. It is conceded, however, that the trial court upon the second trial of the cause had before it practically the same evidence which was before the trial court of Placer county upon the first trial of the cause, and also before the Supreme Court upon the first appeal. This being so, we are bound by the views expressed, by the Supreme Court as to the weight, sufficiency, and effect of this evidence upon the former appeal; and, as we have seen, the Supreme Court has held such evidence insufficient to sustain the issue tendered by the defendant Curran as to the fraudulent character of the transaction between the plaintiff, Edward C. Goldner, and William Crane Spencer. No further comment upon this phase of the present appeal is necessary than merely to call attention to the language of the Supreme Court upon the former appeal. Goldner v. Spencer, supra.

[2] The next contention of the appellant is that the court, in its findings upon the second trial of the cause, committed an error in finding that a certain small, irregular portion of the premises in question amounting to less than one-third of an acre, and separated from the balance of the tract by a turn in the county road, had been released from the operation and effect of the Goldner mortgage, when in fact there was no evidence of such release. The injury, which the defendant Curran claims to have suffered from this alleged error, is that, having sold the interest of said Spencer in the entire tract upon an execution issued upon the Curran judgment, and having become the purchaser thereof by said sale, he has thereby become entitled to be a redemptioner of the property to be sold under the decree of foreclosure and sale in the present action, and that, since the court has erroneously found that this small fraction of an acre has been released from the effect of said mortgage and sale, his burden as a redemptioner has been thereby increased as to the balance of the property. While the record appears to be wanting in the evidence of the release of this small piece of land, sufficient to sustain this particular finding of the court, it does appear that the court has expressly found that this fraction of an acre of land is of practically no value. There is enough evidence in the record to sustain this finding; and, this being so, the court's error in finding the fact of its release from the effect of the Goldner mortgage and sale was an error without injury to the appellant, and was therefore not sufficiently material to justify a reversal of the case.

There are no other material contentions of the appellant upon this appeal, which are not disposed of in the decision of the former appeal.

Judgment and order affirmed.

WEIS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF SAN DIEGO COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2094.)

1. NUISANCE — 80 — INJUNCTION — CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.

Where threatened acts, if committed, in addition to being indictable, will constitute a public nuisance, courts of equity may interpose injunctive process to prevent injury which will result from maintenance thereof.

2. NUISANCE — 80 — INJUNCTION — CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.

The act of causing women to exhibit their naked persons to the public for a general admission fee, although a crime, is so detrimental to public morals and offensive to the senses as to constitute a public nuisance within Civ. Code, §§ 3479, 3480, defining public nuisance, and may be restrained by injunction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Nuisance, Cent. Dig. § 192; Dec. Dig. 80.]

Prohibition by Joseph Weis against the Superior Court of San Diego County and another. The temporary writ issued. Application for peremptory writ denied, and proceeding dismissed.

Wm. E. Ginder, of San Diego, for petitioner. Spencer M. Marsh, Dist. Atty., of San Diego, and F. F. Schuermeyer, Asst. Dist. Atty., of San Diego, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Prohibition. Respondents have interposed a general demurrer to a petition in compliance with which this court issued an alternative writ of prohibition directed to the superior court of San Diego county, commanding it to refrain from further proceedings in a certain matter there pending, entitled "The People of the State of California, Plaintiff, v. Joseph Weis, Jane Doe and Mary Roe, Defendants."

As shown by the petition, the district attorney of San Diego county, on April 27, 1916, pursuant to the provisions of section 731 of the Code of Civil Procedure, commenced an action in the superior court of San Diego county entitled as above, the purpose of which was to secure an injunction against the doing of certain acts by defendants alleged to constitute a public nuisance, and thus abate the same.

[1, 2] In substance, the complaint filed in that action and made a part of the petition for the writ alleges that under a concession granted to defendant Joseph Weis by the Panama-California International Exposition, said defendant is conducting upon what is known as the "Isthmus" in the exposition grounds, a public resort and place of amusement and entertainment designated and known as the "Sultan's Harem," which for an admission is open to the general public; that since about March 18, 1916, to the time of filing the complaint, said defendant Joseph Weis, as a part of the entertainment so given in said Sultan's Harem, has employed Jane Doe and Mary Roe as such employes to make, and who do make, in the presence of a large number of men, women, and children, a public exhibition and exposure of their naked persons and private parts thereof to those attending said place, and which exhibition, as alleged, is indecent and offensive to the senses; that such exhibition constitutes a public nuisance and will continue to constitute such nuisance, unless restrained by the court—followed by a prayer for an injunction.

The demurrer interposed to this complaint was overruled by the court which, as alleged in the petition, threatens to and will, unless restrained by this court, grant an injunction as prayed for in the complaint.

The contention of petitioner is based upon the ground that a court of equity has no jurisdiction to enforce the criminal laws by injunction. We agree with counsel that the threatened acts described in the complaint, when committed, would constitute the crime of indecent exposure, as defined in section 311 of the Penal Code, for which, upon conviction, the law prescribes a penalty; and it is likewise true, as claimed, that courts of equity have no jurisdiction to enjoin the commission of acts merely because such acts when committed would constitute a crime. Where, however, the threatened acts, if committed, in addition to being an indictable offense, will constitute a public nuisance, courts of equity are vested with jurisdiction to interpose their injunctive process to prevent injury which will result from the maintenance thereof. People v. Truckee Lumber Co., 116 Cal. 397, 48 Pac. 374, 39 L. R. A. 581, 58 Am. St. Rep. 183. As well said in a concurring opinion by Judge Valliant in the case of State ex rel. Attorney General v. Canty, 207 Mo. 439, 105 S. W. 1078, 15 L. R.

A. (N. S.) 747, 123 Am. St. Rep. 393, 13 Ann. Cas. 787:

"A court of equity will not undertake to enforce the criminal law; therefore it will not enjoin the commission of a threatened act merely because the act would be a crime, but, on the other hand, neither will it withhold its equitable relief in a case in which, for other reasons, it has jurisdiction merely because the act when committed would be a crime. An act displayed before a public audience which is debasing in its character, debauching in its influence on public morals and brutalizing in its effect on the spectators is a public nuisance, which a court of equity has jurisdiction to enjoin and the court is not robbed of its jurisdiction merely because the act besides being a nuisance is also a crime."

While the acts here complained of clearly constitute a crime, they also constitute a nuisance within the meaning of section 3479 of the Civil Code, which defines a nuisance as:

"Anything which is * * * indecent or offensive to the senses, * * * so as to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of life or property. * * *"

And section 3480 of the same Code defines a public nuisance as:

"One which affects at the same time an entire community or neighborhood, or any considerable number of persons, although the extent of the annoyance or damage inflicted upon individuals may be unequal."

Mr. Joyce in his work on Nuisances, § 409, says:

"A disorderly and disreputable theater may be enjoined, although a common nuisance."

To the same effect is Wood on Nuisances, § 68, where it is said:

"A public exhibition of any kind that tends to the corruption of morals, to a disturbance of the peace, or of the general good order and welfare of society, is a public nuisance. Under this head are included * * * obscene pictures, and any and all exhibitions, the natural tendency of which is to pander to vicious * * * and disorderly members of society."

Says the Supreme Court of Indiana, in State v. Ohio Oil Co., 150 Ind. 21, 49 N. E. 809, 47 L. R. A. 627:

"Every place where a public statute is openly, publicly, repeatedly, continuously, consistently and intentionally violated, is a public nuisance."

See, also, Reaves v. Territory, 13 Okl. 396, 74 Pac. 951; Commonwealth v. McGovern, 116 Ky. 212, 75 S. W. 261, 66 L. R. A. 280; People v. Doris, 14 App. Div. 117, 43 N. Y. Supp. 571; Farmer v. Behmer, 9 Cal. App. 773, 100 Pac. 901; People v. Wing, 147 Cal. 379, 81 Pac. 1103; State ex rel. Vance v. Crawford, 28 Kan. 518, 42 Am. Rep. 182.

Not only as thus defined by text-writers and supported by decisions, but as declared in section 3479 of the Civil Code, any act which is an offense against public decency, or any public exhibition which is offensive to the senses, whether of sight, sound, or smell, or which tends to corrupt public morals or disturb the good order and welfare of society, is a public nuisance, and under the provisions of section 731, Code of Civil Procedure, the district attorney is authorized to bring a civil action in the name of the people of the state to abate the same. That defendants are conducting and will continue to conduct before a public audience of men, women, and children, an indecent exhibition, debasing in character, and well calculated to offend the senses and debauch the public morals of those who witness it, clearly appears. Why should the public be subjected to such baneful influence, when it can be protected by the preventive remedy of the court? Conceding that the injunctive process of the court should not issue to restrain the women there employed from making an indecent exhibition of themselves, since the threatened acts will be but a crime, nevertheless the defendant Joseph Weis, who is proprietor and conducts the place and employs them so to do, is subject to such process. The threatened acts if permitted will not only constitute a public nuisance, to be dealt with by the courts having jurisdiction over crimes, but will constitute a public nuisance, injurious to public morals and the good order of society, to prevent which a court of equity has jurisdiction in a civil action brought by the district attorney in the name of the people of the state, thus subverting the public morals and protecting men, women, and children attending this public resort as spectators from being subjected to witnessing the offensive and indecent exhibition which petitioner is conducting and will as alleged continue to conduct, unless restrained by order of the court.

The application for a peremptory writ is denied, and the proceeding is dismissed.

ROBERTS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA, IN AND FOR STANISLAUS COUNTY. (Civ. 1536.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE ⇐53, 72—JURISDICTION—RESIDENCE OF PARTIES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 832, provides that actions in justices' courts must be tried, when one has contracted to perform an obligation at a particular place, but resides elsewhere, in the place of performance or of his residence. Section 843 provides that a justice's summons cannot be served outside the county wherein the action is brought, unless defendant resided in the county when the action was brought or the obligation incurred, and thereafter removed. Held, that if the obligation was incurred in the county of defendant's residence and he later removed, there being no written contract, suit in a justice court of such county was proper, and summons issued therefrom was valid, though served in another county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 56, 143–145, 147, 235; Dec. Dig. ⇐53, 72.]

2. DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT ⇐57—PROCESS ⇐157—DEFECTIVE PROCESS—REMEDY.

The remedy in case of alleged improper service is by motion to quash the summons, and not by motion for dismissal of the complaint for want of jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. §§ 129-133; Dec. Dig. ¶¶ 57; Process, Cent. Dig. §§ 212-217; Dec. Dig. ¶¶ 157.]

3. APPEARANCE ¶9(5)—SPECIAL APPEARANCE—MOTION TO DISMISS—EFFECT.

Since a motion to dismiss on the ground of want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter necessarily calls for relief, which may be demanded only by a party to the record, such a motion constitutes a general appearance, and brings the moving party within the jurisdiction of the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. §§ 47-49; Dec. Dig. ¶¶ 9(5).]

Petition for writ of review by J. William Roberts against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for Stanislaus County. Writ discharged.

Walter E. Burke, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Francis O. Hoover, of Modesto, for respondent.

HART, J. The facts as shown by the petition are: On the 19th day of August, 1915, one S. N. McBride instituted an action in the justice's court of Modesto township, county of Stanislaus, jointly against the petitioner herein and his wife, Louise C. Roberts, for the recovery of the sum of $222.29, alleged to be due the plaintiff from the defendants in said action for services alleged to have been performed by the plaintiff "at the special instance and request of defendants and each of them in checking, leveling, cultivating, farming, and irrigating a tract of land belonging to the said defendants and located in the said township, county, and state." The complaint was in three different counts, each setting out the same cause of action in different forms and in each of which it was alleged:

"That at the time defendants employed plaintiff to do said work and labor and at the time said obligation was incurred the said defendants and each of them resided in the said township, county, and state."

The petition here alleges that, upon the filing of the complaint in said action "process issued, and petitioner, who was one of the defendants in said complaint named, was served in the county of Los Angeles, state of California, on or about the 26th day of August, 1915."

It is further likewise alleged:

That "the defendants are not, and never were, residents of the township of Modesto, county of Stanislaus"; that thereafter, to wit, on the 3d day of September, 1915, counsel for the defendants in said action made what is termed in his written motion a special appearance for said defendants "only for the purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court over the persons of the defendants and the subject-matter of the litigation herein," and moved for a dismissal of the complaint "on the ground that prior to and at the time of the issuance of the summons herein, the defendants were and still are residents of Los Angeles, in the state of California, and that any contract to perform any obligation to the plaintiff herein was to be performed in the said county of Los Angeles, and that there is no special contract in writing to the contrary."

The said motion was supported by the affidavit of each of the defendants, deposing that they and each of them were residents of Los Angeles at and prior to the commencement of said action and the issuance of summons therein and are still residents of said place, and "that any contract to perform any obligation to the plaintiff herein was to be performed in the county of Los Angeles, and there is no special contract in writing to the contrary."

In opposition to said motion and the affidavits of the defendants, the plaintiff in said action filed an affidavit in which he declared, as his complaint in effect alleged, that:

"The obligation sued upon herein was incurred in Modesto township, county of Stanislaus, * * * that all work therein referred to was performed in said township, * * * and that there is not, and never was, a special or any contract to the effect that said contract or the obligation herein sued upon was to be performed in any other place than the said Modesto township, * * * or that the money herein sued for should be paid in any other place."

On the 15th day of October, 1915, having overruled the motion to dismiss the action, and the defendants failing to answer the complaint, the justice's court rendered and entered judgment by default in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendants for the sum sued for, with interest and costs. Thereafter and within due time, the defendants took an appeal to the superior court of Stanislaus county from the judgment so entered. The appeal was upon questions of law alone and was supported by a statement of the case.

On the 9th day of February, 1916, having heard the appeal, the superior court rendered its judgment affirming the judgment of the justice's court and directed the justice of the peace to proceed to issue execution upon said judgment or to take such other action in the premises as might be legal and proper.

It is the judgment so rendered by the superior court which it is the object of this proceeding to have annulled and set aside on the ground that said court, in rendering it, acted in excess of its jurisdiction; the specific point being that (so it is contended) inasmuch as the defendants resided in Los Angeles county and did not contract in writing to perform the obligation sued on at the place where the action was brought, the service of summons upon the defendants in Los Angeles county or outside the county wherein the action was instituted was void and of no effect; that, therefore, the justice's court never acquired jurisdiction of the persons of the defendants, and that, as a consequence, the judgment entered against them by said court was coram non iudice; that, of necessity, since the judgment appealed from was void, the superior court did not and could not acquire jurisdiction to review the case and enter a judgment therein.

[1] The place of trial of actions commenced in justices' courts is fixed by section 832 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Therein it is provided, inter alia:

"Actions in justices' courts must be commenced, and (subject to the right to change the place of trial, as elsewhere provided in said Code) must be tried: * * * 7. When a person has contracted to perform an obligation at a particular place, and resides in another county, township, or city—in the township or city in which such obligation is to be performed, or in which he resides; and the township or city in which the obligation is incurred is deemed to be the township or city in which it is to be performed, unless there is a special contract in writing to the contrary."

Section 848 of said Code contains, among other provisions, the following:

"The summons cannot be served out of the county wherein the action is brought, except in the following cases: * * * 4. In all cases where the defendant was a resident of the county when the action was brought, or when the obligation was incurred and thereafter departed therefrom, in which event he may be served wherever he may be found."

Reading the foregoing sections together, in the light of the facts as they are presented by the record certified to this court, there is but one permissible conclusion to be arrived at here, viz. that the action was properly brought in the justice's court of Modesto township, in Stanislaus county, and that the summons was properly served on the defendants in Los Angeles county.

These facts are expressly and plainly made to appear by the complaint in the action and were nowhere or in no manner denied: That the obligation sued on was incurred in Modesto township, Stanislaus county; that the defendants, at the time the obligation was incurred, resided in said township and county, and (by necessary inference) if they resided in Los Angeles county at the time the action was brought, departed from said township and county after the obligation was incurred; that there is or was no special or other agreement in writing that the obligation was to be performed in any other place than in Modesto township, in Stanislaus county, wherein it was incurred.

It follows, from those facts and the Code sections above mentioned, that the justice's court not only had jurisdiction of the action, but, as above suggested, that the summons was properly and legally served upon the defendants in Los Angeles county. If this be not true under the facts as stated and as they appear here, then the provisions of the Code to which we have referred are meaningless.

We do not believe that the court, in Olcese v. Justice's Court, 156 Cal. 82, 103 Pac. 317, intended to say anything which may be construed as in conflict with the conclusion arrived at here with respect to the meaning of the sections of the Code above referred to. In that case, the action was brought in one of the judicial townships of Contra Costa county and service of summons upon the defendant had in the city and county of San Francisco. The plaintiff, in the service of summons, proceeded upon the theory of subdivision 2 of section 848, supra, and undertook to defend the service upon the terms of said subdivision, which provides that "when the action is against a party who has contracted in writing to perform an obligation at a particular place, and resides in a different county," summons may be served in the county wherein he is found. The complaint in that case, however, did not allege that the contract upon which the action was brought was in writing, and the court held that, while jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action was in the justice's court (Code Civ. Proc. § 832, subd. 7), "yet, by the provisions of section 848 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1907, service upon the defendant may not be had outside of the county in which the action is brought, unless the contract be in writing." The opinion in that case, so far as the question of the service of summons is concerned, merely deals with subdivision 2 of section 848, and does not declare and we are sure did not intend to say that if the defendant was a resident of the county wherein the action was brought at the time the obligation sued on was incurred and thereafter departed therefrom, service upon him could not be had unless the contract from which such obligation arose was in writing.

[2] There is, however, another answer to the petition for the relief sought herein in that the defendants made a general appearance and so submitted themselves to the jurisdiction of the court. Their motion, as will be noted, was not to quash the summons, which was their proper remedy, but for a dismissal of the complaint on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction "over the persons of the defendants and the subject-matter of the litigation."

[3] The motion to dismiss the complaint on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action amounted, substantially or in legal effect, to a demurrer to the complaint on that ground. At all events, a motion to dismiss on the ground of want of jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action necessarily calls for relief which may be demanded only by a party to the record. It has been uniformly so held, as logically it could not otherwise be held, and, furthermore, that where a party appears and asks for such relief, although expressly characterizing his appearance as special and for the special purpose of objecting to the jurisdiction of the court over his person, he as effectually submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court as though he had legally been served with process. In re Clarke, 125 Cal. 388, 58 Pac. 22; Security Loan & Trust Co., etc., v. Boston & South R. F. Co., 126 Cal. 418, 58 Pac. 941, 59 Pac. 296; Maclay Co. v. Meads, 14 Cal. App. 363, 112 Pac. 195, 113 Pac. 364; Olcese v. Justice's Court, 156 Cal. 82, 103 Pac. 317.

"It is the character of the relief asked, and not the intention of the party that it shall or shall not constitute a general appearance, which is material." 2 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 625, notes and cases; In re Clarke, supra, 125 Cal. 388, 392, 58 Pac. 22.

In Security Loan & Trust Co. v. Boston & South R. F. Co., above cited, it is said:

"If a party defendant wishes to insist upon the objection that he is not in court for want of jurisdiction over his person, he must specially appear for that purpose only, and must keep out for all purposes except to make that objection. If he raises any other question, or asks for any relief, which can only be granted upon the hypothesis that the court has jurisdiction of his person, his appearance is general, though termed special, and he thereby submits to the jurisdiction of the court as completely as if he had been regularly served with summons."

In the Olcese Case, the court, by Mr. Justice Henshaw, says:

"Pleas based upon lack of jurisdiction of the person are in their nature pleas in abatement and find no special favor in the law. They amount to no more than the declaration of the defendant that he has had actual notice, is actually in court in a proper action, but, for informality in the service of process, is not legally before the court. It is purely a dilatory plea, and when a defendant seeks to avail himself of it, he must, for very obvious reasons, stand upon his naked legal right and seek nothing further from the court than the enforcement of that right. He will not be heard to ask of the court anything further than an adjudication upon his plea, and if he does ask anything further, then, by logic of the fact, he must necessarily have waived the irregularity of his summons before the court."

For the reasons herein stated, the writ is discharged.

FISCHER et al. v. CAREY et al. (S. F. 6958.)

Rehearing Denied Aug. 25, 1916.)1. SHIPPING — 20 — RELATION OF OWNERS — PARTNERSHIP.

Part owners of a ship as such are not partners, but tenants in common, any partnership arising only by special contract; and no such relation exists where minority owners objecting in admiralty to the use made by the majority owners compel the giving of a bond for safe return on each voyage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Shipping, Cent. Dig. §§ 52, 312; Dec. Dig. 20.]

2. ADMIRALTY — 1 — JURISDICTION — EFFECT OF STATE STATUTE.

Any jurisdiction as to ships attempted to be given to state courts by Civ. Code, § 964, or any state statute, cannot diminish the admiralty jurisdiction of federal courts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Admiralty, Cent. Dig. §§ 1-17; Dec. Dig. 1.]

3. ADMIRALTY — 7 — JURISDICTION — INCIDENTAL ACCOUNTING.

Jurisdiction of an action for accounting, as such, is in state courts, and not in admiralty; but admiralty will take an accounting which is a necessary incident to the main relief asked, that being within its jurisdiction.

4. ADMIRALTY — 7 — JURISDICTION — SALE OF SHIP.

Admiralty has exclusive jurisdiction to appoint a receiver for and decree sale of a ship, because of differences between the owners as to management, though it may not decree a sale because of the paramount principle in admiralty of right of control in the majority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Admiralty, Cent. Dig. §§ 99-120; Dec. Dig. 7.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Harry F. Fischer and others against F. W. Carey and others. From an order appointing a receiver of a ship, certain defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wm. M. Madden, of San Francisco, for appellants. H. W. Hutton, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiffs, minority owners of the schooner Hugh Hogan, began this action in equity in the superior court of the state. The defendants are the owners of a majority interest in the schooner. The difference between the owners arises out of that situation so frequently presented to an admiralty court where the minority owners are dissatisfied with the employment by the majority owners of the vessel. It is charged that the vessel is being operated at an undue expense, is taken into shallow harbors which she cannot enter or leave with her full load, and is subjected to the danger of becoming a total loss if allowed to continue on these voyages. It is further charged that she is being operated in the interest of the defendant Oregon & California Lumber Corporation and the Hurd Lumber & Navigation Company, and employed in the carrying of lumber cargoes from coast points to San Francisco. The plaintiffs prayed for an accounting, for the appointment of a receiver, and for an order decreeing the sale of the vessel and a division of the proceeds ratably amongst the part owners. The court appointed a receiver to take possession of the schooner and "to operate said vessel if it appears in the judgment of said receiver such operation can be done at a profit, and to preserve the said vessel, her earnings and appurtenances until the further order of the court." From this order certain of the defendants have appealed.

[1] The appellants urge that plaintiffs' action is cognizable in admiralty in the district court of the United States alone, and that the state court is wholly without jurisdiction to proceed in the matter.

The respondents, in support of the jurisdiction of the state court, announce the unquestioned principle that the adjustment of partnership matters and accounts is in equity alone and not in the admiralty court. They next declare that these parties plaintiff and defendant are partners. But this is not the fact. No partnership is averred in the pleading. The relationship of partners does not arise between part owners of ships merely by virtue of their ownership. It arises only by special contract. As part owners they are tenants in common in the ship and not partners. Freeman, Cotenancy, § 379; The New Orleans, 106 U. S. 13, 1 Sup. Ct. 90, 27 L. Ed. 96. In Hendy v. March, 75 Cal. 569, 17 Pac. 702, relied upon by respondents as establishing a partnership in this case, this court said:

"Here is a distinct agreement to share in the profits and loss arising from the use of the vessel, and such an agreement constitutes a partnership. * * * It is not necessary to say that the partnership extended to the ship itself as contradistinguished from its use. 'Part owners of a ship do not, by simply using it in a joint enterprise, become partners to the ship.' Civ. Code, § 2396."

And in this case it is made to appear by the pleadings that so far from being partners the plaintiffs, objecting in a court of admiralty to the use which the majority owners were making of the ship, compelled them to give a bond for the safe return of the ship upon each voyage thereof. By virtue of these proceedings and of this bond the plaintiffs relieved themselves from liability for loss upon the voyage and at the same time deprived themselves of the right to share in the ship's profit—a situation absolutely repugnant to any conception of a partnership. Coyne v. Caples (D. C.) 8 Fed. 638; Freeman, Cotenancy (2d Ed.) § 390.

[2-4] The question presented, therefore, is whether minority owners, under the indicated circumstances, may resort to the state courts for the appointment of a receiver who takes the control of a ship away from the majority owners for the purpose of operating and selling it. Respondents base their right to maintain this action upon a section of our Code and upon certain state adjudications. Section 964 of our Civil Code declares that:

"If a ship belongs to several persons, not partners, and they differ as to its use or repair, the controversy may be determined by any court of competent jurisdiction."

Conceding that this language is comprehensive enough to embrace within it the action here brought, neither this nor any other state statute can have the effect of diminishing the admiralty jurisdiction of the federal courts. Aurora Shipping Co. v. Boyce, 191 Fed. 960, 112 C. C. A. 372; The J. E. Rumbell, 148 U. S. 1, 13 Sup. Ct. 498, 37 L. Ed. 345; Steamboat Orleans v. Phoebe, 11 Pet. 175, 9 L. Ed. 677. Our Code section, therefore, will of necessity be held to apply to such cases as do not encroach upon admiralty jurisdiction. Have the admiralty courts any jurisdiction at all over this controversy? If they have, is their jurisdiction exclusive, or concurrent merely with that of the state? One phase may be spoken of only to be eliminated. An action for an accounting, as such, is of course equitable, and jurisdiction over it is in the state courts. Admiralty has and takes no jurisdiction over such actions. The utmost limit to which it goes is that where a sale of the ship has been had under decree it will take an accounting as a necessary incident for the purpose of making a just distribution of the proceeds of the sale. But manifestly the accounting in this case is incidental to the principal relief sought. That relief is the taking over by a state court in equity, acting through its receiver, of the rem and a sale of that rem at the instance of the minority owners, who, disagreeing with the majority owners over the latter's management of the ship, plead a loss of the earning capacity of the ship, a depreciation of the value of their shares, and ask a sale of the vessel in consequence.

It is from this latter aspect that this case should be and will be treated. It is now well settled that the jurisdictional power of the district courts over "all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction" (Const. U. S. art. 3, § 2) is not limited to admiralty jurisdiction as it existed in England where it was in bitter conflict with the common law, but that reference may be had to all Codes of maritime law, to all the decisions of the Mediterranean consular courts, and to the customs and practices of all civilized maritime countries. De Lovio v. Bolt et al., 2 Gall. 398, Fed. Cas. No. 3776. Touching the reservation to suitors of "a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it" as provided in the federal Judiciary Act, Benedict says:

"The Judiciary Act, which established the United States courts and defined their jurisdiction, confirmed the existing right of the common-law courts, by providing that the federal District Courts shall have exclusive jurisdiction of 'all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it.' The common-law remedy here mentioned is the right of a plaintiff to proceed in personam against a defendant, which remedy the common law is competent to give. Therefore, when a direct suit against a shipowner is brought, e. g., to recover seamen's wages, or damages for collision, and jurisdiction of the person of the defendant can be secured, such a suit may be brought either in admiralty or at common law, the two courts having in this respect concurrent jurisdiction. But the right to proceed in rem is distinctly an admiralty remedy, and hence exclusively within the control of the United States courts; no state can confer jurisdiction upon its courts to proceed in rem. Nor could Congress give such power to a state, since it would be contrary to the federal grant in the Constitution. So liens given by the laws of a state for matters which are subjects of admiralty jurisdiction are enforceable against the thing only in the federal courts, though the debt on which the lien is founded may be sued on in personam in the state court. This right to proceed in rem, according to the methods of the maritime law, is the 'exclusive' jurisdiction of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction conferred upon the district courts by section 563 of the Revised Statutes, subdivision 8 [U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 991(3)]."

The foregoing sufficiently for our purposes outlines the principle which we conceive must govern this determination. To say when and under what circumstances a vessel shall be sold, is certainly a part of the civil law of lictation, which law forms to so great an extent the foundation of admiralty jurisdiction that it is so declared in the laws of Oleron, to which courts of admiralty make so frequent reference. Thus, the third provision of those laws is, "Touching the engaging (sale or hypothecating) of ships or goods in case of necessity." And Benedict, in his learned work, after discussing the principles governing admiralty jurisdiction in the matter of disputes between part owners, declares:

"Cases of lictation or sale for the purpose of partition are also within the power of the American Admiralty, as they are of the European Maritime Court." Benedict, Admiralty, § 187.

Hughes, however (Hughes, Admiralty, § 158), declares:

"Although admiralty does not have jurisdiction to decree a sale of a vessel for mere purpose of partition, where the interests in the vessel are unequal, for in that case the majority can rule, yet if the interests are equal and the equal interests disagree * * * admiralty has jurisdiction to decree a sale of the vessel."

Also it is said that in certain instances, not necessary here to specify, admiralty may order a sale of the vessel at the instance of the majority owners. In the phraseology of the last quotation is found the difficulty attending this consideration. Is it true that admiralty does not have jurisdiction to decree a sale at the instance of the minority owners, or is it that, having jurisdiction, it will not, by reason of the dominance of the principle that the majority owners have the right to the use and control of the vessel, decree a sale at the instance of the minority owners? As this question is answered so must go the decision of this case. For if it be true that admiralty has not this jurisdiction in the true sense and meaning of the word, then manifestly the state court is not trespassing upon any of the reserved federal admiralty and maritime powers. But if, upon the other hand, the true holding is, as above indicated, that admiralty has the jurisdiction and power, but for reasons sufficient unto itself will not exercise that power in favor of minority owners, then the matter still remains one exclusively of federal cognizance, and the effort of the plaintiffs in this case is to accomplish in the state courts the doing of that which admiralty, with jurisdiction over the matter, would refuse to do. The manifest effect of this, then, would be an encroachment upon and a usurpation of the legitimate powers of the district courts in admiralty.

The respondents take the view first outlined, and they support it, as has been said, with decisions from state courts and with language found in some of the federal decisions. Thus the learned Justice Story, in Orleans v. Phoebe, 11 Pet. 175, 9 L. Ed. 677, is relied on. He speaks in the following language:

"The jurisdiction of courts of admiralty in cases of part owners having unequal interests and shares, is not, and never has been, applied to direct a sale upon any dispute between them as to the trade and navigation of a ship engaged in maritime voyages. * * * The majority of the owners have a right to employ the ship in such voyages as they may please, giving a stipulation to the dissenting owners for the safe return of the ship."

So, also, in the Ocean Belle Case, Fed. Cas. No. 10402, 6 Ben. 253. In an action in the federal district court it is declared:

"The court has no power to order a sale of this vessel, on the facts stated in the libel to pay the debts and distribute the residue of the proceeds, on the demand of the owners of five-sixteenths of her, and against the will of the owners of the rest. * * * Such power of sale has never been established in this country."

And so in the well-considered case of The Seneca, 3 Wall. Jr. 395, Fed. Cas. No. 12-670, where the dispute was between two equal owners, the exercise of the powers in admiralty was reviewed, and it is declared that:

"If the majority owners refuse to employ the vessel, though they cannot be compelled to it by the minority, neither can their refusal keep the vessel idle, to the injury of the minority or to the public detriment; and since in such a case the minority can neither employ her themselves nor force the majority to do so, the vessel may be valued and sold."

And, finally, in Tunno v. Betsina, Fed. Cas. No. 14236, 24 Fed. Cas. 316, after a lengthy and learned discussion of the rights of majority owners to employ the vessel against the wish of the minority owners, and the circumstances and conditions under which admiralty will decree a sale, and in declaring finally that it will not decree a sale at the instance of minority owners dissatisfied merely with the use, the learned circuit judge uses this language:

"If not within the jurisdiction of the admiralty, a court of equity will be found adequate to the occasion, proper for the exercise of its authority. I consider that the power to sell, as exercised by Judge Washington, in the case of The Seneca, supra, was carried as far as the best authorities in the maritime law will warrant. Nor is it easy to comprehend for what useful purpose the power could be exercised in any other cases than such as I have referred to, in which a disagreement between part owners cannot be determined by the operation of principles applicable to associated ownership, or such as are specially provided for an ownership in vessels. Of what use would be the principle which affirms the control resulting to a majority from the fact of its being so, if in any case in which it was to be applied, a court would be asked to decree a sale? It would soon be that the only mode for preventing a dissolution would be for the majority to render unquestioning accord to the wishes of the minority; no matter how small that minority, or unreasonable its exactions. In this case, the libellant is not the owner of a half of the vessel. He represents a minority in value. And the examination now made satisfies me that he is not entitled to a decree for a sale on the ground of disagreement with the other part owners as to the best mode of employing the vessel owned by them in common."

The interpretation put by certain of the state courts upon these cases, which interpretation is of course relied upon by respondents here, is that the admiralty court is without jurisdiction. In other words, that it has no power to decree a sale at the instance of the disaffected minority owners. Yet in every one of these federal cases it is to be noted that the court entertains jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, and, regardless of the language employed, the judgments in each case were judgments upon the merits, denying the particular remedy sought. And it must at once strike one as strange, if the courts of admiralty did not possess jurisdiction to do the thing which was sought, that they would not promptly have sent the cases out of court upon that specific ground. The fact that in every instance the district court did retain the cases did hear them, and did decide on the merits, against the positions of the minority owners, is most persuasive to the effect that by their language those judges did not mean to say that their courts had no jurisdiction, but that having jurisdiction they would not exercise it to grant the remedy or relief prayed for.

Certain of the state courts, as has been said, have taken the contrary view, and it is proper now to consider those decisions. Andrews v. Betts, 8 Hun (N. Y.) 322, was an action very similar to the one at bar. The vessel was owned in unequal proportions by different persons. They could not agree upon a sale, or upon the employment of it. One of these minority owners brought his action in equity to procure the appointment of a receiver, a sale of the vessel, and a division of the proceeds of the sale in proportion to the respective ownerships. The Supreme Court of New York entertained the action first, upon the ground that admiralty had no jurisdiction to act in such a case at the instance of a minority owner, and Boardman, J., delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"I can see no reason why admiralty courts ought not to possess and exercise jurisdiction to order a sale in case of disagreement between owners, irrespective of their shares. Such a power, exercised in the discretion of the court, could scarcely fail to subserve the interests of the well disposed owners, and defeat the malice or stupidity of the evil disposed owners."

For a second ground the court took the view that even though admiralty had jurisdiction, there was still concurrent jurisdiction in the state court, owing to the saving clause of the Judiciary Act (section 563, subd. 8, U. S. Revenue Laws), which saves "to suitors in all cases the right of a common-law remedy where the common law is competent to give it." Benedict in the passage from his learned work on Admiralty above quoted, with the support of numerous federal decisions, points out that this reservation is, as it expresses, a saving of a right to a common-law remedy which of course is essentially a distinct relief from an equitable remedy, and in especial the saving clause had reference to the common-law remedies in actions in personam as distinct from admiralty procedure, where, in so many instances, the vessel itself is personified and libel brought against the vessel, without regard to its ownership, and therein he further points out that no state can confer jurisdiction upon its courts to proceed in rem, nor to enforce in the state courts any liens which come within admiralty jurisdiction. Of course, the New York action, no more than this sought to exercise a common-law remedy. To the contrary, the common law afforded no relief to tenants in common in disputes and disagreements such as here presented. This is most lucidly pointed out by Mr. Freeman (Cotenancy [2d Ed.] § 389 et seq.), where, after discussing the refusal of the common law to aid tenants in common in their efforts to recover possession or to partition chattels, he declares, speaking now of the distinction between chattels in ordinary and ships:

"They (shipowners) may disagree either in reference to what employment is most advantageous, or in reference to the advisability of seeking any employment whatever. In either case, the law has provided remedies calculated to preserve the rights and promote the interests of all the owners, and also to minister to the general interests and promote the general welfare of the public. These remedies are not, however, to be found in the courts of the common law, nor in the tribunals charged with the administration of the principles of equity jurisprudence. Parsons on Partnership, 558; Castelli v. Cook, 7 Hare, 89. They must be sought in the courts of admiralty."

Hence, if this view be correct, a court of equity, though competent, is not empowered to give relief when such a disagreement amongst the owners shall arise. These equitable remedies are not those which are saved to suitors by virtue of the federal Judiciary Act. Indeed, it is well understood why this is so, since the controversy was wholly between the judges of the common-law courts and of the admiralty courts, and took the form of a very active effort upon the part of the latter to destroy entirely by the writ of prohibition the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts. Nor, as the learned expound, was this done out of any jealous regard for the rights of the people, nor for the superiority of the common-law system over admiralty jurisprudence, which latter was based upon the more liberal doctrines of the civil law. But it did have its origin and it owed its existence to a very much more unworthy motive, which was the desire of the common-law judges to increase the emoluments of their offices by fees, fines, and forfeitures, which were withheld from them under the admiralty jurisdiction. Therefore we must conclude, so far as the New York case is concerned, that if sound at all it is sound as being based upon the proposition that the district courts in admiralty are without jurisdiction of such a controversy. The next case is Swain v. Knapp, 32 Minn. 429, 21 N. W. 414, where the owner of one-third of a steamboat sued in the state court for an accounting, being apprehensive of loss from the nature of the majority owners' use of the boat, and in his accounting sought a receiver and a sale of the vessel. There the court fairly faced and fairly decided the question whether or not the remedy sought was one of the reserved common-law remedies saying:

"The defendant is unquestionably right in his position that this saving is of a common-law remedy, and not merely of a remedy in a common-law court (The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. 411 [18 L. Ed. 397]; Spear, Fed. Jud. 81), and that the remedies sought in this action are not common-law remedies."

But it reasoned to its satisfaction that since "the remedies sought in this action are not afforded in admiralty, then the subject-matter of the action is not within admiralty jurisdiction." The third of these cases is Reynolds v. Nielson, 116 Wis. 483, 93 N. W. 455, 96 Am. St. Rep. 1000. That case rests for its authority upon Andrews v. Betts, which has here been considered, and upon the text of Knapp on Partition, p. 491. That author, conceding that "proceedings for partition of personal property are unknown at common law," proceeds to say that it is doubtful whether admiralty courts can exercise jurisdiction to decree a sale in a case where a vessel is owned in unequal proportions by several persons, but "if the admiralty courts have such jurisdiction in cases where there are unequal interests, it is not an exclusive jurisdiction to that court, but concurrent with that of the common-law courts. The court of equity has jurisdiction over an action, brought to secure a partition of personal property between tenants in common thereof. It matters not whether such property is a vessel to be used, upon the high sea, or other personal property, so long as there is a cotenancy, and a failure to agree upon the part of the cotenants, a court of equity has jurisdiction over the partition, of the property, or a sale thereof and a division of the proceeds." This learned author bases his text upon the cases of Andrew v. Betts, supra, and Smith et al. v. Smith, 4 Rand. (Va.) 95, the latter being simply a case of partition in equity between tenants in common owning negro slaves; and Tripp v. Riley, 15 Barb. (N. Y.) 333, where partition in equity was decreed in the case of grain owned by tenants in common, and Fobes v. Shattuck, 22 Barb. (N. Y.) 568, which was a case of identical nature touching the partition of grain. But of course upon such a question the weight to be given to the text is no more than is justified by the decisions cited in its support, and it is manifest that these decisions (excepting the first) have not the slightest bearing upon the particular question here before us. For the reasons pointed out the state decisions are far from being satisfactory, much less determinative. Nor, so far as investigation goes, are those cases elsewhere given any force as authority. Indeed, we may find in the early volumes of our own reports a declaration equally unsatisfactory and unsound, to the effect that:

"The judicial power of the courts of the United States in admiralty and maritime cases is not exclusive, and the states have the power to confer that jurisdiction to its fullest extent upon their own courts." Taylor v. Steamer Columbia, 5 Cal. 268.

The Alcalde (D. C.) 132 Fed. 577, is the only other federal case which respondents call to their aid upon this proposition. In that case differences had arisen between the owners, and an action was brought in the state court and a receiver was appointed. Another phase of the litigation was brought in the district court in admiralty—a libel in rem for money advanced. Incidentally there arose a consideration of the action of the state court and upon this the learned federal judge declared:

"Whether the receiver had legal authority to take the vessel out of the captain's custody is a serious question, which I will avoid by assuming that Captain White [still] continued to be master."

With this review we may return again to the main consideration. The jealousy of the English common-law courts and their attacks upon the jurisdiction of the admiralty courts have been referred to. That jealousy took the form of denying to admiralty the power to decree any sale. Thus in Ouston v. Hebdon (1745), 1 Wills, 101, Chief Justice Lee of the Court of Kings Bench, declared:

"Indeed, the admiralty has no jurisdiction to compel a sale, and if they should do that, you might have a prohibition after sentence; or we may grant a prohibition against selling, or compelling the party to sell or to buy the shares of others."

Here was an express denial by the common-law courts of this admiralty jurisdiction, accompanied by a threat of the use of prohibition, even in a case where it did not appear that admiralty proposed to order a sale. But, as has been said, the jurisdiction of the American courts in admiralty is not limited to the jurisdiction of the English admiralty courts, and even in England complete jurisdiction over the matter of sale has been conferred upon the admiralty court by St. 3 and 4 Victoria, c. 65, § 4, and by the Admiralty Court Act of 1861, the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty being transferred to the High Court of Justice.

I take it to be unquestioned that our greatest authority upon American admiralty and maritime law is Justice Joseph Story, whose learned opinions when on the supreme bench of the United States did so much to elucidate, clarify, and settle the disputes. Upon this question he thus speaks, and his words are worthy of quotation in extenso:

"Malyne evidently supposes that the general maritime law authorizes a sale to be made by the proper court of admiralty in all cases, where, by reason of the disagreement of the part owners, the ship cannot be employed, whether there be an equality in the dissenting interests, or not. Molloy adopts the same opinion; and it has apparently the support of others of the old English maritime writers, as a generally recognized practical rule. The Consolato del Mare seems to uphold the doctrine that, at least after the first voyage of a ship, which is owned by the master and other persons, the part owners may compel a sale of the ship, in case of a disagreement between them. The law of Scotland gives a right, as it should seem, in all cases to the dissenting partners, to offer their shares for sale to the other owners at a particular price; and, if this offer is not accepted, then to require a judicial sale to be made of the ship, and the proceeds to be divided among them.

"It has also been generally supposed that, according to the common law of England, in no case whatsoever of a disagreement of the part owners, as to the employment of the ship upon any particular voyage, does there exist any jurisdiction in the Court of Admiralty (and, if that court has it not, no other court has), to order a sale thereof, whether the ship be owned in equal, or in unequal, shares. It is true that the terms of the commissions, granted to the judges of that court, include jurisdiction of all matters which concern owners and proprietors of ships as such. But this jurisdiction of the courts of admiralty has been exercised for the last two centuries in England, if one may say so, in vinculis, in consequence of the severe penalties imposed upon the judges by statute, if they should happen unintentionally to exceed their true jurisdiction, and the open hostility and prohibitory interference of the courts of common law. The commissions have thus become practically much narrowed in the import of their terms by the construction of these latter courts. It was positively, although incidentally, asserted by Lord Chief Justice Lee, in a case in the King's Bench, in the Reign of George the Second, that the court of admiralty has no authority to compel a sale in any case of disagreement whatever between part owners. If this doctrine be in reality established in the common law of England, it is a reproach both to its equity and its justice, for it leaves the part owners of ships without any remedy whatsoever, in cases where irreparable injuries may arise from an inequality of division in interests and opinions, without any fault or wrong on either side. Upon what ground it has been asserted it is difficult to perceive. It certainly has no support in the positive maritime law of other countries, or in the ancient principles of maritime jurisprudence. All these point the other way. The admiralty courts of England have never of themselves adopted any such limited doctrine, but have always contended for the exercise of the full jurisdiction as rightful, although they have been practically compelled to surrender it under the imposing authority of the court of common law. * * * The right to order a sale of property, subjected to its jurisdiction, is clearly a matter within the competency of a court of admiralty, and, indeed, is familiar in practice, in order to prevent irreparable mischiefs or impending losses. Analogy, therefore, is clearly in its favor; and unless some limitation or exception can be asserted to exist, either in the origin, or Constitution, or practice of the court itself, it will not be a very satisfactory mode of disposing of the question, for a court of common law to assert upon its own mere dictum, without any reasoning in support of it, that the court of admiralty has a right, in cases of disputes between part owners of ships, to take a stipulation, but not to order a sale. Such language would seem more like an edict than a judgment, and promulgate an arbitrary distinction, rather than a rational interpretation of the jurisdiction of another court." Story on Partnership, p. 611 et seq.

This concludes a review of the subject-matter, necessarily hasty and imperfect, but from it it would seem that but one conclusion can be drawn, and that is that, unhampered by the restriction which the common-law courts placed upon English admiralty jurisdiction, the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States in admiralty is full and complete touching the matter of sale under the circumstances here indicated, that is to say, where dissentient owners are at strife over the use to be made of the ship, for it must, from the nature of admiralty jurisdiction, be a fundamental part of that jurisdiction to exercise control over the rem—the ship itself. Admiralty draws and may draw as well upon equitable principles as upon state statutes for the administration of its jurisdiction. But it does so as those principles and statutes appeal to it, and not by force of any compulsion other than the authority vested in Congress to make laws upon the subject-matter. Admiralty, then, has jurisdiction to decree a sale of a vessel under all circumstances like those here presented. If admiralty refuses to decree the sale it is not because of a lack of power so to do, but because the sale under the indicated circumstances would be contrary to another paramount principle of admiralty jurisdiction—the right of control in the majority. We have endeavored to be careful to limit this discussion to the facts of the case, and of course everything that has been said has been said in reference to those facts exclusively. No question here arises over the jurisdiction of equity, for example, to enforce a contract for sale or to decree an accounting as such. But we hold that the power of a state court does not go to the length here exercised, of appointing a receiver and decreeing a sale because of the differences over the management of the vessel which have sprung up between the legal owners of that vessel. The state court is entitled to retain jurisdiction of the action in so far as it addresses itself to the equitable consideration of settling accounts. But further than that it may not go. If, however, we are mistaken in our conclusion, we are happy in the thought that now at length either suitor may have this question determined with finality by the federal courts, where its determination properly belongs.

The order appointing a receiver is therefore reversed.

et al. (S. F. 6959.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1916.)

1. CONTINUANCE ⇨51(4)—SECOND CONTINUANCE—DISCRETION TO REFUSE.

Where suit to establish that title to land of a defendant was in trust for plaintiffs, set for trial October 9th, was continued by consent until November 1st, although defendant desired speedy trial, claiming the suit interfered with disposition of the land, and counsel were advised by defendant's counsel that no further continuance would be consented to, it was not abuse of discretion to refuse continuance on November 1st because of absence of plaintiff, where affidavits of plaintiff and his attorney showed that he was notified the day before in time to have taken a train that would have brought him to place of trial that day, but chose to go to his ranch with machinists to oversee their fixing broken machinery.

2. TRIAL ⇨6(3)—NOTICE OF TRIAL—EFFECT OF CONTINUANCE.

Where defendant, consenting to a continuance to a certain day, clearly states that plaintiff must then be ready for trial, there is no necessity of giving formal notice under Code Civ. Proc. § 594, providing that either party may bring an issue of fact to trial upon five days' notice.

3. CONTINUANCE ⇨19—GROUNDS—UNAVOIDABLE ABSENCE OF PLAINTIFF.

Even an unavoidable absence of plaintiff does not necessarily compel a court to grant a continuance.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by Daniel J. Canty and another against Pierce & Anderson and another. From judgment for defendants plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

E. A. Williams and C. E. Beaumont, both of Fresno, for appellants. Everts & Ewing and R. Retallick, all of Fresno, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. [1] Plaintiffs brought their action to have it decreed that the defendant Hayden Jones held title to certain real property in trust for them, and to compel Jones either to convey the property to them, or to pay them the value of it, fixed in the sum of $1,066. The court proceeded with the trial of the action over the objection of the plaintiffs' attorneys, which objection was accompanied by their motion for a continuance, and gave judgment for the defendants. Plaintiffs' appeal urges only the abuse of the court's discretion in denying their motion for a continuance. The following matters appear from the affidavit: The cause had been set for trial on the 9th day of October, 1913. The original attorneys of plaintiffs had withdrawn from the case, and E. A. Williams and C. E. Beaumont had been substituted in their place. Because of their unfamiliarity with the case they sought a continuance of it. The defendant Jones was desirous of having the case speedily tried and determined for the reason that it interfered with the disposition of the land, which he contended he owned unburdened with any trust or valid claim of plaintiffs. By consent the trial of the cause was continued until November 1st. Plaintiff Daniel Canty was in town and at the offices of his attorneys on and after the 9th day of October, upon which date the case was thus continued for trial until the 1st day of November. Negotiations for a compromise were under way between the attorneys, but came to nothing. Plaintiffs' attorneys were told by defendants' attorneys that their client would consent to no further continuances, and that if the negotiations proved abortive, they must be ready for trial upon the date set. They replied that they were as desirous of going to trial as the defendants could possibly be. Upon November 1st defendants appeared at the time and place set for trial. Plaintiffs were represented by their attorneys, who sought further continuance upon the ground that they had not been able to secure the presence of plaintiff Daniel Canty. The affidavit of C. E. Beaumont, one of the attorneys for plaintiffs, offered upon support of the motion for a continuance, is to the following effect: He was employed in the case a few days prior to October 9th; that—

"at the request of affiant and said E. A. Williams (his associate) the date for the trial of said cause was continued until November 1st; that he did not advise his clients of the continuance because negotiations for settlement were pending; that when he found no settlement could be made, he saw his client, Daniel Canty, on the streets of Fresno and told him he desired him to come to his office so that preparation could be made for the trial, but that he did not, at that time, state to his client the date for which the trial had been set. His client stated that he would come to his office. Thereafter he was called to the city of Los Angeles and was absent for four days, returning to his office on October 22d. He was informed that Canty had been in his office during his absence. Thereafter he tried to get into communication with Canty by calling up his telephone number, but obtained no answer. On the 27th of October he wrote a letter addressed to Canty, telling him that the action was set for trial on November 1st. Finally, on the 31st of October, he succeeded in getting into communication with Canty at Burrell, Cal. He told Canty that his case was set for trial at 10 o'clock the following morning, and Canty replied that his automobile had broken down, and that it would be impossible for him to get to Fresno the following day."

Canty's affidavit is to the effect that he received this notification at the time he was passing through Burrell with machinists going to his ranch 40 miles west of Fresno to fix broken machinery, and that it was necessary for him to be with them, as he alone could indicate to the machinists the work to be done. There was, however, a train passing through Burrell about 5 o'clock in the afternoon going to Fresno, which train would have taken plaintiff to the office of his attorney very early in the evening of the same day. He could have caught that train, but did not have time to go to his ranch with the machinists and return and catch it. Therefore he went to his ranch. He says, also, that it was necessary for him to have in attendance as a witness Mr. Barnhill, who lived in Los Angeles, and by whom he expected to prove that Jones "had admitted all of the facts upon which said action is based." Touching the Barnhill matter, the opposing affidavit of J. G. Retallick, an attorney at law, is to the effect that plaintiff had told him that Barnhill was an attorney, and that he hoped to secure his services as his own attorney, but that Barnhill could not take the employment during the present year, and therefore he did not expect him to be present at the trial, and that in this conversation there was no suggestion even that Barnhill's presence was desired as a witness.

[2,3] Under these facts but slight consideration of the law is necessary. Mr. Beaumont's affidavit shows that he knew long in advance that the case was in fact set for trial on November 1st. With this knowledge there was no necessity for giving any formal notice such as is contemplated by section 594, Code of Civil Procedure. See Sheldon v. Landwehr, 159 Cal. 778, 116 Pac. 44. Plaintiffs' attorneys were in no respect taken by surprise. They were fully advised of the desire of the defendants to proceed with the trial upon the day set and of the fact that no further continuance would be consented to. If they had not themselves made sufficient preparation for the trial, under these circumstances and with this time allowance, it was their own neglect. So also was it their own neglect if their client did not receive timely notice. He certainly did receive notice so that he could have been in Fresno, not only upon the morning of the trial, but upon the day preceding, but for personal reasons declined to avail himself of the opportunity. This was not an unavoidable absence on his part, and it is the rule that even an unavoidable absence does not necessarily compel a court to grant a continuance. Lynch v. Superior Court, 150 Cal. 123, 88 Pac. 708.

There is nothing in this case to show that the discretion of the court in refusing the continuance was abused.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

BURR v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 6949.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1916.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐1099(7)—REVERSAL—SECOND APPEAL.

Where the evidence on second trial after appeal is identical with that on the first trial, and in view of the presumption in favor of the law of the case the appellate court, having on the first appeal held the evidence sufficient, will not reverse for insufficiency of evidence on the second appeal.

2. STREET RAILROADS ⇐114(6)—OPERATION—NEGLIGENCE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to show that the automobile in which plaintiff was injured was stalled on a crossing through its negligent construction by defendant street railroad and in full view of motorman of approaching car.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Street Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 245; Dec. Dig. ⇐114(6).]

3. STREET RAILROADS ⇐86(1) — CONSTRUCTION AND MAINTENANCE—CARE REQUIRED—NOTICE.

A street railway is charged with notice of defective condition of a temporary crosswalk over its tracks, which condition it has itself created.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Percy L. Burr against the United Railroads of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott, of San Francisco (Wm. M. Cannon and Kingsley Cannon, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. William P. Hubbard, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is a second appeal. The first will be found reported in 163 Cal. 603, 126 Pac. 873. The first appeal was taken from the judgment following the trial court's order of nonsuit. The nonsuit was granted upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to establish any negligence or culpability on the part of the defendant. This court, succinctly stating the substance of the evidence, held that it was sufficient to demand that the case be presented to the jury for its determination. Upon the second trial, a jury being waived, the judgment of the court was in favor of the plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

[1] Its principal contention upon appeal is that the evidence upon the second trial was in substantial respects different from the evidence presented upon the first trial, and that the evidence now before this court completely exonerates the defendant from the charge of negligence, and establishes that negligence, if negligence there were, was wholly that of the plaintiff. We are constrained to disagree with the view which the appellant takes of the evidence. It need not be repeated, but a careful reading of it discloses that it is in all respects as strong, and in some respects stronger, in favor of respondent than was the evidence received upon the first trial.

Appellant would have this court adopt the procedure of the Supreme Court of New York in the case of Gurrie v. N. Y. & N. S. Trac-tion Co., 151 App. Div. 57, 135 N. Y. Supp. 833, and reverse the case for the insufficiency of the evidence to establish the neglect of the defendant. True, it is, as appellant declares, that the facts in the New York case are very similar to those in the case at bar. But they are by no means identical in the first place, and in the second place, to do this would mean to overthrow the ruling upon the first appeal as to the sufficiency of the evidence, and this, even if the rule of the law of the case did not stand in the way, we are not disposed to do.

[2,3] Both plaintiff and defendant unite in upholding that the following statement of the governing principle, taken from Fujise v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 12 Cal. App. 207, 107 Pac. 317, is correct:

"It is incumbent upon the plaintiff to show that the circumstances were such that the motorman had an opportunity to become conscious of the facts giving rise to the duty, and a reasonable opportunity to perform it, before the railway can be held liable on the ground of negligence."

Accepting this, and indeed declaring it to be a succinct and accurate statement of the governing principle, there was enough in the facts established and in the reasonable inferences which the court was entitled to draw from those facts, to show, first, that the automobile was stalled because of the negligent condition in which the crossing was left by the defendant; that in endeavoring to cross, because of this defective condition, plaintiff's automobile was caught between the rails. His car was under control, but he was unable, because of the condition of the track, to extricate it from between the rails. The defendant's car approached down hill upon a slight curve and was visible at a distance of 500 feet. The headlight of plaintiff's automobile was facing the on-coming electric car. The electric car was blowing its whistle furiously. The only signal which the plaintiff could make was the "stop" signal given by raising and lowering his arms. This he repeatedly did. The motorman of the electric car apparently became aware of the position of the automobile, for he blew his whistle the more furiously. Nevertheless he continued on his course with such speed that he failed to stop his car in time to avoid striking the stalled automobile, which was still between the tracks. And finally it is to be noted that he struck it at or very near the temporary crosswalk, with the existence of which and with the knowledge of the condition of which, since that condition was of its own creation, defendant and its motorman were charged.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

CRANE v. STATE SAVINGS & COMMERCIAL BANK. (S. F. 6951.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING $\S$ 54(7)—INSOLVENCY—CLAIMS OF TRUSTEES.

Where an interloper became trustee of an insolvent bank whose affairs were taken over by the state bank commissioner and by various manipulations secured control of the concern and prosecuted various actions to remove it from the control of the bank commissioner, he could not have compensation for his alleged services in such actions; his purpose evidently being to loot the corporation and defraud its creditors and stockholders.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by Arthur Crane against the State Savings & Commercial Bank. From an order refusing to fix compensation of plaintiff as trustee for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed, and judgment for damages for frivolous appeal awarded.

Arthur Crane, of San Francisco, in pro per. State Savings & Commercial Bank, in pro per. A. A. De Ligne, of Sacramento, for William R. Williams, State Superintendent of Banks.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from the order of the court refusing to fix the compensation of appellant, appointed "director and trustee of the State Savings & Commercial Bank, the defendant corporation, and with authority to pay the state license tax now due."

To an understanding of the controversy the following facts are pertinent and indeed necessary: The State Savings & Commercial Bank, a California banking corporation, had become so financially involved that, under the authority of the California Banking Act as it then existed, upon July 17, 1909, Aiden Anderson, superintendent of banks, took possession of the property of the bank. That banking law gave the banking corporation or other person interested 10 days' time within which to contest the possession of the superintendent of banks, and this contest was never instituted. But upon the 5th day of November, 1909, this appellant instituted an action in his own name against this bank, whose assets and affairs then were and ever since have remained in the possession and under the control of the superintendent of banks and his successor, the bank commissioner, and against certain other defendants called stockholders. In this complaint he asserts that on January 18, 1909, he became a stockholder of the corporation by the purchase of 2 shares of its stock. He alleges that he is the only stockholder, and that none of the defendants are stockholders; thus owning all of the stock of the corporation he is in equity the sole owner of the corporation. He alleges that the directors and trustees of the corporation were so actively engaged in dissipating and wasting the assets of the corporation that if the superintendent of banks "had not taken possession of said estate from the said usurping directors and trustees of the said defendant corporation it would all have been wasted and dissipated." He next asserts that the total value of the remaining assets of the defendant corporation is the sum of $68,510.64, and that the total liabilities of the corporation amount to the sum of $134,334.59, and that there is thus left sufficient "to pay all creditors in the neighborhood of 50 per cent. of their respective claims." He alleges that there are no directors or trustees of the corporation; that the corporation has failed to pay its license tax and is insolvent and has ceased to do business as a corporation, and prayed judgment "that the plaintiff is the sole beneficial stockholder of the said corporation; that plaintiff be appointed the sole trustee of the defendant corporation," and for general relief. Upon this complaint he secured ex parte an order of the superior court appointing him, as above indicated, "director and trustee of the State Savings & Commercial Bank, the defendant corporation, with authority to pay the state license tax now due, pending the trial or other conclusion of the above-entitled cause, or further order of this court." Thereupon, as appears from the report of this trustee, he, by virtue and authority of this order, accepted the "resignations and abandonments" of all other directors and trustees saving himself. He then transferred to Frank L. Tainter one share of stock, and to John H. Dixon another share of stock, and then appointed Frank L. Tainter and John H. Dixon to be with him the directors of the bank, further appointing Frank L. Tainter secretary of the corporation. Thereafter, at a "special meeting of the board of directors," appellant presented two transfers, one from M. D. Rainbow to himself for 10 shares of the stock of the corporation, and another from Eliza J. Lyman to himself for 5 shares, and he caused these old certificates to be canceled and new certificates to be issued to him as the owner of 15 shares. It is of course not explained how there could be 15 or 16 valid outstanding shares in contemplation of the complaint in which plaintiff asserted under oath that he was the sole stockholder and owned but 2 shares. However, he then proceeded to levy an assessment of $10 per share, immediately paying this assessment upon 16 shares, while "director Frank L. Tainter paid to himself as secretary the sum of $10, and director John H. Dixon paid the sum of $10 to the secretary as his assessment. Total received $180." It was then resolved to "take $110 out of the funds in the secretary's hands to pay the state license tax." Later, upon the strength of this assessment, a delinquent list was published, the stock offered for sale, and "no bids being obtainable, each of the said certificates and amounts was bid in for the corporation by Arthur Crane, trustee and president." The affairs of the corporation being in this condition, the defendant bank of which appellant was thus trustee and president, and Frank L. Tainter trustee and secretary, filed its answer to Crane's action, which answer was verified by Tainter. It denied certain of the allegations of Crane's complaint. Thus it denied that if Anderson "had not taken possession of the assets on the 17th day of July all or any of them would have been wasted." It denied that there was only left of the estate sufficient to pay the creditors 50 cents on the dollar, and averred that the assets were $130,000 and the liabilities only $104,000, denied that the corporation is insolvent, and denied that it had failed to pay its license tax or had ceased to do business as a corporation. The answer then proceeded to set up the assessment of which we have spoken, and once more averred that:

"The only outstanding shares of stock in the defendant corporation are 18, on which the said assessment was paid, and which stand in the names, to wit, of Arthur Crane, 17 shares; of Frank L. Tainter, 1 share."

Thereafter, on June 3, 1911, Crane filed a stipulation in the action, declaring that "every allegation contained in the answer of the defendant, the State Savings & Commercial Bank, is true," and stipulating "that judgment may be rendered in accordance therewith." On June 5th, two days thereafter, the trial court made so-called findings of fact that all the allegations contained in the answer were true; that the corporation has "duly and regularly levied an assessment of $10 per share on its capital stock, and that the only valid outstanding shares of stock are 18," of which Crane owns 17 and Tainter one. The judgment declares that each party shall pay his and its own costs; and:

"(2) Pending further order of the court, said plaintiff, Arthur Crane, shall continue to act as trustee under the direction of the court, and under the supervision of the said stockholders. (3) The remuneration of the said trustee may hereafter be fixed by the court on notice and hearing duly given."

On January 24, 1914, this appellant moved the court to fix his fees "for his services as such trustee, including services as attorney, to and including December 1, 1913." The State Savings & Commercial Bank, by Tainter, its secretary, promptly stipulated that Crane's motion should be granted and his remuneration fixed at $2,000, which was the amount Crane himself sought. In the matter of services he made affidavit that he had instituted three actions, one in the circuit court of the United States, and two in the superior court of the state, for the purpose of testing the constitutionality of the seizure of the assets of the State Savings & Commercial Bank. He further stated that:

"Notwithstanding he used due diligence and extreme care in all said legal work, his action in the circuit court was dismissed and the two actions in the superior court of the state of California were decided adversely to him."

He instituted an appeal to the Supreme Court of the state of California and briefed and argued the cause there, and again losing his case secured a writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States. At the time of the hearing of this motion the Supreme Court of the United States had not acted upon the writ of error, though it has since done so, and again the decision is adverse to this appellant. State Sav. Bank, etc., v. Anderson, 165 Cal. 437, 132 Pac. 755, L. R. A. 1915E, 675; State Sav. Bank, etc., v. Anderson, 238 U. S. 611, 35 Sup. Ct. 792, 59 L. Ed. 1488. Upon the hearing of the motion the court denied it, "without prejudice to its being renewed if and when the appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, referred to in the affidavit on file, is won by appellant therein." This last is the order from which the present appeal is taken.

[1] What then is the case presented? It is an audacious, indeed a brazen, effort by an interloper into the affairs of an insolvent corporation to loot that corporation of some of the moneys due to its creditors. And what is the position of this appellant? Accepting at their face value every statement which he makes, and waiving the obvious inconsistency and falsity of some of them, as where in the one place he asserts that there are but 2 valid outstanding shares of the stock of the corporation and that he owns them both, and in the other that there are 18 shares, of which he owns 17, or that the corporation is wholly insolvent and can pay but 50 cents on the dollar to its creditors, while elsewhere, and manifestly for the purpose of despoiling it, he alleges that it has $25,000 of assets above all its liabilities, waiving, we repeat, these and like considerations, passing by the fact, which must certainly be true, that the orders and judgment which the court made were unwittingly and improvidently made, being presented ex parte, and treating this appellant, as he asserts himself to be, the owner of this corporation, what, then, looking through form to substance, is the case presented? The corporation is unquestionably in insolvency and in process of liquidation. Without regard to the inutility of the services which he rendered to this corporation in the useless litigation which he prosecuted, the fact remains that under his own statement it was litigation prosecuted for his own benefit, and in its last analysis it is but the case of an insolvent whose assets are in the hands of a commissioner in bankruptcy prosecuting, outside of the bankruptcy court, valueless litigation seeking to take those assets away from the control of the bankruptcy court and asking remuneration for his abortive efforts from the assets in the control of the bankruptcy court. There was no occasion, therefore, for the trial court to have made a conditional order touching the receiver's compensation. It would have been a perfectly appropriate order, under the circumstances, for the court to have declared that whatever compensation this trustee believed himself entitled to he could pay to himself out of his own personal assets, but could take no dollar of it from the assets of the insolvent bank.

[2] In conclusion, this court has noted that this appellant has prosecuted numerous appeals to it, either in his own name, or in the name of one Alice Aalwyn, or in the name of the Aalwyn's Law Institute. For the most part these appeals have been of the most frivolous and foundationless character. A certain indulgence will be shown by every court to honest ignorance. But the time has passed when this court can consider that these appeals are prosecuted through an ignorance that is honest. We cannot control the pernicious activities of this appellant in the trial courts. We can, however, measurably control them in the matter of appeals to this court which he takes for harassment, vexation, and delay. The time has come when it is the manifest duty of this court to do this thing.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed, and there is imposed upon the plaintiff, Arthur Crane, a judgment of $250 damages for a frivolous appeal, which judgment is forthwith collectible by execution at the instance of A. A. De Ligne, for and on behalf of the respondent herein, and, when collected, will be added to the assets of the insolvent bank in the hands of the superintendent of banks for the benefit of the creditors thereof.

COBE v. CRANE et al. (BECKER, Intervener). (S. F. 6964.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1916. Rehearing Denied Aug. 24, 1916.)

1. JUDGMENT ⇨624—BAR OF CAUSES OF ACTION—PLEA IN ABATEMENT—DEMURRER.

Where a second action was not between the same parties as a first, and the parties did not occupy the same relative positions as plaintiff and defendant, demurrer to the plea in abatement grounded on judgment in the first action was properly sustained.

2. PLEADING ⇨259—PLEA IN ABATEMENT—AMENDMENT.

Where a second action was not between the same parties as a first, and they did not occupy the same relative positions as plaintiff and defendant, the court properly refused to permit a defendant to amend another defendant's so-called plea in abatement grounded on the first action, under his statement that he was "able to amend the said plea in abatement and state facts sufficient to constitute a plea in abatement to said action."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 783-792; Dec. Dig. ⇨259.]

3. QUIETING TITLE ⇨12(1)—POSSESSION.

The owner of land does not have to be in possession to enable him to maintain his action to quiet title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. § 8; Dec. Dig. ⇨12(1).]

4. DEPOSITIONS ⇨8—RIGHT TO COMMISSION—CONTINUANCE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 595, providing that defendants are not entitled to postponement of trial for taking testimony of a party, except on a showing of the materiality of the evidence expected to be obtained, and that due diligence has been used to procure it, in suit to quiet title, defendant in his pleadings having asserted that plaintiff was a mythical person, and making no showing of merit by his affidavit or any claim that plaintiff's testimony was necessary and material to defendants, the court properly refused to order a commission to take plaintiff's testimony, application for which was made, noticed and heard the day after that set for trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Depositions, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 10; Dec. Dig. ⇨8.]

5. JURY ⇨14(9)—JURY TRIAL — QUIETING TITLE.

In suit to quiet title by a plaintiff in possession, the judgment making no mention of possession, defendants were not entitled to a jury trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 75; Dec. Dig. ⇨14(9).]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Ira M. Cobe against Arthur Crane and others, wherein defendant Crane filed a cross-complaint against the Market Street Bank and others, and Adam Becker sought to intervene. From a judgment for plaintiff and orders denying leave to file the complaint in intervention, etc., defendants and the intervener appeal. Judgment and orders affirmed, with damages imposed upon defendant Arthur Crane.

Arthur Crane, C. M. Jennings, and Paul T. Oliver, all of San Francisco, for appellants. P. L. Benjamin, of Oakland, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued Arthur Crane, Alice Aalwyn, and Aalwyn's Law Institute, to quiet title to certain described land. He charged the commencement by defendant Crane, in his own name and in the name of Alice Aalwyn, of actions without merit, designed to harass and vex him, to cloud the title to his land and interfere with the sale of it. He charged the Aalwyn's Law Institute to be a mere instrumentality of the defendant Arthur Crane for the accomplishment of this same end, and sought a decree quieting his title against these defendants and enjoining them from further prosecution of any action asserting or claiming any right, title, or interest in or to the land. Defendant Crane filed a pleading which he called a plea in abatement, answer, and cross-complaint. In the plea in abatement Alice Aalwyn declares that she had previously brought a suit against the above-named plaintiff, asserting ownership in fee in herself in the land, and seeking to quiet her title against this plaintiff; that all of the issues raised in the present action "could have been litigated and were litigated in said cause," and prior to the commencement of this action "judgment was ordered in said former action disposing of all of the issues as to the title of the property sought to be litigated in this action as between this defendant and said plaintiff." The pleader here is careful to refrain from stating in whose favor the judgment passed in that action. In fact the judgment passed in favor of the defendants, one of whom was the plaintiff in this action, after general demurrer sustained. The action of the trial court and its judgment have been upheld by this court. Alice Aalwyn, Plaintiff and Appellant, v. Ira M. Cobe et al., Defendants and Respondents, 168 Cal. 165, 142 Pac. 79. By her own statement to the foregoing effect, that all issues between herself and plaintiff had been litigated, she has eliminated herself from this case.

Adam Becker sought leave to intervene, his attorney in his proposed complaint in intervention being this defendant Arthur Crane, and his complaint in intervention, so far as can be determined from the records, naming as defendants the Market Street Bank, the Market Street Securities Company, Charles W. Smith, Frank B. Sylvester, S. W. Swabey, A. F. Martel, Lyon & Hoag, and 50 others sued as John Does. The plaintiff in the proposed complaint in intervention asserted that he was the owner and entitled to the possession "of an undivided aliquot part of the property," and then proceeded to set up somewhat incomprehensible averments of fraud and conspiracy, which so far as they are understandable appear to be precisely those which Alice Aalwyn attempted in vain to plead, as appears from the case last cited. Leave to file this complaint in intervention was denied, and properly so. Alpers v. Bliss, 145 Cal. 570, 79 Pac. 171; Clark v. Kelly, 163 Cal. 209, 124 Pac. 846.

[1, 2] Defendant's answer seems to treat this cross-complaint as an existing pleading in the cause, for the second answer is entitled "Separate Answer and Defense and for Cross-Complaint against Said Plaintiff and against Said Defendants to Cross-Complaint." So far as the answer is concerned it consists of denials of the material averments of the complaint, not however denying the prosecution of all the litigation pleaded nor the adverse decisions rendered upon this litigation, but pleading merely that it was not prosecuted in bad faith nor for the purpose of harassment. There is in this no paragraph alleging any affirmative matter, far less setting up any cross-complaint. The third defense is also pleaded as an "answer and defense for cross-complaint." This pleading again treats all of the defendants implicated in Becker's cross-complaint in intervention as parties defendant to the existing action, which of course they were not. Aside from this, the material averments are that:

"Said defendant Arthur Crane is the owner and holder of five bonds of $100 and one bond of $50 of the issue of bonds hereinafter referred to. That said bonds are a valid lien and charge upon the real property described in the complaint."

Nothing follows to show the nature of the bonds nor how nor when nor where they came to exist, or, if existent, became a lien upon the property. In this condition of the pleadings the court properly sustained the demurrer to Alice Aalwyn's plea in abatement. It did not constitute such a plea. This action was not only not between the same parties, but the parties did not occupy the same relative positions as plaintiff and defendant. Ayres v. Bensley, 32 Cal. 630; Walsworth v. Johnson, 41 Cal. 63; Helfrich v. Romer, 16 Cal. App. 436, 118 Pac. 458. And these uncontroverted facts likewise justified the court's refusal to permit the defendant Arthur Crane to amend the so-called plea in abatement under his statement that he was "able to amend the said plea in abatement and state facts sufficient to constitute a plea in abatement to said action," since, for the reasons given, manifestly he could not do this thing.

[3] Plaintiff's complaint was in the ordinary and usual form to quiet title, to which was added the allegations of the excessive and unwarranted litigation brought and prosecuted by Arthur Crane for purposes of harassment. We are told by appellants that "it is fatally deficient in that it does not state any possession or right of possession." The owner of land does not have to be in possession to enable him to maintain his action to quiet title. People v. Center, 66 Cal. 555, 5 Pac. 263, 6 Pac. 481; Brusie v. Gates, 80 Cal. 463, 22 Pac. 284; Casey v. Leggett, 125 Cal. 672, 58 Pac. 264; Reiner v. Schroeder, 146 Cal. 416, 80 Pac. 517. Of the cases which appellants cite, one (Ferris v. Irving, 28 Cal. 645) was an action brought under the old Practice Act, which especially provided that the action to quiet title could be brought only by a party in possession. Such of course is not the present law. The other (Cutler v. Fitzgibbons, 148 Cal. 562, 83 Pac. 1075) contains nothing that bears on the question.

[4] The court refused to order a commission to take the testimony of plaintiff. To have granted the order would have worked an unreasonable delay in the case. Defendants were served with summons on September 4, 1912, and the action was set for trial on February 20, 1913. Upon the affidavit of Crane the application was made, noticed for, and heard on the following day. Besides the fact that defendant Crane had repeatedly in his pleadings asserted that Cobe was a mythical person, besides the absence of any showing of diligence, there was an absence in Crane's affidavit of any showing of merit or of any statement or claim that the testimony of Cobe was necessary or material to the defendants in the trial of the case. This roving commission for the taking of the deposition of a plaintiff, whose whereabouts the defendants did not even seek to show, would have necessitated a continuance of the case, and that postponement the defendants were not entitled to, excepting after a showing of "the materiality of the evidence expected to be obtained, and that due diligence had been used to procure it." Code Civ. Proc. § 595.

Defendants Crane and the Aalwyn's Law Institute objected to proceeding with the trial upon the ground that it was not at issue as to the defendant to the cross-complaint of A. F. Martel. There was no cross-complaint and Martel was not a party to the action.

[5] Appellants further complain that they were denied a trial by jury. Plaintiff's complaint was not that of a plaintiff out of possession seeking to recover possession. His action was one simply to quiet title. The evidence showed that plaintiff was in possession. The judgment makes no mention of possession. Of course defendants were not entitled to a jury trial under these circumstances. Angus v. Craven, 132 Cal. 691, 64 Pac. 1091. Appellants, however, assert that if such be the rule of decision in Angus v. Craven, it is in effect overruled by the later case of Haggin v. Kelly, 136 Cal. 481, 69 Pac. 140, approving the decision of Gillespie v. Gouly, 120 Cal. 516, 52 Pac. 816. Haggin v. Kelly declared that the action there under consideration was one at law—in form ejectment; that the essential allegations necessary to such an action are the estate of plaintiff, possession by defendants at the commencement of the action and their wrongful withholding, and, says the opinion:

"Even if regarded as an action under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, still plaintiffs were entitled to a jury." Gillespie v. Gouly, 120 Cal. 515, 52 Pac. 816."

Gillespie v. Gouly declares that in an action, though brought under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, if the plaintiff is out of possession and prosecutes his suit against the defendant claiming title and in possession and asks for a restitution of the premises, either party is entitled to a jury trial as matter of right. The inappositeness of these decisions is apparent, but the matter is aggravated by the circumstance that appellants' attorney falsely quotes a sentence as the language of one or the other of these decisions, which language is of course found in neither. The quotation is:

"In actions authorized by section 738 either party is entitled to jury trial as matter of right."

It would unduly and unnecessarily extend this opinion to make further mention of the contentions of these appellants. Some of them, as in the instance last cited, are based either upon gross ignorance of or a willful attempt to misrepresent the law.

We have recently had occasion to advert on the activities of the defendant Arthur Crane in the matter of litigation such as this. We need but refer to the case of Crane v. State Savings & Commercial Bank, S. F. No. 6951, 159 Pac. 585.

The judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed, with damages fixed in the sum of $200 imposed upon defendant Arthur Crane.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Benito County; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

Action by Isabelle M. Bonnell, Mary C. Osborne, and Kate Breen, against Thomas McLaughlin and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Peter A. Breen and Percy E. Towne, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Jean & Moore, of Hollister, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiffs, as devisees under the will of James McMahon, deceased, brought this action against the defendants to recover property, title to which vested in Thomas McLaughlin and Anna McLaughlin, his wife, under deed to them by James McMahon, plaintiffs' testate. They charge a forfeiture of the title in the McLaughlins for their breach of a condition subsequent contained in McMahon's deed to them. The other defendants are grantees of the McLaughlins of certain parts of the land conveyed in the McMahon deed. The complaint set up the McMahon conveyance in full, and the court sustained a general demurrer to the complaint, and from the judgment which followed this appeal has been taken.

The deed of McMahon to these defendants was, so far as is here important, in the following language:

For a money consideration expressed as being ten dollars, McMahon "does by these presents grant, bargain, sell, convey and confirm, unto the said parties of the second part, and to their heirs and assigns, forever, subject to the conditions herein named, all that certain lot, piece or parcel of land," etc. "This grant is made upon the express condition and limitation, that said second parties or either of them, shall not sell, hypothecate, mortgage, convey or alienate the whole or any portion of said premises during their natural lives but they may make testamentary disposition of the same. Together with all and singular the tenements, hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto belonging, or in any wise appertaining, and the reversion, and reversions, remainder and remainders, rents, issue and profits thereof. To have and to hold all and singular the said premises together with the appurtenances, unto the said parties of the second part, and to their heirs and assigns forever, subject to the limitation and conditions herein expressed."

The general demurrer was sustained by the court under the conviction that the condition subsequent contained a restriction repugnant to the grant itself, and of the soundness of its conclusion in this regard no doubt can be entertained. In this state it has been declared that where the granting clause in a deed purports to convey title in fee simple and is followed by a clause prohibiting the grantee from conveying without the consent of the grantor, the latter clause is repugnant to the interest created by the former, and, being in restraint of alienation, is void. Civ. Code, § 711; Murray v. Green, 64 Cal. 363, 28 Pac. 118. In Maynard v. Polhemus, 74 Cal. 141, 15 Pac. 451, the deed contained the proviso that if the grantee "should ever sell any of the vested property, it should be sold to the said De Peyster." Says this court:

"Construed as a covenant, it was merely personal, and not binding upon the heirs or assigns of Cooper."

As a condition "It is unreasonable, and contrary to the policy of the law, because in restraint of alienation." In Prey v. Stanley, 110 Cal. 423, 42 Pac. 908, the restriction was that the grantee should sell or convey no part of the land without the consent of W. H. Stanley. This restriction was not contained in the deed itself, but was in form a separate covenant, this court saying that the rule that conditions in restraint of alienation when repugnant to an interest created, are void (Civ. Code, § 711)—

"does not depend upon the mere form in which the restraint is imposed. It avoids, as well, covenants of the grantee against alienation as conditions of like nature imposed by the grantor; such covenants, if not within the letter of section 711 of the Civil Code, are yet obnoxious to the policy of which that section is a partial expression. Greenhood on Public Policy, 606, note 2 et seq.; Hunt v. Wright, 47 N. H. 400, 93 Am. Dec. 451, and cases cited. The parties to the contract of February 23, 1892, seem to have made the mistake of leaving the absolute title in Mrs. Stanley, and at the same time attempting to destroy an inseparable incident of such title."

As is pointed out in 24 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 868 et seq., and note to 2 In re Walkerly, 49 Am. St. Rep. 97, this rule is of well-nigh universal acceptance. In the latter it is said:

"Hence, if a deed or devise is attended with an express condition that the beneficiaries shall not sell or convey the property, no perpetuity is created, because the condition itself is void, and the fee and absolute power of disposition vest in him."

Further reference may be made to Ernst v. Shinkle, 95 Ky. 608, 26 S. W. 813; Pritchard v. Bailey, 113 N. C. 521, 18 S. E. 668; Camp v. Cleary, 76 Va. 140; Hardy v. Gallo-way, 111 N. C. 519, 15 S. E. 890, 32 Am. St. Rep. 828, and Wakefield v. Van Tassell, 202 Ill. 41, 66 N. E. 830, 65 L. R. A. 511, 95 Am. St. Rep. 207. Even in Kentucky, where the court of last resort has for a long time adopted a modified rule to the effect that the restraint will be upheld if it appear to the chancellor to be not unreasonable, it is recognized that the views of that court are against the great weight of authority, and indeed this is expressly declared in Lawson v. Lightfoot, 84 S. W. 739, in the following language:

"It must be conceded that the great weight of authority outside of Kentucky is to the effect that, where the fee-simple title to real estate passes under a deed or will, any restraint attempted to be imposed by the instrument upon its alienation by the grantee or devisee is to be treated as void; and such is clearly the rule announced by Mr. Gray in his excellent work on Restraints of Alienation. But the contrary view has been adopted by this court in repeated decisions."

No doubt can be entertained but that this limitation or restriction upon the power of alienation, which is so important a right of ownership where a fee simple is conveyed, does violence to the interest conveyed, and is therefore void.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

A contract to purchase realty on which payments have been made, being transferable, may be mortgaged, under Civ. Code, § 2947, permitting mortgage of any transferable interest in realty, and the mortgagee may therefore be an innocent purchaser, so that, under section 2243, making persons to whom property is transferred in violation of a trust involuntary trustees, unless they are innocent purchasers, no trust is created in him, though the property was transferred in violation of the trust.

2. MORTGAGES $\hookrightarrow$ 155—BONA FIDE PURCHASERS—CONSIDERATION—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Extension of time on a debt is sufficient consideration for a mortgage given to secure it, and the mortgagee may, therefore, be an innocent purchaser for value.

In the absence of proof of notice to the mortgagee of a trust as against the mortgagors, the court must give effect to the mortgage when it antedates of record the title acquired by a deed to another, since under Civ. Code, § 856, the incumbrancer's rights could not be prejudiced without notice.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Charles S. Tripler, trustee of the estate of Little & Walpert, Incorporated, in bankruptcy, against the MacDonald Lumber Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Judgment and order reversed.

Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco, for appellants. Henry A. Jacobs and Louis H. Brownstone, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff is the trustee in bankruptcy of Little & Walpert, a corporation. He sued to quiet title to certain real property in the county of San Mateo. MacDonald Lumber Company (a corporation) answered, setting up a promissory note executed by Fannie E. Little and Walter J. Little, her husband, and a mortgage on the property here involved to secure payment of said note. Defendant also pleaded that in another action between the Littles and the MacDonald Lumber Company there had been a judgment that the said promissory note was a good and valid promissory note, constituting a good, valid, and binding obligation upon Fannie E. and Walter J. Little, and that the said mortgage was a good, valid, and legal one and a subsisting lien upon the property.

The cause was duly tried and the court found, among other things, that plaintiff became trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of Little & Walpert, Incorporated, a corporation, on May 4, 1910; that on the 19th of June, 1907, Burlingame Realty Company, a corporation, then the owner of the real property which is the subject of this litigation, entered into a written agreement with Fannie E. Little, by which the said corporation agreed to sell and Mrs. Little promised to buy the land at a total purchase price of $1,800, plus certain interest and taxes; that on June 29, 1910, this agreement was transferred by Mrs. Little to plaintiff as trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of Little & Walpert, Incorporated; that up to said date last specified Walter J. Little, president of Little & Walpert, paid $1,346.10 on account of the purchase price of the land; that said money was drawn without authority from the funds of the corporation; that the corporation received no consideration for it; and that no charge was made against any person or persons whomsoever for the sums so withdrawn. It was also found that on August 29, 1910, plaintiff paid $674.30, the balance due on the purchase price of said property to the successor of the Burlingame Realty Company's interest, and received a deed which was placed of record October 27, 1910; that between June 19, 1907, and August 29, 1910, Walter J. Little caused a building to be erected on the property at a cost of approximately $4,000; that this building was paid for, in the same manner as payments had been made on Mrs. Little's behalf on the purchase price of the land by moneys drawn without authority and without charge from the funds of Little & Walpert, Incorporated; that none of the moneys drawn for either purpose from the treasury of said corporation had ever been repaid; that on February 26, 1910, the Littles gave their promissory note to MacDonald Lumber Company for $3,315, secured by their mortgage on said real property, which said mortgage was duly recorded in the following month; that the note and mortgage were executed to secure the payment of an existing indebtedness then owned and held by MacDonald Lumber Company against Little & Walpert, Incorporated, and MacDonald Lumber Company, in consideration of the execution and delivery of the note and mortgage, extended the time of payment of the indebtedness for a period of two years; that the mortgage was executed within four months prior to the adjudication of Little & Walpert, Incorporated, as a bankrupt; that the lumber company had knowledge of the insolvency of the other corporation; that there was no valuable consideration for the execution of the mortgage; that the said mortgage was not accepted by the MacDonald Lumber Company in good faith to the existing creditors of Little & Walpert, Incorporated, but said mortgage was executed by the mortgagors with intent to prefer the lumber company over the other creditors of the insolvent corporation. The court found also that the Littles, on the 11th day of March, 1910, brought an action whereby they sought to have the note and mortgage canceled; that plaintiff had actual knowledge of the pendency of said action; that said action had been prosecuted to a final judgment between the parties thereto; and that by said judgment it was determined—

"that said promissory note was a good and valid promissory note, and that the same constitutes a good, legal, and binding obligation of Fannie E. Little and Walter J. Little, her husband, and that the aforesaid mortgage, given to secure the payment of said note as aforesaid, was a valid, legal, and subsisting mortgage upon the real property."

Appellant contends: (1) That the evidence does not disclose a resulting or a constructive trust in favor of plaintiff; (2) that if such trust is shown defendant is not prejudiced because that corporation is an innocent mortgagee for value without notice of said trust; (3) that the evidence does not sustain the finding that the property was purchased by the money of Little & Walpert; (4) that no unlawful preference is shown to have been given to appellant; (5) that plaintiff is es-topped by the former judgment; and (6) that plaintiff's assignor's laches should bar recovery.

[1] It will not be necessary to consider all of these alleged errors because we find no evidence in the record to support the finding that the MacDonald Lumber Company was a purchaser with notice of the fact that the money paid for the property was drawn from the funds of Little & Walpert, or with notice of the insolvency of the last-named corporation. Respondent insists that under sections 853 and 2224 of the Civil Code, the appellant was an involuntary trustee into whose possession the property might be followed. Assuming, but not conceding, that such a trust was established in favor of Little & Walpert, and that Mrs. Little and her husband were the trustees, MacDonald Lumber Company invokes section 2243 of the Civil Code, which is as follows:

"Every one to whom property is transferred in violation of a trust, holds the same as an involuntary trustee under such trust, unless he purchased it in good faith, and for a valuable consideration."

It is true that Mrs. Little held merely a contract for the purchase of the property upon which certain payments had been made, but that was an interest which might be mortgaged. Section 2947 of the Civil Code provides that:

"Any interest in real property which is capable of being transferred may be mortgaged."

MacDonald Lumber Company therefore acquired a real interest in the land.

[2] Respondent cites 27 Cyc. 1051 to the effect that, although a pre-existing debt will support a mortgage given as security therefor, a creditor who takes a mortgage to secure such a debt without furnishing any new consideration is not regarded as a bona fide purchaser for value. It is argued that the MacDonald Lumber Company, having taken the mortgage to secure a pre-existing debt, is not entitled to the equities of an innocent purchaser for value. The answer to this argument is that, as the court duly found, a new consideration was created by the extension of the time of payment of the indebtedness. Such a consideration is a good and sufficient one for a mortgage. 27 Cyc. 1052; Burke v. Levy, 70 Cal. 250, 11 Pac. 643; Rohrbacher v. Aitken, 145 Cal. 485-489, 78 Pac. 1054. The defendant, therefore, was the mortgagee of an interest in the land, and the mortgage was supported by a valid consideration.

[3] Unless there was proof that said defendant had notice of the existence of a trust in favor of Little & Walpert, the court was bound to give effect to the mortgage because it antedated of record the title which plaintiff acquired by his deed. Without notice of a trust the incumbrancer's rights could not be prejudiced. Section 856, Civ. Code. We find in the record no testimony to support the finding that defendant had notice of the rights of the Little & Walpert corporation when the note and mortgage were executed and delivered. The defendant's president, Mr. McDonald, who conducted the negotiations, testified that he had no idea that any one had any interest in the land except Mrs. Little.

[4] Respondent's counsel say that the acceptance of the note and mortgage at a time when the corporation known as Little & Walpert was in financial difficulties, and the failure of appellant's officers even to make any examination of the records to ascertain the interest of Mrs. Little and her husband, argues that the officers of defendant were fully cognizant of the facts. We are unable to see how these circumstances have any force in support of the findings respecting defendant's knowledge. It appears that Mr. and Mrs. Little were actually residing on the property when the note and mortgage were delivered, and that the former told Mr. MacDonald that it was Mrs. Little's property. But respondent's counsel say:

"To prove actual notice is, in many instances, very difficult, but in this regard one must take into consideration all of the facts and circumstances surrounding the particular transaction. The very circumstances of this case, to wit, the relationship between MacDonald Lumber Company, a corporation, and Little & Walpert, Incorporated, a corporation, was such as beyond any reasonable doubt, to have made the MacDonald Lumber Company aware of the financial condition of Little & Walpert, Incorporated, a corporation, and the lower court, taking all things into consideration, so held."

The relationship between the corporations is not shown by the record, except that at the time of the execution of the mortgage, as the books revealed, Little & Walpert owed the other corporation a little more than the principal sum written in the note. No testimony or documentary showing that we have been able to find in the record has any tendency to prove that the officers of the lumber company should or could have known that the moneys of the corporation, and not the funds of Mr. and Mrs. Little, were invested in the property, or that said officers had notice of the insolvent condition of Little & Walpert.

It follows that the judgment and order must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

LA MESA HOMES CO. v. LA MESA, LEMON GROVE & SPRING VALLEY IRR. DIST. et al. (L. A. 4524.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1916.)

WATERS AND WATER COURSES §226—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS — INCLUSION OF LAND IN MUNICIPALITIES—"MUNICIPAL PURPOSE."

An irrigation district may include within its boundaries a previously existing municipality and assess for district purposes land therein, notwithstanding Const. art. 11, § 19, as amended in 1911, giving municipalities constitutional power to build and operate works for supplying their inhabitants with water, a system of irrigation not being a "municipal purpose" within the scope of the organization of a municipality, and the water supply for the two corporations being distinct and for different purposes.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Suit by La Mesa Homes Company against the La Mesa, Lemon Grove & Spring Valley Irrigation District and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Boone, of San Diego, for appellant. Luce & Luce, of San Diego, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. The defendants demurred to the complaint in this case, and the court sustained the demurrer without leave to amend. From the judgment which followed plaintiff appeals.

The plaintiff corporation, according to the averments in the complaint, owns real property within the boundaries of La Mesa, a city of the sixth class, which is situated wholly within the territory of the defendant corporation. The irrigation district was created under the act of March 31, 1897, and statutes amendatory thereto. The organization of the municipality antedated the formation of the irrigation district, and it is alleged in the complaint that the city of La Mesa did not consent to the establishment of the said district. There has never been any contract between the city and the district for the supply of water for said municipality for any purpose or for the construction of any waterworks within the city or to establish and operate public works for supplying the inhabitants of La Mesa with water. Plaintiff's property within the city of La Mesa was assessed by the officers of the defendant, and, the assessment being unpaid and delinquent, the land was sold and struck off to the district. Plaintiff prayed judgment for the cancellation of the assessment on the ground that it—

"was made contrary to the Constitution of the state of California and in derogation of the powers of municipal corporations under the Constitution of said state to establish and operate public works for supplying its inhabitants with water, and in derogation of the rights of said city to furnish water to inhabitants outside of its boundaries."

The sole question to be determined is whether or not, under the present provisions of the Constitution of California, a municipality may be included within the boundaries of an irrigation district and land within the territory of said municipality assessed for district purposes. Appellant's contention tion is that not until the amendment of section 19, art 11, of the Constitution in 1911 could a municipality constitutionally acquire and operate works for the supplying of water both within and outside of its own territory; but that since said amendment the city's power, under the Constitution, transcends any legislative grant of apparent authority to an irrigation district. It is argued, therefore, that within the city's territory the power of the irrigation district is suspended because two municipal corporations may not, within the same territory, exercise the same authority, jurisdiction, and privileges. Before the amendment to section 19, art. 11, of the Constitution that section was as follows:

"In any city where there are no public works owned and controlled by the municipality for supplying the same with water or artificial light, any individual, or any company duly incorporated for such purpose under and by authority of the laws of this state, shall, under the direction of the superintendent of streets, or other officer in control thereof, and under such general regulations as the municipality may prescribe for damages and indemnity for damages, have the privilege of using the public streets and thoroughfares thereof, and of laying down pipes and conduits therein, and connections therewith, so far as may be necessary for introducing into and supplying such city and its inhabitants either with gaslight or other illuminating light, or with fresh water for domestic and all other purposes, upon the condition that the municipal government shall have the right to regulate the charges thereof."

Since the amendment the section has been as follows:

"Any municipal corporation may establish and operate public works for supplying its inhabitants with light, water, power, heat, transportation, telephone service or other means of communication. Such works may be acquired by original construction or by the purchase of existing works, including their franchises, or both. Persons or corporations may establish and operate works for supplying the inhabitants with such services upon such conditions and under such regulations as the municipality may prescribe under its organic law, on condition that the municipal government shall have the right to regulate the charges thereof. A municipal corporation may furnish such services to inhabitants outside its boundaries; provided, that it shall not furnish any service to the inhabitants of any other municipality owning or operating works supplying the same service to such inhabitants, without the consent of such other municipality, expressed by ordinance."

Appellant concedes that some cities had the authority to establish and actually had constructed water systems when the section was in its earlier form, but the argument is that they were operating under legislative authority only; that their dignity as suppliers of water was no greater than that of irrigation districts which were also creatures of legislative creation, but that, being now vested under the Constitution with power to supply water (for irrigation as well as for other purposes), they may not be brought under the dominion of irrigation districts within which their respective territories may be located. Granting appellant's premise that the Constitution now gives to municipal corporations a right to build and operate works for supplying their inhabitants with water which such corporations could previously obtain only by legislative grace through general laws, special statutes, or charter provisions, it does not follow that a municipality such as the city of La Mesa may not be included within the territory of an irrigation district and its lands assessed for the purpose of carrying out a scheme of irrigation for the benefit of a large number of people and an area much greater than that within the limits of the city. There is no essential difference between the power to build waterworks and to supply water, given to a city by a statute and that conferred by the Constitution, except that in one case the source of the privilege is the Legislature and in the other the people themselves bestow it. Therefore the decisions cited by respondent are as apt now as they were before the change in the Constitution to which appellant has called our attention. It has been held that the inclusion of a city or town within the boundaries of such a district as this neither renders the act authorizing the formation of irrigation districts unconstitutional nor invalidates the organization of the district. Board of Directors, etc., v. Tregoe, 88 Cal. 334, 26 Pac. 237. In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296, 344, 28 Pac. 675, 676 (14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106), is authority for the same principle. In the opinion in that case the following language is used:

"Neither is it in violation of the Constitution to incorporate into such district a town or city that has been incorporated for other municipal purposes. A system of irrigation contemplated by the act in question cannot be considered as a 'municipal purpose' within the scope of the organization of a city or town, and there can be no conflict between a corporation organized under the act to produce a system of irrigation within the district, and the municipal incorporation of the town of Madera. A water supply for the two corporations is distinct and for different purposes. The liability of the inhabitants of the town of Madera for the bonded indebtedness of the Madera Irrigation District, as well as for that of their own municipality, does not impair the validity of the organization of the district. It is a liability of the same character as rests upon the inhabitants of any town for its proportion of all the indebtedness of the county within which it is situated."

The same rule has been followed in Idaho. Nampa Irrigation District v. Brose, 11 Idaho, 474, 485, 83 Pac. 499.

While there is not a complete analogy between sanitary districts and irrigation districts there are points of similarity which make some authorities applicable to both. One of these is Pixley v. Saunders, 168 Cal. 152, 160, 141 Pac. 815, 818, in which it was said that:

"In enacting the Sanitary District Acts, the Legislature had in mind the sanitation of any territory which might conveniently be served by a single system, whether wholly unincorporated or not, and that a sanitary district formed under said act preserves its identity and retains its powers over the whole territory, except in the event of its complete absorption by a municipality."

The court was there considering the contention that a municipal corporation, clothed with constitutional ability to pass laws pertaining to public health, may not be subject to the authority of a sanitary district of which it forms a territorial fraction. Yet it was held that the powers and the identity of the district were preserved. By a parity of reasoning we may say that the functions and the autonomy of the respondent corporation at bar are not destroyed, nor even impaired, by the circumstance that the Constitution grants to the city in which appellant's lands are situated the privilege of building and operating waterworks.

It follows from the foregoing discussion that the judgment must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

GALEENER v. HONEYCUTT, County Auditor. (Sac. 2510.)

1. OFFICERS ⇐100(1) — COMPENSATION — CHANGE.

The Legislature may change the mode of compensation of an officer after his election from fees or per diem to salary, but cannot, in view of Const. art. 11, § 9, increase his compensation.

2. OFFICERS ⇐100(1)—COMPENSATION—STATUTES—VALIDITY.

Const. art. 11, § 9, prohibits increase of compensation after election or during term of county officer. Pol. Code, § 4271, fixed compensation of supervisors at $1,200 per year, plus 25 cents per mile traveled while acting as road commissioner, not to exceed $600 per annum. St. 1915, p. 1040, amended section 4271 to provide flat compensation of $1,800 per year, declaring that as a fact the compensation was not increased, and applying the act to the then incumbents. Held, that, in view of the necessary presumption in favor of legislation, and in the absence of proof that it was not necessary for a supervisor to travel 2,400 miles per year as road commissioner, the statute was not invalid for increasing compensation during term.

3. OFFICERS ⇐100(1)—COMPENSATION—STATUTES—VALIDITY.

No express finding by the Legislature that an act does not increase compensation of county officers is necessary to validate the act.

4. OFFICERS ⇐100(1)—COMPENSATION—STATUTES—VALIDITY.

Although St. 1915, p. 1040, as to compensation of supervisors, in terms applied to all incumbents, the mere fact that two of six members were elected under an earlier statute at a lower compensation does not invalidate the act under Const. art. 11, § 9, prohibiting increase of compensation during term, nor prevent application of the act to competent parties; the disability being personal.

5. MANDAMUS ⇐23(1)—WHO MAY APPLY—"BENEFICIALLY INTERESTED."

Under St. 1915, p. 1040, providing a flat salary of $1,800 to supervisors, amending Pol. Code, § 4271, allowing salary of $1,200 and fees of $600, although compensation was not increased, an incumbent is a person "beneficially interested" so as to entitle him to a writ of mandate to enforce his right.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Madera County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Petition for writ of mandate by J. P. Galeener against A. S. Honeycutt, Auditor of Madera County. From a judgment for plaintiff on defendant's refusal to answer after demurrer to the amended petition was overruled, defendant appealed to the Third District Court of Appeal, which, after decision, transferred the case to the Supreme Court. Judgment affirmed.

Stanley Murray, of Madera, for appellant. F. A. Fee, of Madera, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The court below overruled a demurrer to plaintiff's amended petition for a writ of mandate, and, defendant declining to answer, gave judgment for plaintiff. This is an appeal from said judgment, taken to the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District, and transferred to this court for determination after decision by said district court of appeal.

Practically only two questions are raised by appellant's briefs. The facts material thereto are substantially alleged in the petition as follows: Plaintiff was elected to the office of supervisor of Madera county at the general state election in 1914, and ever since the 1st Monday of January, 1915, has been one of the five supervisors of that county. At the time of his election the statute fixing the compensation of supervisor of Madera county (section 4271, Pol. Code) was as follows:

"Each member of the board of supervisors, one thousand two hundred dollars per annum and twenty-five cents per mile while traveling from their respective residence to the county seat not more than once each month; and provided, further, that said supervisors shall act as road commissioners in their respective districts, which offices are hereby created and shall receive for the service of such road commissioner mileage at the rate of twenty-five cents per mile for all distances actually traveled by them in the discharge of their duty as such road commissioner; and provided, further, that such mileage at road commissioner shall not in any one year exceed the sum of six hundred dollars for any one of said road commissioners."

By act approved June 1, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1040), this provision was amended to read as follows:

"Each member of the board of supervisors, eighteen hundred dollars per annum, in full payment of services as member of the board of supervisors, as member of the board of equalization and as road commissioner, and twenty-five cents per mile while traveling from his residence to the county seat not more than once each month. It is hereby found as a fact that the changes provided for in this subdivision do not work an increase in compensation of this office, and it is intended that the same shall apply immediately to the present incumbents."

So far as services as a member of the board of equalization are concerned, they have at all times been required. Plaintiff demanded of defendant that he draw his warrant on the county treasurer for his compensation for September, 1915, in accord with the provisions of this amendment, and, defendant refusing to do so, this proceeding was instituted. It should be added that two of the five supervisors of Madera county were elected at the state election of the year 1912 for a term of four years, and that the fixed compensation of each member of the board of supervisors at that time was $1,200 per annum, and 25 cents per mile while traveling from his residence to the county seat, not more than once each month, there being no allowance for his services or mileage as road commissioner. Stats. 1911, p. 230.

[1-3] Supervisors are county officers. By section 9, art. 11, of the Constitution, it is provided:

"The compensation of any county * * * officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office. * * *"

It is claimed that the application of the amendment of 1915 to plaintiff during the term that he is now serving would be to increase his compensation after his election and during his term of office, in violation of this constitutional provision. So far as any supervisor of Madera county elected at the general state election of 1914 is concerned, the only change made by the amendment of 1915 in the law as to his compensation as it existed at the time of his election was to make the same $1,800 per annum for all services rendered by him as supervisor and road commissioner, instead of $1,200, plus 25 cents per mile for all distances actually traveled by him in the discharge of his duty as road commissioner, not exceeding in any one year $600. In the light of the presumption that obtains in favor of the validity of a legislative enactment, we must assume that the Legislature was simply adopting a different mode from that previously obtaining of compensating such officer for his services as road commissioner. Theretofore the compensation fixed for his "services" as road commissioner, which position every supervisor holds ex officio (Pol. Code, § 2641), was "mileage" at the rate of 25 cents per mile for each mile actually traveled in the discharge of his duty, not exceeding $600 per annum. By the change he was given $600 per annum for all such services. It is thoroughly settled that the Legislature may change the mode of compensation of an officer after his election from fees or per diem to salary, provided that in so doing it does not in fact increase his compensation. Vail v. San Diego Co., 126 Cal. 35, 58 Pac. 392; McCauley v. Culbert, 144 Cal. 276, 77 Pac. 923; Crockett v. Mathews, 157 Cal. 153, 106 Pac. 575. Of course, there is no distinction in principle in this connection between fees per diem and mileage. In doing this, however, the Legislature may not increase the officer's compensation, for the constitutional provision prohibits any increase. If the legislative enactment shows on its face that the change does in fact increase the compensation of an incumbent it is void as to him, and, of course, the Legislature in such a case could not avoid the inhibition of the Constitution by making a finding to the effect that no increase in compensation is accomplished by the change, when it is apparent from the law itself that there is an increase. But it is not apparent here that any increase in compensation was effected by the change. There is absolutely nothing on the face of the law to show that each supervisor of Madera county is not required to actually travel at least 2,400 miles each year in the proper discharge of his duties as road commissioner, and that such was the condition in both the years 1914 and 1915. If such a condition is possible, we must assume in favor of the legislative enactment that it existed, for as was said by Chief Justice Beatty in Smith v. Mathews, 155 Cal. 752, 756, 103 Pac. 199, 201, the doctrine of Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649, 27 Pac. 1089, 14 L. R. A. 459, 25 Am. St. Rep. 230, never since questioned by this court, is that:

"When the right to enact a law depends upon the existence of a fact the passage of the act implies, and the conclusive presumption is, that the Governor and the Legislature have performed their duty, and ascertained the existence of the fact before enacting or approving the law—a decision which the courts have no right to question or review."

Smith v. Mathews, supra, was a case involving a change in mode of compensation of justices and constables from per diem to salary, which finally was decided on the point that the change was not intended by the Legislature to affect incumbents, a result that cannot be reached in the case at bar, in view of the express language showing the contrary. But in the later case of Crockett v. Mathews, 157 Cal. 153, 106 Pac. 575, involving a similar change in mode of compensation of justices and constables, where the intent to make it applicable to incumbents was apparent, the court held that there was no prohibited increase of compensation. It was said in the opinion:

"Nor is it disputed, the act before us not disclosing whether or not the salary system of compensation substituted thereby for the fee system does produce an increase of compensation for justices and constables, that, if the act sufficiently shows the intent that the new system shall affect incumbents, the conclusive presumption is that the Governor and the Legislature have investigated, ascertained, and determined that the change does not result in an increase of compensation, a fact essential to a valid law affecting incumbents, and that the courts have no right to question or review the determination of the legislative branch of the state in that regard. This is the doctrine established by Stevenson v. Colgan, 91 Cal. 649 [27 Pac. 1089, 14 L. R. A. 459, 25 Am. St. Rep. 230]. See, also, Smith v. Mathews, 155 Cal. 752 [103 Pac. 199]."

This would be true even in the absence of an express finding by the Legislature in the act itself, for no express finding is essential, and, indeed, we doubt if such express finding has any efficacy whatever, except in the way of making more emphatic the intent of the Legislature that the change shall be applicable to incumbents. In view of the authorities it cannot be held by the court that to give to petitioner the compensation fixed by the amendment of 1915 would be to increase the compensation fixed by the law in force at the time of his election.

[4] It may be conceded that as to the two supervisors elected in 1912 both the amendment of 1913 and that of 1915 were inoperative, because to apply them to such supervisors would increase their compensation beyond that fixed by the law in force at the time of their election. But this fact cannot operate to suspend the application of either amendment to the other supervisors elected subsequent to the amendment of 1913. The point appears to be that as the Legislature is required to regulate the compensation of officers "in proportion to their duties," and that as the courts must assume that the duties of each of the supervisors of Madera county are the same, a statute increasing the compensation of supervisors cannot be operatively effective until the situation is such that all of the supervisors may be entitled to the same compensation. We are satisfied that this claim must be held to be unfounded. Of course the Legislature in regulating the compensation of officers must regulate it "in proportion to duties" (section 5, art. 11, Const.), and any attempted discrimination by the Legislature between officers whose duties are the same in all respects would be a violation of this provision. For instance, if the Legislature had here provided that the salary of the supervisors of three of the supervisor districts of Madera county should be $1,800 per annum, and that of the supervisors of the other two districts should be $1,200 per annum, we would have a case in which appellant's contention would be pertinent. That is the kind of a case, in principle, that the court had before it in Tucker v. Barnum, 144 Cal. 266, 77 Pac. 919, relative to compensation of justices of the peace, relied on by him, but which is not at all in point here. The law construed in this proceeding fixes the same compensation for each and all of the supervisors of Madera county. That by reason of the constitutional provision prohibiting an increase of compensation to an officer after his election, the change made thereby cannot affect two of the supervisors, but must remain in abeyance during the term of their particular offices for which they were elected, simply because it cannot constitutionally operate as to them for such terms (see Harrison v. Colgan, 148 Cal. 73, 82 Pac. 674) in no way affects its validity as a law, does not prevent it from operating in so far as it can constitutionally operate, and does not preclude the other supervisors as to whom no increase is forbidden by the Constitution from receiving thereunder. This is clearly intimated by language used in Harrison v. Colgan, supra. That an incumbent may not receive an increase of compensation in view of this constitutional provision is really a matter personal to him, which cannot fairly be said to affect the matter of compensation provided by law for the office. By the constitutional provision he is precluded from receiving the increase in compensation made for the office during the term for which he was elected. As to him, as has been said, the old law remains in full effect during such term. Smith v. Mathews, supra; Harrison v. Colgan, supra.

[5] There is no force whatever in the point made in the answer to the petition for a hearing in this court that petitioner is not a party "beneficially interested," and therefore not entitled to a writ of mandate, if it be true that no increase of compensation was effected by the change. Within the meaning of the term as used in our law, he is "beneficially interested" in obtaining the compensation incident to his office in the amount and according to the mode fixed by the law. The judgment is affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by C. M. Easton and Mary E. Easton, his wife, against the United Trade School Contracting Company. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Coberly, B. A. Finch, and Scarborough & Bowen, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Ray Howard, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The action is for damages growing out of injuries sustained by plaintiff C. M. Easton's wife. Trial was had before the court without a jury, and resulted in an award and judgment for plaintiffs. The items composing this judgment were $5,000 for her bodily injuries, $50 for her disability and loss of society, comfort, and service to her husband, $75 for nursing during her illness, $25 for physician's services, and $10 for medicines. Each of these minor items was made an element of special damage in the complaint.

The charge was that while Mary E. Easton, plaintiff, was driving a horse attached to a buggy along a street in Los Angeles, an automobile of defendant, in charge of one of defendant's agents, was negligently and carelessly driven against the buggy, inflicting the injuries complained of, which injuries will hereinafter be more specifically described. The evidence established that Mrs. Easton was riding in a buggy on Central avenue in Los Angeles city. With her was her sister-in-law, who carried on her lap one of Mrs. Easton's daughters, about 5 years of age, while another daughter, about 8½ years of age, sat on a board at the feet of the women. The horse was going at a dog trot and the buggy was on the proper side of the street, as near to the curb as possible, as the ordinance of the city required.

The defendant was conducting a school for instruction, amongst other things, in the operation of automobiles. Elmer Harper, 17 years of age, was a student in the school under payment for the privilege of tuition. D. B. Sterling was also a student in the same school, but had advanced to the point where he describes his occupation to be that of chauffeur and his employment as driving and working in the garage or workshop of the defendant, and in instructing and driving defendant's students. All of this he did under the directions of B. A. Finch, defendant's president. Upon the day of the injury, acting under these directions, Sterling took Harper in an automobile to give him lessons in driving. Sterling himself drove the car into Central avenue, and there, as the street seemed clear, he surrendered the wheel and permitted Harper to drive it. Upon Central avenue was a street car line and on its tracks a street car, proceeding in the same direction as was the buggy. The automobile, going in the same direction as the car and buggy approached the two from behind. The automobile, under the management of the inexperienced student, Harper, apparently sought to pass between the street car and the buggy. Harper became confused, mismanaged the automobile, and collided with both the street car and the buggy. The collision knocked one child out of the buggy, broke the buggy wheel, bent the rear axle, knocked the tire off the front wheel, forced the horse to his haunches, and delivered so severe a shock to Mrs. Easton, who was leaning against the back of the seat of the buggy, that she was knocked forward out of her seat. Mrs. Easton was at the time pregnant. About a month thereafter she suffered a miscarriage. By the medical testimony the fetus had been dead about 2 or 3 weeks, and the miscarriage was the result of the fright and the shock of the collision.

[1] Appellant's principal argument is that there was no privity between Harper or Sterling and the defendant rendering defendant liable for the negligence of either of them. But the facts above stated would seem conclusively to dispose of this argument. The defendant, as a part of its business, employed Sterling to give Harper instructions. It paid Sterling for so doing. Sterling, in the performance of this employment, used his own judgment, which by operation of law became the defendant's judgment, in turning the management of the car over to Harper when and as he did. That the accident resulted from the ignorance and inexperience of Harper may not for a moment be doubted, and while, of course, Harper would be responsible for his own act in the premises, and Sterling in turn responsible, none the less the defendant, under whose directions all of these things were done, is likewise responsible. Minor v. Mapes, 102 Ark. 351, 144 S. W. 219, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 214; Burnham v. Central Automobile Exchange (R. I.) 67 Atl. 429; Collard v. Beach, 81 App. Div. 582, 81 N. Y. Supp. 619; Wooding v. Thom, 148 App. Div. 21, 132 N. Y. Supp. 50.

[2, 3] Appellant's next proposition is that Mrs. Easton received no injuries as such; that she suffered merely from fright; that fright alone, without personal injury, cannot be made the foundation of an action for damages, but that whatever may be the rule in this respect "plaintiff cannot recover in this action because it appears that her fright was caused by apprehension of threatened danger not to herself, but only to her child." But appellant's position requires neither a discussion of the principle nor a detailed consideration of the authorities, for the reason that the facts do not show that plaintiff's injuries were occasioned by fright alone, nor fear of danger or injury to her child alone. True, she suffered fright and fear occasioned by the collision. True, a part of that fright and fear grew out of concern for her infant child which was thrown out of the buggy by the collision, but equally true it is that, leaning, as she was, against the back of the seat, she sustained a direct personal physical shock by the blow of the automobile against the buggy, which blow propelled her forward out of her seat, and which blow directly contributed to and aided in causing the miscarriage from which she afterwards suffered. Fright here was but a natural and direct consequence of defendant's injurious trespass, which trespass resulted in direct physical injury to Mrs. Easton. The fright was an inevitable concomitant of the trespass. This case, therefore, presents no feature in common with such cases relied upon by appellant as Mitchell v. Rochester Ry. Co., 151 N. Y. 107, 45 N. E. 354, 34 L. R. A. 781, 56 Am. St. Rep. 604, where plaintiff, about to get on one of the cars of the defendant, sustained fright because of the approach of another car, which fright resulted in a miscarriage; nor Phillips v. Dickerson, 85 Ill.

11, 28 Am. Rep. 607, where the plaintiff, a married woman, sued for damages because of a miscarriage occasioned by her fright over a quarrel between the defendant and her husband, within her hearing but out of her sight; nor Braun v. Craven, 175 Ill. 401, 51 N. E. 657, 42 L. R. A. 199, where a recovery was sought against defendant because he had entered a house where plaintiff was, unannounced, and had demeaned himself improperly and in a violent and boisterous manner, causing her to become sick, sore, and disabled; nor Miller v. Baltimore & Ohio S. R. Co., 78 Ohio St. 309, 85 N. E. 499, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 949, 125 Am. St. Rep. 699, where defendant was charged with having negligently shoved cars into the dwelling house of plaintiff so that plaintiff, who was standing near by, "suffered a severe nervous shock that shattered her nervous system and caused her great bodily pain and mental anguish and permanent injury to her person and health," and it was held that an act of negligence neither willful nor malicious, causing mere fright, unaccompanied by contemporaneous physical injury, is not actionable; nor in Huston v. Borough of Freemansburg, 212 Pa. 548, 61 Atl. 1022, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 49, where the defendant borough in excavating a street exploded dynamite, and it was charged that the shock of the explosion so affected plaintiff's husband, who was recovering from typhoid fever, that he died within 2 weeks, and the holding is simply that there can be no recovery of damage from fright or other merely mental suffering, unconnected with physical injury; nor in Chittick v. Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co., 224 Pa. 13, 73 Atl. 4, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1073, where plaintiff, sitting in her window, 200 or 300 feet distant, charged that she sustained fright and consequent injuries from the flash and explosion of an electric trolley wire. In all these cases and the like cases, fright alone was made the gravamen of the action, the physical injuries charged resulting merely from the fright. In no one of these cases, nor in any other well-adjudicated case—and certainly not by the courts of this state—is it held that where fright accompanies or follows a wrongful physical injury, that it is not an element of damage. To the contrary, fright under such circumstances is but one form of mental anguish, and the mental anguish as a direct reasonable outcome of the illegal physical injuries is always an element of damage. Such is the rule of decision in this state, where it is held that although mental suffering alone will not support an action for damages (and of course fright is but one form of mental suffering), yet mental suffering and mental anguish are an element of damage in aggravation thereof when they naturally ensue from the act complained of. Sloane v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 111 Cal. 668, 44 Pac. 320, 32 L. R. A. 193; Thomas v. Gates, 126 Cal. 7, 58 Pac. 315.

And so the holding of all these cases which we have been briefly reviewing is simply to the effect, as declared by those courts, that they have been unable to find any decided case which holds that mental suffering alone, unattended by any injury to the person caused by simple actionable negligence can sustain an action, "and the fact that no such case exists, and that no elementary writer asserts such doctrine, is a strong argument against it." Wyman v. Leavitt, 71 Me. 227. While touching the nature of the injuries in the case at bar it may be added that it is very properly declared in Warren v. Boston & Maine Ry. Co., 163 Mass. 484, 40 N. E. 895, that:

"It is a physical injury to a person to be thrown out of a wagon, or to be compelled to jump out, even though the harm done consists mainly of nervous shock."

[4] Appellant's next contention is that the award of $5,000 is excessive. The nature of the injury has been sufficiently outlined, and its character disposes of this argument without the need of elaboration.

[5] Appellant very justly complains that in this action for the recovery of damages for injuries occasioned to the wife the items of special damage have no place. Matthew v. C. P. R. Co., 63 Cal. 450; Tell v. Gibson, 66 Cal. 247, 5 Pac. 223; Gomez v. Scanlan, 155 Cal. 528, 102 Pac. 12. These minor items are damages occasioned to the husband alone and for which alone he is entitled to sue. But in this instance the court has segregated these items and elements of damage, and its total judgment of $5,160 may therefore be reduced by striking out the special sums awarded. Thus modified the judgment will remain in the sum of $5,000 damages for injuries sustained by plaintiff Mary E. Easton.

[6] Complaint is made that the court allowed evidence that Mrs. Easton suffered from a second miscarriage some months after the first miscarriage occasioned by the injury. The physician's testimony was to the effect that one miscarriage by injury and shock, and in particular where the fetus was carried for a considerable period of time dead in the womb, would create at least a tendency to cause a second miscarriage, and that in this specific case he attributed the second miscarriage to the condition of Mrs. Easton and her womb—a condition caused by the injuries. It may at once be said that this evidence is of doubtful weight, but it was not inadmissible, and its weight was for the jury. The hypothetical question as to the effect that shock and fright might or would have on a pregnant woman of Mrs. Easton's age and physical condition, even if objectionable, was not of such vital consequence as to demand a reversal of the case.

[7] Finally it is said that the court erred in permitting the witness Sterling to answer the question whether Harper, who was driving the car at the time of the accident, was a qualified driver. It is said that the question was immaterial and the answer prejudicial. It was clearly material, it being evidence whether the car was under the management of a competent driver or not, and while doubtless prejudicial in the sense that it showed or tended to show that the car was not being properly managed, the injury which it may have worked to defendant's case was entirely within the purview of the law.

With a modification of the damages awarded, as above indicated, from $5,160 to $5,000, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

St. 1897, p. 201, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1422, requiring a contractor for city work, before entering on performance, to give a bond for payment of materials and labor, is inconsistent with the city's freeholder's charter, purporting to provide all the conditions precedent for a contractor for city sewer construction proceeding with the work, including the giving of a bond, conditioned, however, only for faithful performance of the contract, and so inapplicable to such work in such city; Const. art. 11, § 6, making the freeholder's charter of a city absolutely controlling and free from impairment by general laws as to all "municipal affairs."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 875; Dec. Dig. — 345.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Franklin A. Griffin, Judge.

Action by the Loop Lumber Company against James F. Van Loben Sels and another. From an adverse judgment, defendant American Surety Company of New York appeals. Reversed.

Charles A. Shurtleff and O'Connor & Schwartz, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Weinmann, Wood & Cunha and L. R. Weinmann, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The material facts shown by the complaint are as follows: The city and county of San Francisco, by the appropriate officers, awarded a contract for the doing of certain sewer work in said city.

and county to the Keystone Construction Company, which assigned such award to defendant Van Loben Sels. The city and county on September 20, 1911, entered into a contract with Van Loben Sels for the doing of said work. The award and execution of the contract and the contract itself were all in accord with the provisions of the freeholders' charter of the city and county regulating such matters, which provisions appear to furnish a complete scheme therefor. At or about the time of entering into this contract, Van Loben Sels as principal and the appellant, American Surety Company of New York, as surety, gave the bond provided for by the act of the state Legislature entitled "An act to secure the payment of the claims of materialmen, mechanics, or laborers, employed by contractors upon state, municipal, or other public work" approved March 27, 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 201), as amended by act approved May 1, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1422), said bond being in the sum of $41,000. It is expressly alleged in the complaint that they made and executed such bond "in accordance with the provisions of" said act. This act provides that every contractor to whom is awarded a contract for the execution or performance "of any building, excavating or other mechanical work for this state, or by any county, city and county, city, town, or district therein shall, before entering upon the performance of such work," file with the officers by whom the contract was awarded a bond to be approved by them, in a sum not less than one-half of the total amount payable by the terms of the contract, conditioned that if the contractor fails to pay for any materials, supplies, work, or labor furnished in the matter, the sureties will pay the same in an amount not exceeding the sum specified in the bond, provided a claim therefor be filed in the manner specified in the act. The bond provided that if Van Loben Sels failed to pay for any materials, supplies or work or labor, the surety "will pay the same, to an amount not exceeding the sum specified in this bond, as provided by an act of the Legislature," etc., specifying the act by title, date of approval, and amendment. "Relying upon said bond," plaintiff furnished said Van Loben Sels certain labor and materials in the performance of the work contracted for, amounting to $4,877.96, no part of which has ever been paid. For this plaintiff duly presented and filed its claim in the manner provided by the act. It demanded payment of the amount from the surety company and the company refused to pay any part thereof.

Subsequently this action was brought by plaintiff against Van Loben Sels and the surety company for the amount due, and judgment was given against both defendants for $1,772. The surety company alone appeals from this judgment. The only claim made by it for reversal is that the facts stated in the complaint are insufficient to constitute a cause of action in so far as it is concerned.

[1,2] The claim of the appellant is that the act in pursuance of which and solely because of which it is said the bond was given is void, or, in any event, inapplicable to contracts for public work entered into by the city and county of San Francisco. We think that it must be concluded, in view of the allegations of the complaint, that the bond was given solely to secure the right on the part of the contractor to proceed with the performance of his contract with the city and county of San Francisco, on the theory that under the provisions of the act the giving of such a bond was essential before the contractor could proceed with such performance. If for any reason such right to proceed with the work existed independent of said act and could not be affected or impaired thereby, it would seem to follow under our decisions that the bond was without consideration and void. See Coburn v. Townsend, 103 Cal. 233, 37 Pac. 202; Roystone Company v. Darling et al., 154 Pac. 15, 19. We are speaking of a bond given solely to comply with a statute which is itself void, or which does not require the bond as supposed.

It would not be at all difficult to sustain the claim of respondent as to the validity of this act and its applicability to the city and county of San Francisco, were it not for the provisions of our Constitution exempting municipalities having freeholders' charters from control by the state Legislature in "municipal affairs." The right of a state through its Legislature to provide for security by bond for the protection of persons furnishing materials or labor for the construction of public works for itself or any subdivision of the state, subject to control in such matters by the Legislature, is well sustained by the authorities in other jurisdictions. But so far as we can see the exercise of such a right is based solely on the theory that it is a reasonable and proper requirement on the part of the public authorities entering into a contract for public work, or those having the right to prescribe as to the terms and conditions of such contracts. We find such an act in regard to contracts for public work for the United States, enacted by Congress, which of course has full power in such a matter, and this act is sustained by decisions of the federal courts. See Hill v. American Surety Co., 200 U. S. 197, 26 Sup. Ct. 168, 50 L. Ed. 437; Kansas City, etc., Co. v. National Surety Co. (C. C.) 149 Fed. 507. Similar requirements by cities having full control of the matter of contracts for municipal work are sustained by the courts, and the authorities are such as to leave little room for doubt that a requirement of this kind as to contracts for municipal work in the charter of the city and county of San Francisco would be valid.

But at the time of the execution of this contract and the giving of this bond, section 6, art. 11, of our state Constitution was such as to make the freeholders' charter of cities and towns absolutely controlling and free from impairment by general laws of the state, as to all "municipal affairs." Although the phraseology of the section was changed by the amendment adopted November 3, 1914, the same result still obtains. In so far as such a charter makes provision relative to any "municipal affair," it is the supreme law, paramount to any law enacted by the state Legislature, and general laws enacted by the Legislature in regard thereto can have no application. It is unnecessary to cite authorities to sustain this proposition, which has been so often declared as to have become practically elementary. That street and sewer work in a municipality and the making of contracts therefor on the part of the municipality are "municipal affairs" within the meaning of the constitutional provision cannot be doubted. See Byrne v. Drain, 127 Cal. 663, 667, 60 Pac. 433; Barber Asphalt Co. v. Costa, 152 Pac. 296. Especially is this true where the expense of the work is to be borne by the municipality itself, as was the fact in this case. And we do not think it can be seriously questioned that a municipality may provide in its freeholders' charter for a complete scheme for the doing of such work that will be paramount to anything contained in any act of the state Legislature, and that in regard to such municipality anything contained in any general law of the state that is inconsistent with the charter provisions must be inoperative.

Examination of the freeholders' charter of the city and county of San Francisco discloses the fact that it contains, in article 6 thereof, a complete scheme for the doing of such work as was here contemplated, the award and letting of contracts therefor, and the terms and conditions upon which such contracts are to be let. The board of public works is given charge, superintendence, and control, under such ordinances as may be adopted by the supervisors, of all public ways and of all work done upon, over, or under the same, and of all sewers and of the work pertaining thereto (section 9). With certain exceptions, not material here, contracts for public work are to be awarded only after notice calling for sealed proposals, and all proposals must be accompanied by a certified check for an amount not less than 10 per centum of the aggregate of the proposal (sections 14 to 16). The contract may be awarded only to the lowest bidder, provided that the bid of any party who has been delinquent or unfaithful in any former contract must be rejected (section 17). Section 21 provides for the contract and its execution. It requires among other things that, at the same time with the execution of the contract, the contractor shall execute to the city and county a bond conditioned "for the faithful performance of the contract." No other bond is required by the charter. The section further requires that "the contract shall specify the time within which the work shall be commenced, and when to be completed," and, further, that in case of failure on the part of the contractor to complete his contract within the time fixed in the contract, or within said extension as is allowed by the supervisors on recommendation of the board of public works, the contract shall be void. Section 22 provides that when the work shall have been completed to the satisfaction and acceptance of the board, it shall so declare by resolution, and thereupon the board shall deliver to the contractor a certificate to that effect. It is apparent that a complete scheme is thus provided by the charter for the doing of such work as is here involved, and that it was intended to specify all the terms and conditions upon which a contract was to be awarded and the work contracted for performed. It must be held to have been contemplated that upon compliance with all conditions prescribed by the charter, the contractor should proceed with his work, and the charter, as we have seen, expressly requires that the contract shall specify the time within which the work shall be commenced. It seems to us to be perfectly clear that a state statute imposing other conditions on the contractor, and prohibiting the commencement of work under the contract until he has complied therewith, is inconsistent with the charter provisions on the subject, and consequently ineffectual for any purpose. It is urged that the act is not in conflict with the charter for the reason that the latter contains no provision at all in regard to such a bond as is required by the act—neither requires such a bond nor in terms declares that no such bond is essential. But this in no degree affects the question. The charter does purport to provide all the conditions imposed on the contractor as a prerequisite to doing the work, including the giving of a bond for the faithful performance of the contract, and contemplates that upon compliance with those conditions he shall proceed with such work. Any law purporting to impose other conditions as a prerequisite to doing the work is necessarily inconsistent with the charter. It is not a case where the charter is silent upon the matter, and the authorities cited by respondent in this connection are therefore not in point. And the act does deal with "municipal affairs" when applied to a contract for the doing of sewer work for a municipality, for it purports to prescribe a condition prerequisite to the commencement of work under the contract with the municipality.

It has been held by this court that an act providing for security by bond of those performing labor for or furnishing materials to a contractor is not a regulation coming "within what is called the police power." Gibbs v. Tally, 133 Cal. 373, 377, 65 Pac. 970, 60 L. R. A. 815. It has also been held that the requirement of such a bond is entirely outside the protection of the constitutional provision relative to mechanics' liens. Shaughnessy v. American Surety Co., 138 Cal. 543, 545, 69 Pac. 250, 71 Pac. 701. In view of the decisions we perceive no ground upon which the act can be sustained except as a reasonable and proper regulation in the matter of contracts for public work made by those having the right to prescribe the terms and conditions for such contracts. And as to contracts for such work in the city and county of San Francisco, the state Legislature is without power, because of the mandate of our state Constitution, to prescribe any such terms or conditions as are inconsistent with the charter provisions of said city and county.

It follows that the legislative act was ineffectual to require the giving of the bond in suit as a condition precedent to the doing of the work by the contractor, and, the city and county of San Francisco not having required any such bond, it must be held that the bond was without consideration and void.

We see no warrant in the allegations of the complaint for a conclusion that appellant is estopped to deny liability upon the bond.

The conclusion we have reached on the questions discussed renders it unnecessary to consider other points made against the legislative act.

The judgment is reversed.

IN RE ROSS' ESTATE.

VAN DYKE v. ROSS et al.

(S. F. 7344.)

1. WILLS ⇨324(1) — CONTEST — SUBMISSION TO JURY.

The evidence presented by will contestants should be viewed most favorably to them, and all contradictory testimony disregarded before directing a nonsuit.

2. WILLS ⇨50—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—REQUISITES.

A testator has the requisite mental capacity if he is able to understand the nature of his property, his relation to the natural objects of his bounty, and is free from any delusion which would affect the disposition of his property.

3. WILLS ⇨324(2) — MENTAL CAPACITY — QUESTION FOR JURY.

Testator's testamentary capacity held a jury question where he died 9 days after making the will, was 86 years old, had suffered two paralytic strokes, and was unable to remember or carry on a connected conversation.

4. WITNESSES ⇨211(2) — PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION—PHYSICIAN—PATIENT'S MENTAL CAPACITY.

In a suit to set aside a will because of testator's mental incapacity, a hypothetical question calling for an opinion regarding the testator's mental capacity was correctly excluded under Code Civ. Proc. § 1881, providing that a physician cannot, without the patient's consent, be examined as to information acquired while treating the patient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 773; Dec. Dig. ⇨211(2).]

5. WILLS ⇨53(8)—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY — ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE — BUSINESS TRANSACTION.

In a suit contesting a will for mental incapacity, exclusion of testimony regarding a real estate transaction by testator is proper where it was not shown, nor offered to be shown, that the testator's conduct was abnormal.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

In the Matter of the Estate of Isaac J. Ross, deceased. The will was admitted to probate, and T. F. Ross and W. J. Ross instituted contest proceedings against B. F. Van Dyke, executor and proponent, to have such admission revoked. Judgment of nonsuit, and contestants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, J. W. Dignan, of Oakland, and H. F. Chadbourne, of San Francisco, for appellants. Driver & Driver, of Sacramento, and John L. McNab, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Appellants instituted a contest to revoke the probate of the will of their deceased father, upon the ground that at the time of the execution of the will he was incompetent and was not of sound and disposing mind and memory. They introduced evidence, and when they rested their case the court granted a motion for a nonsuit upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence.

[1] Opposing counsel do not agree upon the principles governing trial courts in granting or refusing to grant nonsuits for insufficiency of the evidence. So often and so clearly has this court spoken upon the subject that it had reason to hope that the guiding principles could not be misunderstood either by judges or attorneys, for the rule is not difficult of comprehension. As said in Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 450, 117 Pac. 532:

"The rule is well established that in contests of wills, as in other civil actions, in determining whether the evidence presented was sufficient to take the case from a jury, the entire evidence presented is to be viewed from a point most favorable to the contestant. Disregard is had of any contradictory evidence. All facts supporting the case of contestant must be taken as true and all presumptions from the evidence and all reasonable inferences susceptible of being drawn therefrom must be considered as facts proven in his favor. Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252."

In Freese v. Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, 139 Cal. 392, 73 Pac. 172, it is said:

"It is not disputed, and cannot well be under the decisions, that a motion for a nonsuit should not be granted where plaintiff's evidence is such that, if the case had gone to a jury on that evidence and a verdict had been rendered for him, the evidence would be held sufficient to support the judgment upon the verdict. The rules as to nonsuit are the same, whether the trial is by the court or by a jury."

To like effect are Goldstone v. Merchants' Ice & Cold Storage Co., 123 Cal. 625, 56 Pac. 776, Davis v. Crump, 162 Cal. 513, 123 Pac. 294, Burr v. United Railroads, 163 Cal. 664, 126 Pac. 873, with other decisions too numerous to call for mention. Says this court, in Burr v. United Railroads, supra:

"It is elementary that a motion for nonsuit is not to be granted where there is any substantial evidence which, with the aid of all legitimate inferences favorable to the plaintiff, would support a verdict or finding that the material allegations of the complaint are true."

And finally it may be added that in Estate of Caspar, 155 Pac. 631, this court, discussing the right and power of the trial court in directing verdicts, in ordering nonsuits, and in granting new trials, said:

"Next, it is beyond controversy that the right of a court to direct a verdict is, touching the condition of the evidence, absolutely the same as the right of the court to grant a nonsuit. It may grant a nonsuit only when, disregarding conflicting evidence and giving to plaintiff's evidence all the value to which it is legally entitled, herein indulging in every legitimate inference which may be drawn from that evidence, the result is a determination that there is no evidence of sufficient substantiality to support a verdict in favor of plaintiff if such a verdict were given. Of course, if in such a case no motion for nonsuit has been made and the issues have been turned over to the consideration of the jury, and that jury has rendered a verdict in favor of plaintiff, such verdict being unsupported by any substantial evidence, it becomes the imperative duty of the court to set it aside. Estate of Arnold, supra; Estate of Chevallier, 159 Cal. 161 [113 Pac. 130]; Marron v. Marron, 19 Cal. App. 326 [125 Pac. 914]. But when, and only when, the evidence of the proponent is thus insufficient, the court may and should, as has been said, grant a nonsuit, and may and should on motion direct a verdict."

With this unquestioned law before us, we may proceed to a consideration of the facts in this case, as shown by the evidence of contestants and appellants.

[2] What constitutes the mental capacity to make a will has been declared by this court in Estate of Motz, 136 Cal. 562, 69 Pac. 294, from the able case of Whitney v. Twombly, 136 Mass. 145, in the following language:

"If he is able to understand and carry in mind the nature and situation of his property and his relation to his relatives and those around him, with clear remembrance as to those in whom and those things in which he has been mostly interested, capable of understanding the act he is doing, and the relation in which he stands to the objects of his bounty, free from any delusion, the effect of disease, which might lead him to dispose of his property otherwise than he would if he knew and understood what he was doing, he has the capacity to make his will."

[3] It was shown that the testator was 86 years and 6 months of age at the time of his death. The will was executed upon the 31st of October and he died upon the 9th day of November following. For some time before his death he had been bedridden, afflicted with bed sores, totally unable to control his physical functions, and so little able to aid himself that he could not raise his hand to brush away the flies that lit on his face. The contestants are his two sons and only heirs at law. One son, W. J. Ross, is 63 years of age; the other son, T. F. Ross, 58 years of age. They had been and were to the time of their father's death devoted sons. They had helped by their own labors during their minority and thereafter to earn the property which their father possessed at the time of his death. They were in attendance upon him during his last sickness, and performed many of the trying but necessary services occasioned by that sickness. They were carpenters by trade, were advancing in years, were dependent upon their manual labor for their support, and had as property no more than home places to the value each of about $10,000, which their father had given them. By his will he disposed of approximately $20,000, a small part of which he left to a grandson, Elmer Ross, in trust for the education of Elmer's children—the testator's great grandchildren—the major portion of it being disposed of in the form of legacies to collateral relatives, to charitable institutions, and to friends. He expressly excluded his two sons, his sole heirs—

"for the reason that I have already provided for them by deeding to them certain real property in the town of San Leandro, the portion of each aggregating approximately the value of $10,000. It is my express desire and intention that the above-mentioned W. J. Ross and T. F. Ross shall take nothing more of my property of any nature or description."

It appears that he died intestate as to certain property, and that by the terms of the will his sons were excluded from any share even in that. Coming more specifically to the details of the mental and physical condition of the testator at the time of the making of the will in question, the evidence of the sons concerning his physical condition has already been sufficiently outlined. Further they bear witness:

That his enfeebled physical condition was accompanied by a corresponding enfeebled mental condition. He could not remember. He frequently could not understand. He had to be carried, and when carried and placed on the bed he "screamed and kicked" and "raved and wanted to know what I was going to do with him." He did not recognize the witness' wife, whom he knew perfectly well, and pushed her away and protested against her presence in the room.

He would "sleep a little while and then would holler again." "Often there was nothing wrong with him." "The nurse would come running in to see what was the matter. There would not be anything wrong, only that he was flighty." "He was very often in a stupor. Sometimes he would be in a stupor for two or three hours and in talking his mind wandered. He got so bad two months before he passed out, so bad we had to deny people coming in. He would hold up for a few minutes before them and then go to pieces and talk at random. He was getting weaker and weaker. I think he was of unsound mind because of his actions that we saw every day there. He was getting weaker and worse and worse. He finally got so, when he got so he could not write his own name, he was what you might say paralyzed—just lay there like a dead man."

The testator was able to write, but the will was signed for him, he making his mark. The nurse in attendance testified to the care and devotion which the sons showed to their father, and his apparent gratitude at having them there in attendance upon him. She corroborated all of the testimony touching the physical condition of the testator, and with the statement of the law before her, as above given (Estate of Motz, 136 Cal. 562, 69 Pac. 294), testified:

"That he was of unsound mind, and 'had no memory at all.' 'Was very notional and flighty.' He apparently had temporary control of his faculties to a certain extent, but was not capable of any continued effort of mind or memory. He remembered people, but almost immediately lost memory of passing events. 'Each day he remembered less and took less interest in everything.' 'I felt that the condition of mind that he was in that at the end he would make just what he did make—a muddle of the thing, and I did not want to be a witness to his will as I had to be to-day.'"

He expressed his intention to the nurse to leave all his property to his sons—the same intention which he had expressed to the sons themselves. Elmer Ross, the grandson and legatee under the will, testified to his belief in his grandfather's unsoundness, based upon the way he acted. He testifies:

"He knew me and had lots of confidence in me; consulted me on many things. Yet, when I would go into the bedroom he wouldn't know me. He wouldn't know me until somebody informed him who I was; not on every visit, but I mean the last month of his sickness. During the last month of his sickness he was in bed practically all the time. He was very weak; couldn't stand alone during the last month, of course."

Edgar Ross, another grandson, testifies to his grandfather's unsoundness of mind on the 26th of October, 1913. At that time his grandfather was so weak that he could not answer—

"he could not say a long sentence. He had a habit, or I don't know whether a weakness or habit, but he had his eyes closed all the time or most all the time. I started to kill the flies in the room. He was not able to raise his hand and shoo the flies away from his face. He weighed in his prime from 165 to 185 pounds, and had become so emaciated at this time that he weighed no more than 75 or 80 pounds." He had had two paralytic strokes preceding his fatal illness, and he frequently complained of pains in his head. "The principal reason I have for thinking his mind was unsound is that he was not able to carry on any conversation without going to sleep."

It does not seem to us that a discussion of this evidence is necessary. The cross-examination of these witnesses, while it may have impaired the weight to be given to their expressed opinion of the unsoundness of the mind of the testator, did no more than this. One and all the witnesses maintained their opinions and those opinions, taken with the other facts outlined, and with the inferences which might legitimately be drawn from those facts, demanded the submission of the case to the jury, for in ruling upon a nonsuit "all the evidence in favor of the contestant must be taken as true, and if contradictory evidence has been given it must be disregarded." Estate of Arnold, 147 Cal. 583, 82 Pac. 252. The reason for this rule is that every litigant who has presented substantial evidence, even under conflict, is entitled as of right in the first instance to the opinion of the jury, voiced in its verdict upon the weight of that evidence. Estate of Caspar, supra.

[4] In contemplation of the new trial two of the court's rulings upon the matter of evidence require attention. The first of these is the court's ruling sustaining an objection to a purported hypothetical question addressed to Dr. Michael, the testator's family physician. Aside from all objections to the form of the hypothetical question, it cannot be disputed but that if the hypothetical question correctly stated the truth, it was a direct effort to elicit from the testator's family physician in violation of the confidential relationship a statement which of necessity would be based, not upon the facts stated in the question, but on the facts as known to and believed by the physician himself—facts which the law forbade him to disclose. In other words, under the thinnest of disguises the question was an effort to have the witness declare that which the law has said that he should not declare. Code Civ. Proc. § 1881. The ruling excluding the inquiry was proper.

[5] A witness who had had a single transaction with the testator years before the making of the will, which transaction, as he describes it, was "simply a real estate transaction," was asked to tell the story. Objection was made and sustained. The objection was that the period was too remote for the purpose of showing the mentality of the testator at the time of the execution of the will. There was nothing to show, nor did contestants offer to show, that the conduct of the testator at that time was any different from the conduct of normal men under like circumstances. The ruling rejecting the evidence was therefore proper.

For the reasons already given the court erred in granting the nonsuit. Wherefore the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Merle J. Rogers, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of John Darling, deceased. From a decree of distribution among David Darling and others William Boosey, as guardian of the estate of Arnold Darling, sometimes known as Arnold Darling Bennison, a minor, appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Robert M. Clarke, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Chas. F. Blackstock, of Oxnard, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal from a decree of distribution by the guardian of one Arnold Darling Bennison, a minor, sometimes known as Arnold Darling. The appeal really presents but one question, and there is no controversy as to the facts.

Deceased died February 11, 1914. He did not provide in his will for the disposition of his property. He left surviving him two sons and a daughter. Another son, John Darling, Jr., died prior to the death of deceased. Arnold Darling Bennison is the issue of the marriage of said John Darling, Jr., and Carrie Arnold Darling (who died February 12, 1900), born November 23, 1897. On August 29, 1903, he was regularly adopted in accord with the laws of this state by H. G. Bennison and Eda Bennison, his wife, the order of the judge of the superior court declaring that he shall henceforth be regarded and treated in all respects as their child, and shall henceforth bear the name of Arnold Darling Bennison. Both H. G. Bennison and Eda Bennison still survive. The minor claims upon these facts that he succeeded upon the death of deceased to one-fourth of his estate. The lower court concluded that this claim was unfounded, and distributed the estate in equal shares to the three surviving children of deceased.

The question then is, Does an adopted child succeed to the share in the estate of the father of his father by blood that such father by blood would have succeeded to had he survived his father? Our law of succession applicable here is that portion of subdivision 1 of section 1386, Civil Code, reading as follows:

“If the decedent leaves no surviving husband or wife, but leaves issue, the whole estate goes to such issue; and if such issue consists of more than one child living, or one child living and the lawful issue of one or more deceased children, then the estate goes in equal shares to the children living, or to the child living and the issue of the deceased child or children by right of representation.” (The italics are ours.)

The theory of the respondents, the surviving children of deceased, is that, by reason of the adoption of the minor by the Bennisons, he was thenceforth not “issue of the deceased child,” Arnold Darling, Jr., within the meaning of that term as used in the provision quoted, and therefore not entitled to share in his grandfather's estate as the representative of his deceased natural father. If he is to be regarded as being at the date of the death of deceased “issue of the deceased child” within the meaning of that term as so used, it is clear that he succeeded to one-fourth of the estate of deceased.

[1-4] It is to be borne in mind that in this state both the right of inheritance and the subject of adoption with the rights and obligations springing therefrom are purely matters of statutory regulation. See Estate of Jobson, 164 Cal. 312, 128 Pac. 938, 43 L. R. A.

(N. S.) 1062. It appears to be well settled in all jurisdictions where the common law constitutes the rule of decision, that the right of inheritance of a child is affected by its adoption only to the extent that the statutes bearing on the matter in terms or by implication provide. There is no provision in any of our statutes of succession or those relating to adoption that in terms refers to the matter of inheritance. Our adoption statutes substantially provide simply that an order shall be made—"declaring that the child shall thenceforth be regarded and treated in all respects as the child of the person adopting"; that after adoption the child and the person adopting "shall sustain toward each other the legal relation of parent and child, and have all the rights and be subject to all the duties of that relation," and that:

"The parents of an adopted child are, from the time of the adoption, relieved of all parental duties towards, and all responsibility for, the child so adopted, and have no right over it." Civ. Code, §§ 227-229.

But it is settled that the necessary effect of these provisions is to establish as between the adopting parent and the adopted child the legal relation of parent and child, with all the incidents and consequences of that relation, including the right of the child to inherit as a child from the adopting parent (Estate of Newman, 75 Cal. 213, 16 Pac. 887, 7 Am. St. Rep. 146) and the right of the adopting parent to inherit as a father from the adopted child (Estate of Jobson, 164 Cal. 312, 128 Pac. 938, 43 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1062). The adopting parent is by the adoption substituted for the parent by blood, with all of its logical results, that is, in so far as the parents by blood, the adopting parents, and the adopted child are concerned. As between these parties the child is thenceforth, in a legal sense, the child of the adopting parents; and, as said in Estate of Jobson, supra, the adopting parent is thenceforth, so far as concerns all legal rights and duties flowing from the relation of parent and child, the parent of the adopted child, while the parent by blood ceases to be in a legal sense the parent; his place being taken by the adopting parent. Such being the status of the adopted child, it necessarily follows, as held in Younger v. Younger, 106 Cal. 377, 39 Pac. 779, that the jurisdiction of a court in a divorce action between the parents by blood to give such direction for the custody, care, and education "of the children of the marriage" as may seem necessary or proper (section 138, Civ. Code) cannot exist as to any such child after its adoption by another. It was substantially said in the case just cited that the various provisions of the Code are to be construed in harmony, and so as to give all their appropriate and intended effect, and that section 138, Civil Code, must be considered in connection with the statutes relative to adoption, with the result that a child of the marriage adopted by another could no longer be considered a child of the marriage within the meaning of said section. Of course the only relation here involved was that between the parents by blood, the parents by adoption, and the adopted child. It also necessarily follows that the adopted child must inherit just as a child by blood from the adopting parents, for otherwise it would not have all the rights of the legal relation of parent and child, as the adoption statute provides it shall have. Accordingly it was held in Estate of Newman, supra, that, construing subdivision 1, § 1386, Civil Code, in harmony with the adoption statute, the word "issue" therein "does not limit the right of inheritance to the natural children only," but was there used in the same sense as the word "child" or "children," and included an adopted child of the deceased to whose estate succession was claimed by such adopted child. Here the only relation involved was that between the person adopting and the adopted child. It also necessarily follows that the adopting parents must inherit from the adopted child to the exclusion of the parents by blood, and that on the question of succession to the estate of an adopted child, section 1386, Civil Code, construed in harmony with the adoption statutes when speaking of "father" or "mother," means the father or mother by adoption. Such was the ruling in Estate of Jobson, supra. Again, it is to be observed that the only relation involved was that between the parents by blood, the persons adopting, and the adopted child. The court took occasion to say:

"It should perhaps be added that the case before us presents no question of the effect of adoption upon the rights of any persons except the natural parents, the child, and the adopting parent inter sese. There is no occasion to express any opinion, and we express none, upon the existence of rights that might be claimed collaterally by either party to the adoption; that is to say, as against the natural kin of the other."

One other consequence in the matter of inheritance may be noted as arising from the same relation, viz., that the children of the adopted child take by inheritance from the adopting parent as issue of such adopting parent. This was practically the question decided in Estate of Winchester, 140 Cal. 468, 74 Pac. 10. See, also, Power v. Hafley, 85 Ky. 671, 4 S. W. 683; Atchison v. Atchison's Ex'r, 89 Ky. 488, 12 S. W. 942; Gray v. Holmes, 57 Kan. 220, 45 Pac. 596, 33 L. R. A. 207; Pace v. Klink, 51 Ga. 221. Here again it is to be observed that really the only relation involved is that of the adopting parent and the adopted child. If, as was observed in the Winchester Case, the two—

"sustain towards each other the legal relation of parent and child, and have all the rights and be subject to all the duties of that relation, it must follow that the children of an adopted child take by inheritance (from the adopting father) as issue of the adopting father."

And section 1386 Code of Civil Procedure, when construed in harmony with the adoption statutes, must be construed as so providing.

[5] The adoption statutes of this state do not purport to affect the relationship of any person other than that of the parents by blood, the adopting parents, and the child. It is the person adopting and the child who, by the express terms of the section, after adoption "shall sustain towards each other the legal relation of parent and child and have all the rights and be subject to all the duties of that relation," and it is the parents by blood who, from the time of the adoption, are "relieved of all parental duties towards, and all responsibilities for the child so adopted, and have no right over it," and are, in the eyes of the law, no longer its parents. The adoption simply fixes the status of the child as to its former and adopted parents. To its grandparents by blood it continues to be a grandchild, and the child of its parents by blood. It does not acquire new grandparents in the persons of the father and mother of an adopting parent.

It is only in so far as it is necessary to protect the full rights of the child as a child of the adopting parents and the corresponding rights of the adopting parents as father and mother of the adopted child that the statutes relative to adoption can play any part in the construction of section 1386, Civil Code, the inheritance statute here involved. As was said in Hockaday v. Lynn, 200 Mo. 456, 98 S. W. 585, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 117, 118 Am. St. Rep. 672, 9 Ann. Cas. 775:

"In fact, it may be laid down as a general conclusion that while the statute of adoption must be read into the statute of dower and that of descents and distribution, it is with this singularity, always to be observed, viz., that the adopted child is so let in only for the purpose of preserving in full its right of inheritance from its adoptive parent."

This was followed by the statement, "And the door to inheritance is shut and its bolt shot at that precise point," a statement which appears to be sustained by the authorities generally, in the absence of plain statutory provision to the contrary. The result would appear to be that within the meaning of subdivision 1, § 1386, Civil Code, Arnold Darling Bennison was, at the date of the death of deceased, so far as deceased himself was concerned, "issue" or a "child" of his deceased child, John Darling, Jr., and entitled to succeed as such to the share his father would have taken if alive, by right of representation.

So far as we have been able to find, there is no decision given under statutes anything like ours, to the effect that the adopted child has any right of inheritance as to the ancestors or collateral kindred of the adopting parents, or is deprived by the adoption of any right of inheritance that he had as to the ancestor and collateral kindred of his parents by blood. In 1 Corpus Juris, 1401, it is said:

"In a few states the statutes expressly provide that an adopted child may inherit from certain relatives of the adoptive parent. In the absence, however, of such special provision, an adopted child cannot inherit from the collateral kindred of its adopted parent, nor from the ancestor of such parent, nor from his natural children."

In Merritt v. Morton, 143 Ky. 133, 136 S. W. 133, 33 L. R. A. (N. S.) 139, the statute provided that the child shall become the heir at law of such person so adopting him or her, and be as capable of inheriting as though he or she was the child of such person, and it was held that the adopted child could not inherit from his adopting mother's mother. In Sunderland Estate, 60 Iowa, 732, 13 N. W. 655, it was held that the child could not inherit from the father of her deceased adopting father, for she was not by the adoption made the heir of such father's father, or given any right of inheritance by right of representation. In Phillips v. McConica, 59 Ohio St. 1, 51 N. E. 445, 69 Am. St. Rep. 753, it was held that the statute enables the adopted child to inherit from the adopting person, but not through him. In Van Der lyn v. Mack, 137 Mich. 146, 100 N. W. 278, 66 L. R. A. 437, 109 Am. St. Rep. 669, 4 Ann. Cas. 879, Moore v. Moore's Estate, 35 Vt. 98, and Hockaday v. Lynn, 200 Mo. 456, 98 S. W. 585, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 117, 118 Am. St. Rep. 672, 9 Ann. Cas. 775, the right of the adopted child to inherit from the brother of the deceased adopting parent was denied, while in Helms v. Elliott, 89 Tenn. 448, 14 S. W. 930, 10 L. R. A. 535, and Keegan v. Geraghty, 101 Ill. 26, it was held that the adopted child could not inherit from the other children of the adopting parent. No case has been cited or found by us that is opposed to any of these decisions where the statutes applicable were, in all material respects, similar to our own statutes. They all rest upon the doctrine that the rights of inheritance of the adopted child are affected by the adoption only in so far as the statutes expressly or by necessary implication affect them, and that the mere establishment of the relation of parent and child between the adopting parent and the child, with all its consequent rights and duties, affects only the relative rights of inheritance of the parties to the contract, the parents by blood, the adopting parents, and the child, and has no effect at all as to the rights of the child in so far as the ancestor or collateral kindred of its parents by blood are concerned. It is stated in the note to Hockaday v. Lynn, supra, in 118 Am. St. Rep. 672, 686, that the adoption of a child does not deprive him of his right to inherit from his relatives by blood, unless the statute provides otherwise, and clearly this must be so. Our statute does in effect provide, as we have seen, that he can no longer inherit from his parents by blood, because so far as they are concerned he is no longer their child. But his relationship to his grandparents by blood on either side is not affected by the adoption. As to them he is, notwithstanding the adoption, the "issue" or child of their child within the meaning of section 1386, Civil Code.

In view of what we have said it is apparent that the minor child of John Darling, Jr., succeeded, by right of representation, to the share in the estate of deceased that said John Darling, Jr., would have succeeded to had he been living at the death of deceased.

The decree of distribution is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter a decree in accord with the views herein expressed

1. INSURANCE — 665(2) — RISK — PAROL CONTRACT — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence, in an action to recover the amount of a fire insurance policy issued upon certain furniture, held to sustain a finding that the property was covered by a parol contract of insurance at the time of the fire.

2. INSURANCE — 96 — AGENCY FOR INSURED — AUTHORITY.

The direction of the owner of furniture to an insurance broker to place insurance for her, and take care of her insurance and see that she was covered to a certain amount constituted the broker a general agent to keep her insured in such amount.

3. INSURANCE — 229(3) — AGENCY FOR INSURED — POWER.

A general agent to keep one insured to a certain amount was authorized, as an incident of his employment, to accept and act upon a notice of cancellation of a policy, and to procure insurance in another company.

4. INSURANCE — 112 — AGENCY FOR INSURED — RATIFICATION AFTER LOSS.

A ratification of the action of an insurance broker in procuring a policy for the insured, though made subsequent to a loss, is valid.

5. INSURANCE — 112 — AGENCY FOR INSURED — RATIFICATION.

Insured, by filing her claim of loss and demanding payment, thereby ratified the action of her broker in accepting a notice of the cancellation of a policy and in procuring a policy in defendant, another company.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by H. M. Farrar against the Western Assurance Company. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Rehearing denied in Supreme Court, 159 Pac. 611.

J. F. Riley, of San Francisco, for appellant. Bacigalupi & Elkus and Jewel Alexander, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial in an action brought against the defendant to recover the sum of $1,000, the amount of a fire insurance policy claimed by plaintiff to have been issued by the defendant upon certain furniture belonging to the former's assignor.

Several years before the fire which destroyed the furniture in question, Mrs. Margaret M. Plier, its owner, had authorized Clarence Coleman, an insurance broker, to place $1,000 insurance thereon, the property being contained in a certain hotel in San Francisco. Coleman did so, selecting the St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Company. At that time, and up to the time of the fire, Mrs. Plier was carrying other insurance upon the furniture in the sum of $500, which was placed independently of Coleman. Each year when the $1,000 policy was about to expire Coleman would renew it, and Mrs. Plier would pay the premium. On one occasion, a small loss by fire having occurred, he attended to the matter of its adjustment in so satisfactory a manner to the insured that she told him to thereafter take care of her insurance and to keep her covered in good companies in the sum of $1,000. On May 15, 1911, the St. Paul Fire & Marine Insurance Company notified Coleman in writing that, after an examination of the premises in which the insured property was situated, it felt constrained to cancel its policy, and thereby gave Coleman the five days' notice of cancellation as required by the terms of the policy. Coleman immediately attempted to see Mrs. Plier in order to obtain possession of the policy for the purpose of returning it to the company, whereupon she would be entitled to be repaid the unearned premium thereon. Failing to see Mrs. Plier, Coleman on May 18, 1911, offered to the defendant company this insurance. The latter's "countermand," who was authorized to accept insurance, refused to take the responsibility in this instance of accepting the risk, and referred Coleman to the manager of the company, one Miller. After some persuasion on the part of the broker Miller agreed to take the insurance, and on May 20th a written application was made to the company. On May 27th Coleman, not having received the policy, telephoned to the office of the defendant and inquired about it, and was informed that the policy was ready but not signed, and that it would be sent over to him on the following Monday morning. Early that Monday morning (May 29, 1911), the fire occurred and the property insured was totally destroyed. From May 20th, when the application for the insurance was left with the company, up to the time of the fire, the defendant appears to have considered that it was carrying the risk. Entries in its books made in the ordinary course of business so indicated, and this insurance was included in a statement made to the home office of the company of business recently transacted, and after the fire a statement was sent to Coleman, showing that he had been charged with the premium on this insurance.

[1] We do not doubt from all the circumstances of the case that the finding of the court that this property was covered by a parol contract of insurance at the time of the fire is amply sustained by the evidence. Such contracts under similar circumstances are not uncommon. Field v. Lamson, Goodnow Mfg. Co., 162 Mass. 388, 38 N. E. 1126, 27 L. R. A. 136. They are valid and enforceable in this state. Harron v. City of London Fire Ins. Co., 88 Cal. 16, 25 Pac. 982; Gold v. Sun Ins. Co., 73 Cal. 218, 14 Pac. 786; American C. Co. v. Agricultural Ins. Co., 12 Cal. App. 133, 106 Pac. 720.

"If an agent, authorized to accept risks, accepts a risk by parol, promising to deliver the policy, the insurance begins with the acceptance, and the contract in parol continues until the policy is delivered, when it is superseded by the policy." Western Assurance Co. v. McAlpin, 23 Ind. App. 220, 55 N. E. 119, 77 Am. St. Rep. 423.

[2, 3] The only really serious question in this case is whether or not Clarence Coleman was acting within the scope of his authority in placing this insurance. Notwithstanding that the property which it covered according to the findings of the court—based on sufficient evidence—was reasonably worth approximately $2,500, its owner intended to carry no more than $1,500 insurance upon it, of which she had personally attended to placing $500, and was relying upon Coleman to take care of the remainder. At the time of the fire she knew nothing about the contemplated cancellation or the new insurance. Upon learning of the fire and of the condition of her insurance she filed proofs of loss with all three companies. From the other companies she obtained in settlement of the loss approximately the amount of the face of the policies, but the defendant denied responsibility upon its policy and refused to pay, whereupon the insured assigned her claim to the plaintiff, who at once commenced this action.

We think the defendant is liable. Perhaps when Coleman placed the first insurance for Mrs. Plier he was merely an insurance solicitor, whose authority was quite limited, but later, as we have seen, she extended his authority by telling him "to take care of her insurance and to see that she was covered to the amount of $1,000." At another place in the record she is shown to have testified as follows:

"A. About the Western Assurance, I never told him what company to insure me in. I just said, 'Insure me for $1,000,' and that was all. As long as it was covered, that is all I cared. Q. As long as it was covered? A. Yes, sir. Q. It says, 'I looked upon him as a solicitor only.' A. I don't know about solicitor—I only told him to insure me and keep me insured. Q. To keep you insured? A. To keep me covered—that is all I cared—as long as I was in a good company."

Coleman's testimony we think tends to corroborate the testimony of Mrs. Plier; but we are satisfied that the direction by Mrs. Plier to Coleman just referred to made him more than a mere soliciting insurance agent, and constituted him, as found by the court, her general agent to keep her insured to the extent of $1,000 in respect to the property here involved. Being her general agent for this purpose, we think he was authorized, as an incident of his employment, to accept and to act upon a notice of cancellation. Stevenson v. Sun Ins. Office, 17 Cal. App. 280, 119 Pac. 529.

"A general agent with power to insure property and to keep it insured may accept notice of cancellation and procure substituted insurance or renewal of insurance in another company." 22 Cyc. 1447; Aetna Ins. Co. v. Renno, 96 Miss. 172, 50 South. 563; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. State, 76 Ark. 180, 88 S. W. 917, 6 Ann. Cas. 440; Schauer v. Queen's Ins. Co., 88 Wis. 561, 60 N. W. 994; Todd v. German-Am. Ins. Co., 23 Ga. App. 789, 59 S. E. 94.

The record does not show upon what ground the insured, after the cancellation of the policy, obtained a settlement of her claim against the St. Paul Company. Evidently for some good reason it deemed itself responsible on the policy and paid the loss. The trial court found that the policy in that company had been canceled. However, the circumstances of that transaction are not before us, and therefore have no bearing upon the determination of this case. Here it appears that Coleman, in the careful discharge of his duty as general agent, effected a valid contract of insurance with the defendant upon his principal's property, the obligation of which is not dependent upon the transaction with the St. Paul Company.

[4, 5] But even if Coleman were not the general agent for the assured, still the finding of the court as to his authority would have to be sustained on the theory that his action in procuring the policy in the defendant company was ratified by his principal. In filing her claim of loss and demanding payment, she ratified the action of her agent. The authorities seem to hold that a ratification, though made subsequent to a loss, is valid.

In the case of Boutwell v. Globe & Rutgers' Fire Ins. Co. of N. Y., 193 N. Y. 323, 85 N. E. 1087, an agent was instructed by his principal to carry a certain amount of insurance on each of two certain barges. The agent, being in some doubt as to the amount in force on the barges, and endeavoring to carry out his instructions, took out other insurance, and advised his principal of what he had done. Upon discovering that he had contracted for a larger amount than his instructions warranted—which was on the following day—he returned the policies to the insurance company, requesting in effect that the transaction be treated as if the policies had never been issued, and so be without premium charge. This the defendant refused, but suggested that the insurance would be canceled at short rates. With the proposition in this shape one of the barges was destroyed, whereupon the owner tendered defendant the premium upon the policy issued, and later duly presented proof thereunder. In that case the agent does not seem to have been given as wide a power as the broker here; and, while the opinion proceeds upon the theory that under the circumstances of the case the defendant was estopped from denying its liability, still to so hold it was necessary—and accordingly the court did hold—that the owner had a legal right to ratify the acts of his agent and accept the contract even after the occurring of the loss.

In the case of Todd v. German-American Ins. Co. of N. Y., 2 Ga. App. 789, 59 S. E. 94, the court say that, assuming that Turpin (the agent) acted for Todd, and procured from the defendant a policy of insurance in Todd's favor, and paid the premium or became responsible to pay the same, Todd could after the fire, upon discovery of the fact that Turpin had assumed to act for him, ratify the contract and hold the insurance company upon it. The court observes that it must be admitted that in the case of a ratification the parties do not generally stand upon even terms, since the principal may always elect to ratify the act if it is for his benefit, and disavow it if it is to his injury, but this consequence has never been allowed to overcome the force of the general doctrine.

In the case of Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Hancock, 123 Cal. 222, 55 Pac. 905, the defendant took out insurance in favor of an estate in which he was an heir. Later upon demand he refused to pay the premium, whereupon suit was commenced to compel him so to do. In sustaining a judgment against him the court thus states the law:

"Although defendant had no authority to procure insurance for the administratrix, yet she could have ratified his act even after the occurrence of a loss."

The judgment and order are affirmed.

(S. F. 7940.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 17, 1916.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by H. M. Farrar against the Western Assurance Company. Application by defendant for a hearing after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District (159 Pac. 609), affirming a judgment for plaintiff. Application denied.

J. F. Riley, of San Francisco, for appellant. Bacigalupi & Elkus and Jewel Alexander, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District (159 Pac. 609) is denied. In denying the application we deem it proper to say that we do not express any view on the question of ratification discussed in the opinion. A decision on that question is not essential to a determination of the case, in view of what is correctly held in the opinion as to the status and authority of Coleman.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Louisa R. Freitas against M. F. Freitas, Jr., and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and certain defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Louis B. Diavila, of Oakland (Jos. P. Lucey, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. Rose & Silverstein, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff in this case is the widow of Manuel T. Freitas, deceased. The defendants Manuel F. Freitas, Jr., Mary Freitas Lopez, Francisco Freitas, and Anna Freitas Nula are the children of said deceased by a former marriage. The defendant Unica Portuguesa de Estado da California is a beneficiary corporation. The complaint in substance alleged, and the trial court in effect found, that the plaintiff was induced to marry Manuel T. Freitas, since deceased, by an antenuptial agreement, wherein he promised the plaintiff that if she would marry him he would make her the beneficiary of a policy of life insurance in the sum of $1,000, which he then held and which had been issued to him by the corporation defendant. Upon his marriage to the plaintiff Freitas, with the intent and purpose of performing his antenuptial promise, caused the plaintiff to be named as the beneficiary in the policy of insurance, and thereupon delivered the same to her. Subsequently he secured possession of the policy and, without the consent or knowledge of the plaintiff, caused the children above mentioned to be substituted as beneficiaries, and they were the beneficiaries named in the policy at the time of his death. The corporation defendant did not defend against the action, but deposited in court the amount called for in the policy subject to a determination of the conflicting claims of the plaintiff and the other defendants. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, from which the individual defendants alone have appealed.

[1] The demurrer of these last-named defendants to the complaint was rightly overruled. Having paid the fund in controversy into court, the corporation defendant in effect waived any defense it might have had against either or both of the conflicting claimants; and, being apparently satisfied with the lower court's adjudication of the controversy, it is of no consequence whether or not the complaint stated a cause of action against the corporation. Jory v. Supreme Council, etc., 105 Cal. 20, 38 Pac. 524, 26 L. R. A. 733, 45 Am. St. Rep. 17; Adams v. Grand Lodge, 105 Cal. 321, 38 Pac. 914, 45 Am. St. Rep. 45; Hoelt v. Supreme Lodge, 113 Cal. 91, 45 Pac. 185, 33 L. R. A. 174; Supreme Council v. Murphy, 65 N. J. Eq. 60, 55 Atl. 507, 509.

[2] The complaint as between the plaintiff and the appealing defendants stated a cause of action. The case of Gagossian v. Arakehian, 9 Cal. App. 571, 99 Pac. 1113, has no application to the facts of the present case. Here the cause of action relied upon proceeded upon the theory that the plaintiff had acquired an equitable right to the sum secured by the policy of insurance which the insured could not defeat by any act of his, and which the individual defendants, as mere voluntary beneficiaries possessing no equities, could not deny. That such a right may be acquired under the facts pleaded here, and will when established receive recognition and protection at the hands of a court of equity, is settled in this state. Adams v. Grand Lodge, supra; Jory v. Supreme Council, supra.

[3] The complaint states a cause of action notwithstanding the fact that the antenuptial agreement pleaded was not alleged to have been reduced to writing as required by section 1624, Civ. Code, and section 1973 of the Code of Civil Procedure. As a matter of pleading the agreement was presumed to be in writing.

[4, 5] The evidence supports the findings, and the findings support the judgment. While the evidence shows, and the court in effect found, that the antenuptial agreement was not expressed in writing, nevertheless the evidence further shows, and the court found, that in keeping with his agreement and the consideration of the plaintiff's marriage to him, Freitas, the insured, procured her to be designated as a beneficiary of the sum secured by the policy of insurance. The antenuptial contract thereby became fully executed (Supreme Lodge K. of P. v. Ferrell, 83 Kan. 491, 33 L. R. A. [N. S.] 777, 112 Pac. 155), and it is settled law that the statute of frauds has no application to an executed oral agreement (Bates v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 479, 488, 30 Pac. 605, 16 L. R. A. 745, 29 Am. St. Rep. 133).

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

FREITAS v. FREITAS et al. (Civ. 1755.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 28, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 25, 1916.)

MONEY RECEIVED — 5 — MUTUAL BENEFIT INSURANCE — CHANGE OF BENEFICIARIES — RIGHTS OF PREVIOUS BENEFICIARY.

Where plaintiff, a former beneficiary, was entitled to insurance proceeds which the insurer had paid to substituted beneficiaries, held that plaintiff could recover from such beneficiaries upon an implied promise, although there was no privity of contract between them.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Louisa R. Freitas against Manuel F. Freitas, Jr., and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Louis B. Diavila, of Oakland (Jos. P. Lucey, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. Rose & Silverstein, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Save in one particular the facts in this case, as shown by the pleadings and proof, are in their essential features substantially the same as those pleaded and proven in the case of Freitas v. Freitas, No. 1754, 159 Pac. 611, this day decided, the present case being different only in the particular that the beneficial society in which the deceased was insured had, upon the death of the deceased, paid to the defendants the sum of $1,500 called for by the policy of insurance. As a consequence the society was not made a party defendant. Judgment went for the plaintiff, from which the defendants severally appeal upon the grounds that the complaint does not state a cause of action, and that the findings do not support the judgment.

Here, as in the case above mentioned, the plaintiff's cause of action proceeded, upon the theory that the plaintiff had acquired a superior equitable title to the sum in suit; and, for the reasons stated in said case numbered 1754, and upon the authority of the cases therein cited, we are of the opinion that the facts pleaded in the present case are sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the defendants, who were alleged and shown to be mere voluntary beneficiaries. True it is, as counsel for the defendants contend, that the plaintiff's cause of action pleaded savors strongly of an action for money had and received. Such an action, however, may be successfully maintained even though not founded upon allegations showing an express privity of contract between the parties. This is so upon the theory that if one of the parties has received money due and owing to the other under circumstances which make it his duty to surrender the money to the rightful owner, the law will imply the promise to do so, and thereby create the requisite contractual privity. Commissioners v. Bloomington, 253 Ill. 164, 97 N. E. 280, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 477; Kreutz v. Livingston, 15 Cal. 344; Colusa Co. v. Glenn County, 117 Cal. 434, 49 Pac. 457; Whittle v. Whittle, 5 Cal. App. 696, 91 Pac. 170.

It is conceded that the evidence supports the findings; and, if we be correct in the conclusion that the facts stated in the complaint show a cause of action, then it follows that the findings, which are in substantial accord with the allegations of the complaint, support the judgment.

The point made concerning the invalidity of the antenuptial contract, and the consequences claimed to flow therefrom, was also made in the case previously decided, and therein determined adversely to the contention of the defendants. It need not therefore be again adverted to.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WHITCOMB v. WORTHING et al.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 2, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 31, 1916.)

1. DEEDS — 129(1) — CONSTRUCTION — ESTATE CREATED — LIFE ESTATE.

A deed of grant providing that the grantee should hold the property until his death, when it should revert to the grantor's heirs, held to convey only a life estate, notwithstanding general expressions conveying the property to the grantee and his heirs.

2. DEEDS — 90 — CONSTRUCTION — CONFLICTING CLAUSES.

A deed is to be construed like any other contract, and its intent arrived at by a consideration of the entire instrument.

3. LIFE ESTATES — 8 — ADVERSE POSSESSION — HOSTILE CHARACTER — PURCHASER OF LIFE ESTATE.

Possession by the purchaser of a life estate is not adverse to the reversioner's heirs, and the statute does not run against them until the life tenant's death.

4. ESTOPPEL — 71 — EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL — GROUNDS — DISCLAIMER.

Previous ex parte statements that they claimed no interest in a certain lot does not estop the defendants in a suit to quiet title from asserting an interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 173-182; Dec. Dig. 71.]

5. JUDGMENT — 533 — DECREE — CONSTRUCTION — MATTERS DETERMINED.

An adjudication that plaintiff's predecessor was granted only a life estate in certain lots except one, as to which no determination was made, did not operate to decree in him the absolute title to that lot.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR $\hookrightarrow$ 706(1)—REVIEW — RESERVING GROUND FOR REVIEW.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action to quiet title by Fred S. Whitcomb against Chastina M. Worthing, Clinton G. Gaylord, John L. Gaylord, and F. C. Howes, trustee. Judgment for plaintiff, and all the defendants, except the trustee, appeal from the judgment and an order denying their motion for new trial. Order denying new trial reversed.

The appeal from the judgment was heretofore dismissed upon a motion made in open court and covered by a minute order only.

Tobias R. Archer, of Los Angeles, for appellants. George H. Woodruff and Clyde C. Shoemaker, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Action to quiet title to a town lot located in the county of Los Angeles. Plaintiff had judgment, from which certain of the defendants appealed. There was also an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial. This court heretofore dismissed the appeal from the judgment, and we have to consider questions presented by the motion for a new trial.

The appellants are heirs of Mary A. Gaylord, in whom title to the lot in question was absolutely vested in the year 1889. Subsequent to the year referred to said Gaylord became the wife of J. F. Twitchell. On December 3, 1891, she by deed conveyed to her husband four lots of land, which included the lot in question, and thereafter, on December 9, 1891, she died. The surviving heirs were her said husband and five children, among the latter these appellants.

[1, 2] The deed given by Mrs. Twitchell to her husband in 1891 was as to its general form a deed of grant, with the usual preliminary recitations that the grantor did—"give, grant, alien, and confirm unto the said party of the second part, and to his heirs and assigns forever, all those certain lots, pieces, or parcels of land situate," etc.

A description of the property conveyed followed, and then occurred this clause:

"Together with all water rights thereunto belonging, to the party of the second part, so long as he shall live, but at his death the said above-described property to revert to the heirs of the said party of the first part."

Other general terms followed to the effect that all and singular the tenements, appurtenances, etc., were to pass "unto the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, forever." The question as to whether this deed passed a fee title or only a life estate is one of the propositions argued in the briefs, the importance of which will appear in our later statements.

As we construe the instrument, however, we are satisfied that the intent was to restrict the estate in the hands of Twitchell, the husband, with the result that the only interest acquired by him in the real property was one which terminated upon his death. Deeds are to be construed like any other contract, and the intent of the parties arrived at by a consideration of the whole instrument, and not of detached clauses. Firth v. Los Angeles Pacific Land Co., 152 Pac. 935.

[3] Having announced this preliminary conclusion as to our construction of the deed given by Mrs. Twitchell to her husband, a further statement of the undisputed facts is as follows: On July 7, 1893, the lot in question was sold for the nonpayment of state and county taxes to S. M. Patten and a certificate of tax sale was issued to the purchaser. So far as the record shows, no tax deed was ever issued thereon. On August 14, 1895, J. F. Twitchell, the holder of the life estate, by quitclaim deed, conveyed his interest in the lot, to the wife of Patten, the purchaser at the delinquent tax sale. It is not shown when the Pattens or either of them took actual possession of the lot, but it may be assumed that they did so in 1895, upon receiving the quitclaim deed from Twitchell. On April 21, 1896, the plaintiff purchased the lot from Patten and his wife, and took an assignment of the certificate of tax sale, and also a quitclaim deed from the Pattens. This quitclaim deed contained the following clause:

"This conveyance is made to release all claim which the said parties of the first part have to the above described property on account of the life interest in the same of J. F. Twitchell, a widower, which said interest was duly assigned to the said Jefferson Patten on the 14th day of August, A. D. 1895, and also to release all claims acquired by the said parties of the first part or either of them on account of any tax sales of the above-described property prior to the date of this instrument."

The plaintiff, upon receiving the assignment of the tax sale certificate and the quitclaim deed from the Pattens, entered upon possession of the lot, and continuously thereafter farmed and cultivated the same and paid all taxes which had been levied and assessed since the year 1895. He claimed to be the absolute owner of the property, notwithstanding the fact in his quitclaim deed from the Pattens it was expressly stated that the intent was in part to transfer the estate which the Pattens had acquired "on account of the life interest" of Twitchell. Twitchell died in February, 1912, and this action was commenced on October 7, 1912. No claim is made, and indeed none could be maintained, that title was acquired under the transfer of the certificate of tax sale. Twitchell during his lifetime possessed the right to use and occupy the property; therefore his possession could in no case have been adverse to the claim which these appellants, the heirs of Mrs. Twitchell, had in the property. His grantee necessarily would be in no better situation with respect to that matter. The conclusion must necessarily follow that, so far as this plaintiff is concerned, or his immediate predecessors in interest, the Patens, possession of the lot as against the title of the heirs of Mary Twitchell did not and could not begin to be adverse until the death of Twitchell, which occurred, as before stated, in February, 1912. The statute of limitations, the running of which would confer prescriptive title upon the plaintiff, was not therefore set in motion until Twitchell died. Mann et al. v. Mann et al., 141 Cal. 326, 74 Pac. 995. The plaintiff did not wait for the period to expire requisite to sustain a prescriptive title, but about eight months after the death of Twitchell brought this action.

[4, 5] That the appellants may have, prior to the trial of the action, declared in an ex parte manner that they claimed no interest in the lot, was not an admission which would estop them from asserting title by pleading and proof, as they did in this action. There was a suit brought by Twitchell against the heirs to determine the respective rights in the lots included in the deed given Twitchell by his wife, which suit resulted in its being adjudicated that the interest granted was a life estate only. There was no determination made in that action as to the condition of the title to lot 23, that being the lot now in controversy. Twitchell therein alleged in his complaint that the lot was of "little or no value and which has been sold for taxes and not redeemed." The failure of the court to include this lot in its judgment in that action cannot be held to amount to a confirmation of the absolute title in Twitchell, or in the plaintiff or his predecessors in interest. There was simply a failure to determine the legal condition of the title—made, no doubt, for the reason that the parties assumed that the tax sale had foreclosed their rights in that property.

[6] Objection is made that the ruling on the motion for a new trial should not be considered, in that the grounds of the motion are not stated. It does appear on page 44 of the transcript, and as a part of the statement settled by the trial judge, that the appellants served and filed their notice of intention to move for a new trial, and such notice is set out, with general specifications of error. In the case cited by respondent (Morcom v. Baiersky, 16 Cal. App. 480, 117 Pac. 560), where this court declined to review the ruling on a motion for a new trial, the notice of intention did not appear in the transcript, nor were any of the grounds stated from which it could be determined what questions were before the trial court on the motion. The record here is not deficient in the same respects as was that in the case last cited. The decision in Cross v. Mayo, 167 Cal. 594, 140 Pac. 283, is an authority as to the sufficiency of a record like that here presented to authorize the court to review the order made on motion for a new trial.

For the foregoing reasons we conclude that the trial court was in error in its judgment, and that the motion for a new trial should have been granted.

The order denying the motion for a new trial is reversed.

U'REN v. STATE BOARD OF CONTROL
et al. (Civ. 1630.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California, June 26, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court, Aug. 25, 1916.)

1. STATES —67—CONSERVATION COMMISSION —POWERS AND DUTIES—STATUTE.

Under Pol. Code, § 472, providing that the Attorney General shall have charge of all legal matters in which the state is in any wise interested, and that no board shall employ an attorney other than the Attorney General, or one of his assistants or deputies in any matter in which the state is interested, and that such provision should not be construed to deny to any board, etc., the right to employ counsel in any matter of the state after having first obtained the attorney's written consent to do so, the state conservation commission, created by St. 1911, p. 822, and thereby authorized to employ professional and clerical assistants, might employ an attorney at law to compile the laws of different states, the federal government, and of other nations affecting conservation generally, as such services were not strictly professional, or such as only a licensed attorney at law could perform.

2. STATES —175—STATE BOARDS—CLAIMS—FORM.

Where the claim of an attorney employed in compilation work by the state conservation commission was made out, verified, and presented to the state board of control in the form and method which had been prescribed for previous months under its rules, the board, if it intended to require a different form or method of presenting the claim, should have based its rejection of it upon that ground, and permitted the plaintiff to remedy any defects in form, and, not having done so, could not be heard upon application for a writ of mandate to urge for the first time mere formal defects in the presentation of the plaintiff's claim.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. §§ 164, 165; Dec. Dig. —175.]

3. STATES —173—STATE BOARD OF CONTROL —ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS—DISCRETION.

The state board of control, created by St. 1911, p. 590, embracing Pol. Code, §§ 654-691, and with power to approve and allow claims for which no appropriation has been made and for which no fund is available, and claims for which an appropriation has been made or for which a state fund is available, as to a claim against the state treasury for his salary for one month as an employé of the state conservation commission, created by St. p. 823, with the power to enter into contracts of employment upon such terms as it might deem proper, and setting aside a specific fund in the state treasury for the payment of obligations created by it, upon approval of the claim, as evidenced by the commission's requisition upon the state treasury for its payment, was limited to the powers of an auditing body, passing only upon the sufficiency of the form of the claim.

4. MANDAMUS ☞101—PUBLIC BOARDS AND OFFICERS—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS.

Where an official or board is authorized by statute to create an obligation against a specific fund in the state treasury, and another official or board is intrusted with the powers of an auditor in respect to claims generally against the state, the powers and duties of the latter may be controlled by the courts, and be compelled by writs of mandate.

5. STATES ☞191(1)—CLAIMS AGAINST STATE—ACTION.

Where the state, by act of the Legislature, has set apart a specific fund for the payment of such obligations as the conservation commission had the power to create, through the employment of the plaintiff to assist in carrying into effect the objects of its existence, the state was in a position of having assented to the plaintiff's claim for salary, and he might maintain mandamus to compel the state board of control, as the official auditor, to perform a duty expressly enjoined upon it by law, without the consent of the state.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Seawell, Judge.

Mandamus by Milton T. U'Ren against the State Board of Control, John F. Neylan, Clyde L. Seavey and F. H. Bloodgood, as members thereof. Writ of mandate directed to issue and the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen. (Robert W. Harrison, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. Fred J. Goble, of Oakland (U'Ren & Beard, of Napa, of counsel), for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment ordering the issuance of a writ of mandate directed to the defendants, the state board of control, and also the members of said board, requiring them to audit and allow the claim of the plaintiff against the state treasury for the sum of $200 for his salary as an employé of the California state conservation commission for the month of July, 1912. Concerning the facts of the case there is no material dispute. The plaintiff, who is an attorney at law, was employed on or about July 1, 1911, by the California state conservation commission under the provisions of an act creating said commission (Stats. 1911, p. 822), by the terms of which it was authorized to employ—"for the purposes for which it was created such expert, technical, professional and clerical assistants, and upon such terms as it may deem proper." The particular service which the plaintiff was employed to perform was "to compile for the use of said state conservation commission the laws of the different nations, the federal government and the states of the Union affecting conservation generally." The plaintiff proceeded under such employment to do such work, and continued therein up to August 1, 1912. The salary claims for the intervening months up to July 1, 1912, were presented to and audited and approved by the board of control without objection but when on July 30, 1912, his salary claim for July was presented in the same form and manner in which his salary claims for previous months had been presented and allowed, it was refused allowance by the board of control, which action on the part of said last-named board led to this application for a writ of mandate to the superior court, which, upon hearing, was directed to be issued, whereupon the defendants took and now prosecute this appeal.

[1] There are two contentions of the appellants which may be disposed of upon the threshold. The first is that the plaintiff, being an attorney at law, and the services being in the nature of legal services, he could not be legally employed by the conservation commission without first having obtained the written consent so to do from the Attorney General under the express provisions of section 472 of the Political Code, which consent was not in fact obtained. We are of the opinion that this section of the Political Code has no application to the case at bar, nor to the plaintiff's employment. While it is true that the plaintiff was and is an attorney at law, and while it is true that the services which he was engaged to perform were of such a nature as might best be performed by one skilled in knowledge of the law, still they were not such services as were strictly professional in their nature, or as only a licensed attorney at law could perform, but, on the contrary, were in the main clerical in character which the plaintiff, or any one else with his ability, could well have performed without the possession of the title or license of an attorney at law. This being so, we hold with plaintiff that compliance with section 472 of the Political Code was not a prerequisite to the plaintiff's employment.

[2] The next contention of the appellant is that the claim of the plaintiff was properly rejected, for the reason that it was not presented in the form and manner provided by law. We find no merit in this contention, for the reasons that it is conceded that the claim was made out and verified and presented in the same form and method which had been pursued for several previous months under the rules of the state board of control, and upon which it had theretofore acted approvingly. If in this instance such board intended to require a different form or method of verifying and presenting this particular claim, it should have based its rejection of it upon that ground, and permitted plaintiff to remedy whatever defects in form existed, and, not having done this, it cannot be heard upon application for a writ of mandate to urge for the first time mere formal defects in the presentation of the plaintiff's claim.

This brings us to the main question involved in this appeal, which is as to the scope of the powers with which the board of control is invested in the matter of the allowance and rejection of claims on the state treasury in payment for services rendered to other boards and commissions of the state within the sphere of their respective functions, and for which they are by the several acts of their creation invested with the power to contract upon such terms as they may deem proper.

[3] It is the contention of the appellant that its powers in this respect are absolute, and that with its discretion in the allowance or rejection of any claim against the state treasury the courts have not the right or power to interfere. We cannot give our support to this contention. The state board of control was created under the provisions of the act of 1911, embracing sections 654 to 691 of the Political Code (Stats. 1911, p. 590), which act repealed all prior statutes relating to the creation, powers, and duties of prior auditing and examining boards, of which the state board of control was to be the successor. The powers and duties of this board were more ample and varied under the act of their creation than those of prior commissions or boards exercising similar functions had been; but in the matter of its relation to the various kinds of claims upon the state treasury, these are classified, and the powers and duties of the board with respect to them are set forth in the following sections of the Political Code:

Sec. 663. Claims against State. Every claim against the state for which an appropriation has been made or for which a state fund is available, must be presented to the board for its scrutiny before being paid. The board may for cause postpone action upon a claim for not exceeding one month.

Sec. 664. Any person having a claim against the state for which an appropriation has been made, may present the same to the board in the form of an account or petition, and the secretary of the board must date, number, and file such claim. The board must allow or reject the same within thirty days. The concurrence of two members of the board shall be required to approve and allow any claim against the state in whole or in part.

Sec. 667. If no appropriation has been made, or if no fund is available for the payment of any claim against the state, the settlement of which is provided by law, or if an appropriation or fund has been exhausted, such claim must be presented to the board, which shall audit the same, and if approved by at least a majority vote thereof, it shall, with the sanction of the Governor, be transmitted to the Legislature with a brief statement of the reasons for such approval.

Sec. 669. Any person having a claim against the state, the settlement of which is not otherwise provided for by law, must present the same to the board at least four months before the meeting of the Legislature, accompanied by a statement showing the facts constituting the claim, verified in the same manner as complaints in civil actions. Before finally passing upon any such claim, notice of the time and place of hearing must be mailed to the claimant at least fifteen days prior to the date set for final action. At the time designated the board must proceed to examine and adjust such claims. It may hear evidence in support of or against them, and, with the sanction of the Governor, report to the Legislature such facts and recommendations concerning them as may be proper. In making such recommendations the board may state and use any official or personal knowledge which any member thereof may have touching such claims.

An examination of these sections of the Political Code will show that there are two classes of claims which come within the purview of the state board of control. These are: First, claims for which an appropriation has been made or for which a state fund is available; and, second, claims for which no appropriation has been made, or for which for any reason no fund is available. The claim in question in the instant case comes within the first of these classes. The plaintiff was employed by the California state conservation commission to do certain work within the scope of its functions and at the fixed monthly sum for salary for which his claim was presented to the state board of control; the conservation commission having already approved said claim. The purposes for which the state board of control was created, and the powers with which it was invested, are, so far as may be discoverable from the terms of the statutes, in no very essential sense different from those governing the creation and defining the powers and duties of the state board of examiners, the final predecessor of the board of control. In the early case of Lawrence v. Booth, 46 Cal. 187, it was held that as to that class of claims against the state treasury of which the power of creation and propriety as to amount were matters intrusted to the discretion of other departments of the state government, the functions of the state board of examiners were merely those of an auditing body, with power to pass upon the regularity in form of the claim, but with no discretion nor control over the amount for which the claim should be allowed. In the comparatively recent case of Sullivan v. Gage, 145 Cal. 759, 79 Pac. 537, the case of Lawrence v. Booth was commented upon, and the distinction clearly drawn between those classes of claims with reference to which the validity of the action of the official, body, or board, creating the obligation, or its amount, were not called into question; and those classes of claims wherein the validity of the order creating them was in controversy; and as to the former the views of the court in the case of Lawrence v. Booth were upheld.

In the instant case the power and authority of the conservation commission to employ the expert, professional, and clerical services of the plaintiff in the course of and for the purpose of carrying into effect the objects of its creation has not been, and cannot seriously be, called into question. Having the power to enter into the contract of employment "upon such terms as it might deem proper" (Stats. 1911, p. 823), and having had set apart a specific fund in the state treasury for the payment of such obligations as it might thus create, it must follow that the approval of the plaintiff's claim as evidenced by the requisition of the conservation commission upon the state treasury for the payment thereof constituted the final determination as to the validity and propriety of the obligation; and hence that the powers of the board of control in respect to said claim were limited to those of an auditing body passing only upon the sufficiency in form of the plaintiff's demand.

[4] The doctrine is well settled in numerous cases that where one official, board, or body is given authority by statute to create an obligation against a specific fund in the state treasury, and another official, board, or body is intrusted with the powers of an auditor in respect to claims generally against the state, the powers and duties of the latter in respect to such claims may be controlled by the courts and compelled by writs of mandate. Lewis v. Colgan, 115 Cal. 529, 47 Pac. 357; Scott v. Boyle, 164 Cal. 321, 128 Pac. 941, and cases cited.

[5] In the closing brief of appellant it is earnestly and elaborately contended that, since as a fundamental proposition the state cannot be sued without its consent, and since this action is in the nature of a suit to compel the payment of money to plaintiff by the state, that it cannot therefore be maintained. But to our minds this principle has no application to the instant case. This is not in form or substance an action against the state to determine a contested claim against its treasury. The state has already by the act of its Legislature set apart a specific fund for the payment of such obligations as the conservation commission had power to create; and the state has also by legislative act invested said conservation commission with the express power to create this specific obligation through its employment of the plaintiff to assist in carrying into effect the objects of its existence. The state is thus in a position of having assented to this claim; and this is an action or proceeding merely to compel the official auditor in the form of the board of control to perform a duty expressly enjoined upon it by law.

We can perceive no reason why the action of the trial court was not proper in directing the issuance of the writ.

Judgment affirmed.

1. MANDAMUS ⇨72 — FUNCTION OF WRIT — DISCRETIONARY ORDERS.

Where an officer, board, or tribunal is vested with power to determine a question upon which a right depends, mandamus will not lie to control the discretion exercised.

2. MANDAMUS ⇨72—FUNCTION OF WRIT—DISCRETIONARY ORDERS.

Mandamus will lie where, in determining a matter confided to a board, its discretion has been controlled by a consideration of questions not relating to the subject involved.

3. STATES ⇨173—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS —POWERS OF BOARD OF CONTROL.

Under Pol. Code, § 4290, providing for compensation of sheriff, and section 663, providing for examination of his accounts by board of control, the board, on finding that he has rendered the services set forth in his claim, and that the amount claimed for expenses was necessarily incurred, has no discretion other than to allow the claim, and cannot refuse to allow it on account of alleged prior fraud of the sheriff in securing allowance of other claims, although section 682 gives such board supervision of financial matters.

4. STATES ⇨185—BOARD OF CONTROL—ALLOWANCE OF CLAIMS—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

In regularly approving and allowing claims presented by a sheriff for services during certain years, the board of control to a limited extent acts judicially, and its decision is final and conclusive as against collateral attack.

5. STATES ⇨199 — ACTIONS — POWER OF BOARD OF CONTROL—RECOVERY OF STATE FUNDS.

The board of control cannot sue to recover money obtained from the state by fraud, and therefore, in action to compel it to allow sheriff's claim for services for later years, it cannot set up as a counterclaim that the compensation in the earlier years was obtained through fraud.

6. MANDAMUS ⇨4(5) — WHO ENTITLED TO WRIT—EXISTENCE OF OTHER REMEDY.

Under Pol. Code, § 4290, in which the Legislature declared the conditions on which compensation should be allowed to sheriffs, the right of a sheriff, whose claim has been found to be correct and allowed, to mandamus the board of control to order payment thereof is not affected by section 671, allowing an appeal from disapproval of claims to the Legislature.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Mandamus by W. A. Hammel against John Francis Neylan and others, as members of the State Board of Control. From a judgment dismissing the proceeding, petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Leon F. Moss, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Dep. Atty. Gen., and John F. Neylan, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff filed his petition in the superior court of Los Angeles county, praying for a writ of mandate against the state board of control and members thereof, commanding it and them to allow and approve certain claims, the aggregate amount of which was the sum of $2,199.26, presented by him as sheriff of said county against the state for services rendered by him as such sheriff in the month of December, 1914, and expenses necessarily incurred in conveying persons, adjudged by the superior court of said county to be committed, to state prisons and other state institutions. Defendants answered, alleging, among other things, that on January 21, 1914, they, in the performance of the duty imposed upon them by law, discovered, determined, and adjudged that petitioner was indebted to the state of California in the sum of $2,199.26, paid to and received by him as sheriff from the state of California upon claims presented during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, for alleged services and necessary expenses incurred by him as such official for conveying prisoners to state institutions, which claims were, to the extent of $2,199.26, in excess of that to which he was justly and legally entitled, and the allowance of which by said board was obtained by means of fraudulent representations made with intent to deceive and defraud, and which did deceive and defraud, these defendants and the state of California; that petitioner has refused to recognize such payments as being in excess of the sum to which he was entitled during said years of 1911, 1912, and 1913, or repay the same, although demand had been made therefor by respondents upon an itemized list of said alleged overcharges delivered to petitioner; that by reason of such fact respondents claim the right to withhold from petitioner, to the extent of $2,199.26, the allowance and payment of other claims due him under section 4290 of the Political Code. The answer further alleged that:

"Respondents deny that petitioner has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law for the enforcement of right in the premises, and allege that petitioner has no rights in the premises or as claimed and alleged by him in his petition for writ of mandate herein; that said petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against these respondents, or any or either of them, or against the state of California, nor does said petition state facts sufficient to entitle petitioner to the relief sought therein, nor to any relief."

And further alleged—

"that this honorable court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter set forth in said petition, nor to grant the plaintiff the relief sought therein."

Attached to each of the nine claims so presented and showing the action of respondents had thereon and reasons therefor, as required by section 666 of the Political Code, was a statement as follows:

"Office of State Board of Control.

"Sacramento, Cal., Feb. 2, 1915.

"The annexed account for 207.85/100, two hundred seven and 85/100, presented by Wm. A. Hammel for transportation of prisoners to Folsom, is rejected and disallowed under section 666, Political Code of the state of California, and section 682 of the Political Code of the state of California, for the reason that said claimant is now indebted to the state of California in the sum of $2,199.26, moneys by him had and received for the use and benefit of the said state of California, prior to the date hereof, all of which said claimant has heretofore refused, and does now refuse, to repay to the state despite demand made of him for such repayment."

It must be conceded, upon admitted allegations of the petition, stipulations made, and uncontroverted evidence offered by petitioner, that the claims in question were found and determined by the board of control to be properly made out and presented in full compliance with the law and the rules governing the same as adopted by said board, and no question is raised as to the truth and correctness thereof, or petitioner's right to have the same allowed, save and except that respondents assert, without offering any proof thereof, that petitioner is indebted to the state for the collection of overcharges for services rendered and expenditures made during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, claims for which, had at the time been duly approved and allowed by said board of control, warrants issued therefor by the controller and paid in usual course.

Upon trial, and after petitioner had introduced his evidence, the respondents, without offering any evidence, moved the court to dismiss the petition and said proceeding upon the ground—

"that this court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter set forth in said petition, nor to grant to petitioner the relief sought therein, and that this court has no jurisdiction of the parties respondent to this proceeding; that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against these respondents, or any or either of them, or against the state of California; nor does said petition state facts sufficient to entitle petitioner to the relief therein sought, nor to any relief."

The court made an order granting the motion, and caused a judgment to be entered dismissing the proceeding, from which petitioner prosecutes this appeal.

In support of the court's ruling, respondents insist: First, that the state board of control, in acting upon claims presented for its allowance, is vested with judicial powers, and, having in its discretion refused to allow the claims, mandamus will not lie to compel other action than that taken; second, that under the provisions of section 671 of the Political Code petitioner's remedy, if aggrieved by the action of the board, was an appeal to the Legislature.

[1, 2] As to the first proposition, it is undoubtedly the general rule that where an officer, board, or tribunal is vested with power to determine a question upon which a right depends, mandamus will not lie to control the discretion of such officer, board, or tribunal in the determination thereof. Inglin v. Hoppin, 156 Cal. 483, 105 Pac. 582. Nevertheless, as stated in the above-entitled case:

"The above cases [cited in the opinion] abundantly show that mandamus will lie to correct abuses of discretion, and will lie to force a particular action by the inferior tribunal or officer, when the law clearly establishes the petitioner's right to such action"

—or, we may add, where in determining the matter confided to such board its discretion has been controlled by a consideration of questions not relating to the subject involved, and therefore not properly within its discretion (26 Cyc. 161); or, as stated in State v. Stutsman, 24 N. D. 68, 139 N. W. 83, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 776, "where the discretion is made to turn upon matters which, under the law, should not be considered." And this we conceive to be the vice of respondents' position.

[3] Section 4290 of the Political Code provides:

"The sheriff shall be entitled to receive and retain for his own use, five dollars per diem for conveying prisoners to and from the state prisons, and for conveying persons to and from the insane asylums, or other state institutions not otherwise provided for by law; also, all expenses necessarily incurred in conveying insane persons to and from the insane asylums, and in conveying persons to and from the state prisons, or other state institutions, which per diem and expenses shall be allowed by the board of examiners and collected from the state."

Under this provision the sheriff is entitled to collect and receive from the state for the services specified $5 per day and expenses necessarily incurred in the performance thereof, subject only to the condition that his claim therefor is properly presented, as here done, to the board of control, as provided in section 663, Political Code, for its scrutiny, which scrutiny and examination under the provision quoted, is limited to an inquiry as to whether the sheriff has rendered the services set forth in his claim, and whether the amount claimed for expenses was necessarily incurred in such performance, and upon a finding favorable to claimant, then, as provided by section 4290, the board of control has no discretion other than to allow such "per diem and expenses." Hensley v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 541, 44 Pac. 232. Since as to such claims the right to scrutinize is thus limited, it must follow that the board may not refuse to allow a claim concededly correct and properly presented, upon grounds other than those specified; that is, where it finds the services were not performed or the expenses not necessarily incurred. Lawrence v. Booth, 46 Cal. 187. The mere assertion, such as here made, that the claimant is indebted to the state, whether by reason of his having theretofore wrongfully obtained its funds or negligently operated a motor car as a result of which state property was damaged, furnishes no reason for disallowing his claim, for the reason that under the statute it is not made to depend upon a determination of such questions. Therefore, if it be conceded the petitioner as such sheriff was indebted to the state on account of other dealings, such fact is no ground for disallowing the claims presented for services rendered and expenses incurred by him for and on behalf of the state.

While under section 682 the board is vested with powers of supervision over matters concerning the financial and business policies of the state and may institute investigations and proceedings to conserve the interests thereof, no power, however, is vested in it to institute or maintain actions for the recovery of funds due the state. Such powers of supervision and investigation so given it under section 682 must, in a case of the character here involved, be exercised subject to and controlled by the provisions of section 4290.

[4, 5] Moreover, in regularly approving and allowing the claims presented by Hammel for services and expenses rendered and incurred during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, for which warrants had been issued and paid, the board of control, to a limited extent, acted judicially in exercising the powers of investigation vested in it, and its decision in such matter was final and conclusive so far as a collateral attack thereon is concerned. Black on Judgments, § 532; Sullivan v. Gage, 145 Cal. 766, 79 Pac. 537; Cahill v. Colgan, 3 Cal. Unrep. 622, 31 Pac. 614. Conceding that the controller might, in a proper case (section 433, Pol. Code), where it was made to appear that a claimant had by fraud obtained moneys of the state, institute an action to recover the same, no such power is vested in the board of control. And if it has no power to institute such action, it is likewise wanting in power to interpose, as a defense in a proceeding for mandamus, a counterclaim based upon such alleged fraud.

[6] Coming now to the second proposition which, as shown by the record, is that upon which the trial court based its judgment and order that the proceeding be dismissed: Section 671, Political Code, provides that:

"Any person interested, who is aggrieved by the disapproval of a claim by the board, may appeal from the decision to the Legislature of the state, by filing with the board a notice thereof, and upon the receipt of such notice the board must transmit the demand and all the papers accompanying the same, with a statement of the evidence taken before it to the Legislature."

Respondents insist, and the court held, that by virtue of this provision, and conceding as found by the board of control that petitioner had performed services the per diem for which and expenses necessarily incurred in connection therewith, as fixed by section 4290, Political Code, amounted to the sum of $2,199.26, which claims therefor the board refused to allow for the alleged reason that he had theretofore in other dealings had with the state fraudulently obtained a sum of money in amount equal to such claims, his remedy, and only remedy, was an appeal to the Legislature. We cannot consent to this proposition. Had the board found that petitioner had not performed the services claimed, or found the expenses incurred in the performance thereof were unnecessary, then, upon its determination of the question so confided to it, petitioner's only remedy would be an appeal to the Legislature to pass a law for his relief, since in the absence of such facts the allowance of his claim would be clearly unauthorized. As said by the learned trial judge, the Legislature has the right to fix the conditions upon which state funds will be paid out. By section 4290 it has prescribed such conditions, and the board of control has, as stated, found that those conditions were complied with by petitioner, but disallowed the claims upon grounds other than those prescribed. Hence, on an appeal to the Legislature, it would be called upon, not to review the questions as to whether petitioner had complied with the conditions upon which it had directed the board of control to allow the claims, but whether petitioner had been guilty of the alleged fraud with which he is charged by the board of control. Except as to the Senate when sitting as a court of impeachment (section 1, art. 6, Const.), the Legislature possesses no judicial power, and hence could not try the question as to whether or not petitioner had, as claimed, by means of fraud looted the state treasury. Nor by such provision was it ever intended that this subordinate agency of the state, vested with limited powers, should ignore the plain import of the language used in section 4290, thus leaving one aggrieved by its unwarranted action with no remedy or redress other than to appeal to, that is, petition (Magna Charta, and section 10, art. 1, state Constitution) the Legislature for the enactment of another law, in effect declaring that it (the Legislature) meant and intended just what was said in section 4290, Political Code. To so apply the provision of section 671 would not only place the state board of control above the law, but lead to an absurdity. One may readily conceive of claims presented to the board where its disallowance thereof would be final, leaving the claimant with no remedy other than to petition the Legislature for relief. To such cases only the provision must be held applicable. Where, however, the Legislature has, as here, provided that a sheriff shall, for services designated, receive a per diem of $5, together with the expenses necessarily incurred in the performance of such services, and directed that the board of control shall allow claims therefor, it leaves to the board no discretion other than to allow such claims upon finding facts the existence of which is made the only condition upon which such allowance is directed by the Legislature, and the absence thereof the only ground for refusal to allow the same. For such refusal in a proper case an appeal to the Legislature provides no adequate remedy. The allowance under the circumstances is one "specially enjoined" by law upon respondents, and for its refusal to perform the act so enjoined, a writ of mandate lies to compel such performance. Section 1085, Code Civ. Proc.; Lawrence v. Booth, supra; Sullivan v. Gage, 145 Cal. 759, 79 Pac. 537.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; C. W. Norton, Judge.

Albert Francis Ferrara was convicted of robbery, and from such judgment and an order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Cross & Lynch, of Stockton, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. The defendant has been convicted of the crime of robbery and sentenced to imprisonment for the term of 15 years. He prosecutes this appeal from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial.

In view of the youth of the defendant and the judgment rendered the record has been examined with great care, the result of which is that no reversible error has been found. In fact, the trial seems to have been conducted with unusual care and regard for the defendant's rights. Many points are made by appellant for a reversal, and they will be given such consideration as seems proper.

[1-3] It is claimed that the corpus delicti was not proved. A brief narrative of the salient facts of the case will show that this position is not well taken.

The prosecuting witness, Duffy, came from Merced to Stockton on the afternoon of the 2d day of September, 1915, arriving there about 4 o'clock, and went to a saloon kept by a man named Grohmans. There he met the defendant, and they had several drinks. At about 4:30 p. m. Duffy, in company with the defendant, left the saloon and went to the boat landing for the purpose of taking a boat to San Francisco. The defendant bought a boat ticket for himself and one for Duffy. The officers at the boat landing refused to let Duffy go on the boat because of his intoxicated condition, and took up his ticket, returning to him the price thereof, $1. The two then returned to the Grohmans saloon, and were there informed that a Southern Pacific train would leave for San Francisco at about 7 o'clock. The two walked to the Southern Pacific Depot and when they reached it learned that the train they expected to take had gone; they were told that a Santa Fé train would leave at about 8:30. The defendant told Duffy he knew the way to the Santa Fé Depot, and they started to walk there, the defendant taking the lead. When they were within about 150 yards of the Santa Fé Depot the defendant said, "Give me a smoke." While sitting there on the side of the railroad track smoking, a man came along with a lantern and the defendant asked him what time the train would leave, and defendant told Duffy he said about 9 o'clock. (It seems Duffy is somewhat deaf.) Shortly after this man left, the defendant attracted Duffy's attention to something up the track, and when Duffy turned his head the defendant struck him just back of the ear. Duffy jumped up, and the defendant struck him again between the eyes and once on the hand. After Duffy had been thus struck he felt "everything going—everything kind of commenced to get dark for me." Duffy testified that after this he had a faint recollection of defendant going through his pockets. After some time Duffy regained consciousness, and managed, after several efforts, to get to his feet. The defendant was gone, and Duffy did not see him again until after his arrest. Duffy testified that when he was struck by the defendant he had in his pocket about $28; that when he came to his money was all gone; there was none in his pockets. He testified that just before he left Modesto he got two checks, which he cashed, one for $30 and one for $12.50, and then detailed, as best he could, what he spent from that time until he was struck and figured he had about $28 left. There was much other testimony in the case, among which were statements of the defendant to the officers, which are manifestly false, but the above recital is sufficient for the purpose of noticing the points relied upon for a reversal.

It is claimed that the proof is insufficient to show that the money alleged to have been taken was the property of the complaining witness. But the evidence that Duffy got two checks in Modesto, had them cashed, and that the money in his pocket at the time he was struck was a part of the proceeds of these checks, is sufficient to show that the money was his property.

The evidence is amply sufficient to justify the jury in finding that it was taken from his person by force or fear. The evidence was sufficient to justify a conviction of the defendant. It is claimed that certain statements of the accused were given in evidence before the corpus delicti had been proved. None was admitted before the complaining witness had testified to the facts above recited.

[4] It is claimed that the court erred in allowing verbal proof of the contents of a certain hotel register. A witness, James Farley, testified that on the night of the alleged robbery the defendant went with him in an auto to the town of Tracy. He testified that at the hotel in Tracy to which they went and spent the night the defendant wrote something on the hotel register. He did not write the name Ferrara, but witness did not know what name he did write. This testimony was objected to on the ground that the hotel register was the best evidence of its contents. The witness was testifying to an act of the defendant witnessed by him. The witness did not know what particular name he signed on the register, and it was immaterial. The material thing was that he signed a name other than his own or, to put it another way, that he registered but did not write his own name. We think this was primary evidence of the fact, and that the act was material.

[5] Nor was there any error in allowing in evidence the statements of third persons. The record shows that witness Corlett, over objection, testified that when prosecuting witness and defendant were standing at the bar close together, defendant stated that he had a couple of packages—was going away on the train—but did not know where they were located. Witness told defendant to “go down the street and see if you can locate the packages” and defendant said “all right. So they went together and come back with the packages.” We see nothing in this of which the defendant can complain. He heard the conversation and statements and acted upon them.

[6] During the trial the phonographic reporter, who acted as such at the preliminary examination, was sworn and asked if the defendant at such hearing made certain statements, and to enable him to answer was requested to and did get his original notes of such examination. Objection was made to the use of the notes upon the ground that “they had not been filed.” The reporter was directed to file his notes, and the objection was overruled. In this we perceive no error. The witness was present at the examination and made notes of the testimony and was using them as a basis for the testimony he was giving. He had a right to refresh his memory from such notes, and if he had no independent recollection of what the defendant testified to, he could read his notes of the testimony. In thus using his notes he stood in no different position from any other person who might have been present and made notes of what the defendant said. Code Civ. Proc. § 2047. If it had been sought to use the transcript of the notes as a deposition, the questions raised by counsel might require fuller consideration.

[7] It was not necessary to fix time, place, and circumstances of alleged statements made by defendant by questioning him thereon before proving such statements. His declarations and statements were original evidence against him, and the rules as to impeachment of witnesses did not apply.

[8] The court refused to give the following instruction asked by the defendant:

“The jury is instructed that contradictory testimony is admissible only for the purpose of impeaching the credibility of the witness, and you may not consider it as evidence of the truth of such statements.”

This instruction was properly refused. The evidence of the prosecuting witness (to illustrate) was contradictory of the testimony of the defendant, but it was evidence of the truth of the facts he testified to, and was to be so considered by the jury. Counsel evidently had in mind the rule as to proof of statements made by a witness at other times contradicting his testimony given at the trial. If so, he was unfortunate in expressing the rule.

[9] The court instructed the jury that they could find a verdict of guilty if the taking of the money was—

“accomplished by means of force or fear used upon or against the said John Duffy by the said defendant, or by said defendant putting said John Duffy in fear.”

Counsel claim that the instruction was erroneous, in that it used the disjunctive “or” instead of the conjunctive “and” between the words “force” and “fear.” The instruction as to this feature of it is in the language of the statute (Pen. Code, § 211), wherein it is provided:

“Robbery is the felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another, from his person or immediate presence, and against his will, accomplished by means of force or fear.”

But, while the statute is thus worded, counsel takes the position that as the information alleged that the taking was accomplished by means of force and fear, “force and fear” were words descriptive of the manner in which the offense was committed and had to be proved as alleged. The instruction as given was a correct statement of the law, and while it was alleged that fear and force were the means used, the offense was complete if either was proved as the means by which the taking was accomplished.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Sept. 7, 1916.)WILLS §130—OLOGRAPHIC WILLS—DEFECTIVELY EXECUTED INSTRUMENT — SEPARATE PAPER.

An unsigned writing by testator upon separate sheets of paper containing directions to his executor, not written animo testandi, is not admissible to probate as part of an olographic will already admitted, although found after testator's death held together with the will by a single metal clip in a sealed envelope, indorsed with testator's handwriting as his last will and testament.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of John M. Keith, deceased. Upon offer by executor of an additional writing as part of testator's will. Decree admitting the paper to probate appealed from. Reversed.

John L. McNab, Gavin McNab, Nat. Schmulowitz and R. P. Henshall, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Sidney Schlesinger, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Deceased left an olographic will which was admitted to probate. It was duly executed and made disposition of a large estate. It named J. J. Mack of San Francisco as executor without bonds. Subsequently J. J. Mack offered for probate an unsigned writing of the testator's, in form as follows:

"March 3rd, 1913.

"Mr. J. J. Mack:

"I have made a will and have named you as executor without Bonds and giving you (10) ten year to settle up my estate and longer if you find it necessary.

"I have left Some three hundred thousand dollars to my relatives, to be divided up and given to each one as directed in my will. I have only Six Brothers and Sisters to give anything to and I think fifty thousand is all any of them will be able to handle to advantag.

"As I am giving One hundred and fifty thousand to the State University to erect a memorial to the memory of Mrs. Keith I have abandoned any idea to giving to an old Womans Home or any other home for anyone. As this will cut out a great amount of the work contemplated by me I direct or think from the present outlook that you should be paid for your Services as Administrator fifty ($50,000) thousand dollars. If I should have anything left after making all payments and bequest, I am not sure just what I care to have done with it."

This writing was offered for probate as a part of the will of the deceased which had already been admitted to probate. It was written upon two sheets of paper. The nature of its discovery and the reason why it was not originally offered for probate as a part of the olographic will is explained in the testimony of Mr. Mack, executor, as follows:

"That the two pages now offered for probate were found in the same envelope with the three sheets which had theretofore been admitted to probate as the last will and testament of John M. Keith; that the five sheets were held together by a metal clamp or clip; that he discarded these two sheets now offered for probate, believing the same to be merely a personal letter, advising him of the wishes of the deceased; that his attorney likewise advised him that the sheets were not a part of the will, but were merely an unsigned letter; that several days later he brought the matter to the attention of his counsel, and that some months subsequently his attorney concluded that under the decision of this court in the Estate of Merryfield, 167 Cal. 729, 141 Pac. 259, it constituted a portion of the will."

And still further Mr. Mack testified that after the death of Keith he found in his apartments a sealed envelope bearing indorsement in the handwriting of Keith:

"My last will and testament. John M. Keith, Bakersfield, March 3, 1913, John M. Keith."

Within the envelope were paper writings of the testator, held together by a single metal clamp or clip. The first of these in order was the unsigned letter to Mr. Mack, consisting of two pages. Next in order were three pages, each page signed by the testator, and the three constituting the olographic will as originally admitted to probate. The court admitted the unsigned letter to probate "as a part of the will already admitted," and from its decree so doing this appeal is taken.

Standing alone, it is not disputed but that the two pages admitted as a part of the will of Keith were not executed with the formalities required by law. It was not signed by the testator. Nevertheless the argument was advanced and adopted by the judge in probate that although the letter to Mr. Mack was written last, still—"in contemplation of law the entire document was a literary unit and an indivisible legal entity. * * * It was virtually a single act."

If these two writings are to be judged from their contents, ex visceribus suis, no one would doubt but that the executor's first conviction that the unsigned letter addressed to him formed no part of the will, and was merely a note of personal advice, was perfectly sound. It is manifest that the testator knew of the requirements governing the execution of an olographic will, and was careful to see that no doubt could be raised as to the due execution of his own will. This is shown by his care in affixing his signature to each page thereof. His failure or refusal to perform a similar act of signing the personal letter might well be viewed as a precaution, to prevent the taking place of exactly that which here has taken place—the admission of this letter to probate as a part of his will. Still further, upon the face of the letter it nowhere discloses an intent that it should be read and construed as a part of his will. Thus, there is no reference to it in the will itself, and the letter uses no language to indicate that the writer contemplated that it should be construed as part of his will. First, there is an absence of signature. Next, there is express reference, not to the making of a will, but to a will already completely made—"I have made a will." The only language which by any stretch of imagination can be said to indicate even a testamentary intent is found in that sentence where the writer says:

"As this will cut out a great amount of the work contemplated by me, I direct or think, from the present outlook, that you should be paid for your services as administrator $50,000."

But apparently this language is designedly guarded, to forbid the possibility of its being construed as testamentary in character. He does not direct—he directs or thinks. He does not think that the administrator should receive $50,000, but thinks "from the present outlook" he should receive that sum. The internal evidence of the two documents, then, we repeat, standing alone, is well-nigh conclusive to the effect that the testator believed that he had, in the three pages of writing originally admitted to probate, executed a full and complete will, and that in the personal letter to his friend Mack he clearly expressed this belief; for that letter makes explicit declaration of the fact that the testator had made a will, and contains nothing bearing the inference that he assumed that his personal communication to his friend was to be considered as a part of that will. Cases are numerous—they do not require specific reference—where courts have gone to lengths in upholding as valid written dispositions of property which those courts could clearly see were designed to be testamentary in character. But here the court in probate has reversed this canon of construction, and has forced upon the estate of the testator a writing which it has decreed to be testamentary, but which manifestly the testator himself did not design to be or think was testamentary in character. The reversal of this decree which must follow could securely be rested upon this ground alone, namely, that this writing, incomplete as a will, bears overwhelming evidence that it was not written by the deceased animo testandi, but, to the contrary, that it was written, as the executor most naturally and properly concluded upon his first reading of it, as a letter of private information and advice to the man whom he had named as executor in his formal will.

But it appears from the brief of respondent, wherein is embodied, as a part of respondent's argument, the opinion of the learned judge in probate, that direct and conclusive support for the adjudication upholding the admission of this letter in probate as a part of the will, is found in the decision of this court in Estate of Merryfield, 167 Cal. 729, 141 Pac. 259. In that case Mrs. Merryfield, an aged lady, left an olographic will.

It was written on three sheets of paper of the same size and character, and apparently torn from the same writing pad. On each of the three sheets was writing exclusively of the testatrix, and the writing of the three sheets formed a complete olographic will, the last sheet of the three being signed. The three sheets were folded together in sequence, and were kept in a locked drawer, where they were found. There was no contention but that the third sheet which was signed was in itself a good and complete olographic will. The contention was that the two preceding and unsigned sheets were not a part of this will. The court in probate found from the evidence that the three sheets did constitute the will of the deceased. This court declared that the evidence was sufficient to sustain the court's finding, pointing out that the sheets themselves were arranged and folded together in proper sequence (in the case at bar the letter to J. J. Mack is the first paper held by the clip); next that it is not likely that the testatrix would have folded these pages in order and carefully preserved them with her will if she had not intended and believed that they were a corporate part of her will; finally that the fact that the will was written upon more than one sheet of paper was immaterial, and herein it is said:

"Nor is it necessary to support the finding that the several detached pieces of paper constituted one instrument that these sheets should be fastened together by mechanical or other device" (citing cases).

This last declaration says this, and only this: That it is not necessary that several detached pieces of paper, together forming one written instrument, must necessarily be connected together by some mechanical or other device before it can be held, as a matter of fact or law, that they do constitute together a single instrument. We are at pains thus to define the full meaning of this language, since it appears from his decision, based upon this case, that the learned judge in probate construed it to mean that where papers were bound together by a mechanical device, necessarily and without regard to anything else, they did form a part of a single instrument, in this case a will.

Certain cases, principally from Pennsylvania, are relied on as affording additional support to the court's ruling. But, to begin with, it may be said, in the language of one of them, "In such cases as this, precedents rarely afford aid." Gaston's Estate, 188 Pa. 374, 41 Atl. 529, 68 Am. St. Rep. 874. Of the cases which are most relied on, one is In re Harrison's Estate, 196 Pa. 576, 46 Atl. 888. In that case the testatrix had left a will. She also executed a writing upon the face of a sealed envelope, as follows:

"Six bonds for my brother John's daughters; also, one for my nephew J.; to be sold after my death."

No question whatsoever arose over the testamentary character of this writing, and it was admitted to probate as a part of the will. The question which did arise was whether the bonds spoken of in this codicil could be sufficiently identified, and the holding was that as the codicil was written upon an envelope containing bonds, it was a fair inference that the codicil had reference to the bonds within the envelope. But in that case Chief Justice Green is at pains to point out the extraordinary length to which the court of Pennsylvania has gone in upholding all kinds of irregular, incomplete, and insufficient writings as constituting wills, and proceeds to review what he calls "some of the remarkable cases in which papers were sustained as wills." Manifestly the determination of the Pennsylvania court in that case has not the slightest bearing upon the question before this court. The other case is that of Fosselman v. Elder, 98 Pa. 159. There the testatrix left a will, and among her papers was found a sealed envelope, indorsed in her handwriting thus:

"Dear Bella, this is for you to open."

Within the envelope was a promissory note for $2,000, and a paper written and signed in the handwriting of the testatrix as follows:

"Lewistown, October 2, 1879. My wish is for you to draw this $2000 for your use should I die sudden. Elizabeth Fosselman."

Here again no question arose over the due execution of this writing as a codicil to the will, nor over its admissibility to probate as a codicil. The contention was that testamentary effect could not be given to it because it failed to describe with sufficient certainty the legatee, and the decision of the court, which its Chief Justice described as being one of its "remarkable cases," was that reference could be had to the language, "Dear Bella, this is for you to open," found upon the outside of the envelope, as serving to identify this Bella as the person to whom the codicil gave the legacy. This case also, it must be apparent, is equally inapplicable. In neither of the Pennsylvania cases was the question of the due execution of the paper writing as a will in controversy. Here it is the sole question in controversy. In each of the Pennsylvania cases the testatrix duly executed an instrument of testamentary character in accordance with the law of wills. In the first of the cases the question was whether the property bequeathed could be sufficiently identified. In the second, the question was whether the beneficiary had been described with sufficient certainty to enable the court to give effect to the bequest. It certainly cannot require more than this statement to establish the radical difference between those cases and this, where the very gist of the controversy is not over the meaning of a duly executed testamentary writing, but whether the writing itself is testamentary, and, if testamentary, whether it has been executed with the formalities required by law. For the reasons already given it is to our minds clear that the writing addressed to J. J. Mack was not written by the deceased animo testandi, nor was it executed with the formalities required to justify its admission to probate, even if it were so written.

To the end that respondent on this appeal may have the full time allowed by law after the filing of this opinion and decision in which to petition the court for a rehearing of the matter, the judgment heretofore given is set aside, and the decree appealed from is reversed on this date.

FARRAR v. STEENBERGH et al. (two cases).
(Sac. 2284, 2295.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 22, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Aug. 22, 1916.)

1. JUDGMENT $\hookrightarrow$ 120—DEFAULT — ENTRY BY CLERK—POWERS.

In entering default judgment as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 585, the clerk acts ministerially and without judicial functions, and must conform strictly to the statute, or his proceedings are void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 210; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 120.]

2. JUDGMENT $\hookrightarrow$ 94 — DEFAULT — ENTRY BY CLERK—POWERS—CROSS-COMPLAINT.

A so-called cross-complaint, seeking rescission of sale contract for fraud and return of money paid, is not an action arising on contract for money or damages only within Code Civ. Proc. § 585, and the clerk's entry of default thereon is void, and may be disregarded or set aside.

3. JUDGMENT $\hookrightarrow$ 143(17)—VACATING DEFAULT —EXCUSABLE NEGLIGENCE.

Vacating default entered on cross-complaint is justified where the cross-complaint was entitled "answer" and was long and involved, and the only indication of its character was allegation of matter appropriate to a counterclaim as constituting a cross-complaint, especially in view of supposed friendly relations of the attorneys and stipulations for trial at a later date filed before default.

4. JUDGMENT $\hookrightarrow$ 143(17) — RELATIONS WITH ADVERSE PARTY—SHARP PRACTICES.

Courts should not encourage practices of attorneys in securing defaults by misleading the adverse attorneys by labeling a cross-complaint an "answer" and by violating stipulations for trial on a certain date.

5. JUDGMENT $\hookrightarrow$ 159—VACATING DEFAULT—AFFIDAVIT—SUFFICIENCY.

That an affidavit for vacation of default did not specifically allege that the attorney had no knowledge that a pleading entitled "answer" was in fact a cross-complaint in time to answer does not render it insufficient, where the facts alleged justified a clear inference to that effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 310, 312, 313; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 159.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; J. E. Barber, Judge.

Action by Walter T. Farrar against C. H. Steenbergh and another. From a judgment for defendants on their cross-complaint, entered by default, plaintiff appeals. From an order vacating and setting aside such judgment, defendants appeal. Appeal of plaintiff dismissed, and order of vacation affirmed.

Hoeffler & Morris, of San Francisco, for plaintiff. Edward J. Linforth, of San Francisco, for defendants.

SHAW, J. The above-entitled appeals arise out of the same case. No. 2284 is an appeal by the defendants from an order of the superior court made on July 16, 1914, setting aside a default and judgment theretofore entered in the case in favor of the defendants against the plaintiff. No. 2295 is an appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment which was vacated by the order involved in the other appeal. It will make for convenience and brevity to consider the two appeals together.

The complaint stated a cause of action to foreclose a mortgage for the sum of $4,000. The defendants filed an answer, containing allegations "by way of cross-complaint," to the effect that the plaintiff sold and conveyed to C. H. Steenbergh the tract of land mortgaged, for the price of $6,000, that Steenbergh paid $2,000 thereon and gave said mortgage as security for the remainder, that plaintiff induced Steenbergh to buy the land by false and fraudulent representations as to its quality and character; that on discovering the fraud Steenbergh offered to reconvey the property and rescind the sale, and demanded the return of the $2,000 paid. The prayer was that the plaintiff take nothing; that the note and mortgage sued on be declared void and canceled; that the sale be rescinded; and that Steenbergh recover of plaintiff $2,000. This document was served on the plaintiff on December 1, 1913, and was filed on December 2, 1913. The default of the plaintiff for not answering the cross-complaint included therein was entered by the clerk on January 12, 1914. On June 1, 1914, the clerk, on motion of the defendants, entered judgment against the plaintiff for the relief asked in the cross-complaint, as above specified. Plaintiff moved to vacate this default and judgment, upon the grounds: First, that the clerk was without jurisdiction to enter the default, and that the court was without jurisdiction to enter the judgment; second, that the default was entered through the mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect of the plaintiff and his attorneys. The court, as above stated, granted the motion and set aside the default and judgment.

[1-3] The authority of the clerk to enter judgments on default of a party is derived from the first subdivision of section 585 of the Code of Civil Procedure. So far as material it reads as follows:

"1. In an action arising upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only, if * * * no answer has been filed with the clerk of the court within the time specified in the summons, or such further time as may have been granted, the clerk, upon application of the plaintiff, must enter the default of the defendant, and immediately thereafter enter judgment for the amount demanded in the complaint, including the costs, against the defendant."

In the performance of the functions devolved upon him by that subdivision the clerk acts ministerially. He exercises no judicial functions, but is only an agent by whom the judgment is written out and placed upon the record. Consequently, he must conform strictly to the provisions of the statute, or his proceedings will be void. Stearns v. Aguirre, 7 Cal. 449; Kelly v. Van Austin, 17 Cal. 564; Wharton v. Harlan, 68 Cal. 425, 9 Pac. 727; Glidden v. Packard, 28 Cal. 651; Wallace v. Eldredge, 27 Cal. 497. It follows that he has no authority, under this subdivision, to enter a judgment, except in cases of the kind mentioned therein. He has no such authority in an action not of the character therein described. Shay v. Chicago Clock Co., 111 Cal. 551, 44 Pac. 237; Crossman v. Vivienda W. Co., 136 Cal. 574, 69 Pac. 220; Lacoste v. Eastland, 117 Cal. 679, 49 Pac. 1046. The subdivision gives him no authority except in "actions arising upon contract for the recovery of money or damages only." There may be reason to doubt whether a cross-complaint comes within the scope of the subdivision. It limits the authority of the clerk to cases where no answer has been filed "within the time specified in the summons or such further time as may have been granted." Service of a cross-complaint upon a plaintiff who appears by an attorney is not made by a summons to the plaintiff, but by delivery of a copy of the cross-complaint to the attorney. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 442, 1015. As there is no summons upon plaintiff, and no "time specified in the summons," to look to, it is questionable whether the section authorizes a clerk to enter a judgment against the plaintiff upon a cross-complaint in any case. This doubt is emphasized by the fact that a claim for the recovery of money only, on a contract, express or implied, when made by a defendant against the plaintiff, constitutes a counterclaim under section 438 of the Code, rather than a cross-complaint under section 442, and is deemed controverted without answer. Code Civ. Proc. § 462. But, however this may be, it is clear that the cause of action set forth in the cross-complaint is not of the character described in the subdivision quoted, and that the clerk has no authority to enter judgment upon such cause of action. It is distinctly a cause of action in equity to rescind a contract of sale, cancel a note and mortgage, and recover the consideration paid by the cross-complainant. Upon no theory can it be considered as an action upon contract for the recovery of money only. The judgment entered by the clerk was therefore void, and, "being void, the court below might disregard the entry, or set it aside." Stearns v. Aguirre, supra.

[4] The question of vacating the default requires further consideration. See Wharton v. Harlan, supra. The failure of the plaintiff's attorney to examine the document served on him on December 1, 1913, with sufficient care to perceive that it purported to contain a cross-complaint was, of course, negligence on his part, but that document was in itself deceptive. It was labeled an answer. The acknowledgment of service prepared by defendant's attorney, indorsed thereon and signed at his request by the plaintiff's attorney, described it as "the within answer." It opened with several pages of prolix qualified denials, in effect admitting all the allegations of the complaint. There followed this passage:

"And for a further, separate and distinct cause of defense to said action, and by way of cross-complaint said defendants allege and each of them alleges, as follows, to wit."

The matter thereafter set forth, if sufficient for any purpose, would have supported a counterclaim for the $2,000 paid on the price of the land as fully as it would a cross-complaint for specific equitable relief. A counterclaim requires no answer. The only things whereby to distinguish this pleading from a counterclaim were the words "and by way of cross-complaint" in the foregoing introduction, and a part of the prayer at the close of the paper. The plaintiff's attorney had previously favored the defendants' attorney by extensions of time to answer. He had good cause to believe that the relations between them were friendly and kindly, and no cause to suspect treachery or deceit. Attorneys do not usually take defaults against opposing attorneys with whom they are on friendly terms, without giving information thereof. The attorneys had their offices in San Francisco, and the case was in the superior court of Shasta county. Prior to the entry of the default they had, apparently with mutual confidence and trust, signed and filed a stipulation that the case might be set for trial at the convenience of the judge at any time between January 20 and January 30, 1914. It had been set for January 20th by the judge, and defendants' attorney had been informed of that fact by his opponent. Under all these circumstances we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in holding that it was excusable negligence. Courts should not encourage the practices here followed by the defendants' attorney.

[5] The only other objection to the sufficiency of the showing is that the affidavit of plaintiff's attorney does not expressly declare that he did not discover the fact that it included a cross-complaint, or that he would have filed an answer thereto if he had known the fact, or that he was surprised by the default. While it is true that these statements are not expressly made, the facts stand forth by inference from nearly every act of the parties, as related in the affidavit, between the 1st of December, 1913, and the 1st of June, 1914, when the judgment was entered by the clerk. We shall not give them in detail. The court was amply justified in inferring from the facts stated and not denied that the plaintiff's attorney had failed to discover the character of the paper filed as an answer, and that his failure to answer the same, or to proceed earlier to attack the entry of the default, was due solely to inadvertence, due to his ignorance of the character of the paper and of the entry of the default. There was no abuse of discretion in setting aside both the default and the judgment.

The judgment which is the subject of the appeal in No. 2295 was vacated by the court below, and, as we have concluded that the order vacating it should be sustained, the proper course for the disposition of the appeal is to dismiss it, since the judgment from which it was taken is no longer in force. The appeal therefrom was taken after the defendants had appealed from the order vacating the judgment, and was made necessary, as a matter of prudence, by the contingency that the defendants might possibly be successful in their appeal from the order. Under such circumstances defendants should not be allowed costs on the dismissal of the appeal.

The order vacating the default and judgment is affirmed, and the appeal from said judgment is dismissed. The plaintiff will recover his costs on both appeals.

TANFORAN v. TANFORAN. (S. F. 6663.)

1. PLEADING $\S$ 53(2)—INCONSISTENCY.

If the pleader thinks it desirable so to do, as where the exact legal nature of the facts is in doubt, or where the exact legal nature of plaintiff's right and defendant's liability depend on facts not well known to the plaintiff, his pleading may set forth the same cause of action in varied and inconsistent counts with strict legal propriety, as a cause for fraud and misrepresentation and for duress.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 114-117; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 53(2).]

2. PLEADING $\S$ 369(1)—ELECTION OF COUNTS—WHEN NECESSARY.

Since inconsistent causes may be pleaded, it is error for the judge to require plaintiff to elect upon which he will rely, but plaintiff has the right to produce evidence on all causes set forth, whereupon it is for the jury to say which has been sustained, although defendant may move for nonsuit on any cause not sustained by the evidence.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1039(9)—HARMLESS ERROR.

Erroneous requirement that plaintiff elect upon which of two inconsistent causes she will rely is harmless where made after all of plaintiff's evidence is in and there is absolutely no evidence to support the count then discarded.

4. DEEDS ¶190—PLEADING.

Where a wife, after separation, seeks to set aside a deed for fraud and duress, the issue of undue influence, not being pleaded, is not raised.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶172(1) — SCOPE OF REVIEW—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

In a suit by plaintiff to set aside a deed to her former husband at their separation, where it was stipulated that they were unfriendly at time of its execution, statement by court that there was no issue of undue influence in the case cannot be objected to on appeal, where no objection to it was raised when it was made, or offer to amend.

6. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS ¶4—UNDUE INFLUENCE—ACTIONS.

A cause of action to set aside a deed for undue influence, and particularly for that form of undue influence which is presumed to have been exerted because of the confidential relationship of the parties, is a cause of action wholly separate from that which would seek the cancellation of an instrument either for fraud or for duress.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. ¶4.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Suit by Stella Tanforan against Frank Tanforan. From a judgment for defendant and order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. W. Sanderson, of San Francisco, for appellant. Joseph K. Hawkins, of San Rafael (Edward C. Harrison and Maurice E. Harrison, both of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff sued, seeking a judgment canceling a deed which she had made to her former husband, and compelling a reconveyance to herself of the property so deeded. Her complaint charged in two counts. In both it is declared that the property so conveyed was her separate property, owned by her in fee, subject to a life estate in her mother. This by the pleadings is admitted. In the first count she charged that, differences having arisen between herself and her husband, they had agreed to a separation, and had further agreed that the defendant would pay to the plaintiff upon such separation the sum of $1,000, and for this sum the plaintiff would execute to her husband her deed, conveying to him all of her right, title, and interest in and to the community property. The husband, the defendant herein, caused the articles of separation and the deed to be drawn, and they were presented to her in a notary's office for execution. Plaintiff said to the defendant that she was too sick to read the documents, and asked the defendant to state what the deed contained. The defendant then falsely and fraudulently represented to her that the deed was a deed to the community property which she was to execute in accordance with the understanding of the parties. Believing this, she did so execute the deed, and thereafter discovered that the deed was not a deed to the community property, but was a deed to all her separate property. These false representations she relates were made upon the 18th of February, 1909, the date of her execution of the deed. In her second count she sets up that the husband compelled her to execute this deed of her separate property under duress, on that day and for several days prior thereto threatening "to kill and murder plaintiff unless plaintiff would execute and deliver to defendant a deed granting and conveying to the defendant all her right, title, interest, and estate in and to" her separate property, and she alleges that she was impelled to execute, and did execute, this deed under her fears caused by these threats of her husband.

All these matters were denied by the husband, whose answer and whose evidence were that shortly prior to the 18th of February he discovered that his wife was unfaithful. They had one child, a daughter. They agreed to separate. The wife's estate in her separate property was not an estate in enjoyment, and consequently the wife was receiving no immediate benefit from it; that his wife said that she must have money and was going to sell her interest; that he said if she was going to do this he would give her $1,000 for it and hold the property so that their daughter might, in time, have and enjoy it; that under these circumstances, and with full knowledge of the deed and of its contents, his wife executed the deed and received the thousand dollars. Subsequently, as the husband and wife had contemplated, he brought his action of divorce, and then gave to her $500 for her interest in the community property.

Having thus outlined the husband's defense, we may in similar manner set forth the testimony of the wife. She states that shortly before the execution of the deed domestic trouble had arisen, and she and her husband had agreed to separate. Her husband told her that she—say?" He said, "Before we do any business in settling up our estate, you have got to deed to me what is coming in your mother's estate." I said: "You certainly have got your nerve. What has what is coming to me got to do with ourselves?" And he said, "It don't make any difference; you have got to deed to our little girl what is coming to you from your mother's estate." I did not consent to it. He told me he wouldn't give me anything of the community property, and I said, "You are not to take from me what don't belong to me (referring to my interest in my mother's estate), and you are not entitled to that in any way, shape, or form." When he found I wouldn't agree with him to do anything on this deed, I said, "You can keep everything you have, and I will take everything in the house that my mother gave to me, which will cover most everything in the house, and I will go home to her," and later on, I think the day after, he came to me and said, "Have you decided to do what I want about that property?" and I said: "No; that property is not mine to give to anybody. Wouldn't that be a nice thing for my mother to know that I did such a thing with her property?" And he said, "She will never know anything about it." I answered, "How can I deed the property over to Loretta without my mother knowing it?" He answered, "She will never know it." When I told him my decision, he said, "I will give you $1,000 for your share of the community property and $30 a month towards your board." This community property consisted of a little home in town, a little money loaned out, horses and buggies. He said, "I will have the separation papers drawn." I said, "You can have the separation papers drawn and bring them home, and we will read the papers and talk them over together," and he told me he would. But he did not bring any papers over to Novato. He made several trips to San Rafael or the city, but stated they were not ready, as his lawyer was very busy. He never mentioned the deed to me again."

Her version of the happenings at the notary's office is that her husband there gave her two papers—one the articles of separation, the other the deed. She familiarized herself with the contents of the former. She looked at the deed and said, "I can't stay here long enough to read it; I am too sick." Her husband told her it was a deed to the community property, and she took his word for it, and so signed the paper.

[1] At the commencement of the trial the court declared that the two causes of action were necessarily inconsistent, and that the plaintiff would ultimately be required to elect upon which one she stood before the defendant put in his case. Further the court stated that he would not compel this election until plaintiff had introduced all of her testimony. When this was done and plaintiff had rested her case, defendant's attorney moved that plaintiff be required to elect upon which of the causes of action she would stand. The court granted the motion, and plaintiff's attorney declared his election to stand upon the first cause of action, that of fraud. Complaint is made of this, and much discussion is indulged in over the question whether or not the counts are inconsistent, and whether or not, if inconsistent, the court had the legal right to compel an election. Little, however, need be said upon the matter. Our simplified method of pleading, which requires merely the statement of ultimate facts, will not often render it necessary for a complaint to charge in inconsistent counts. But when for any reason the pleader thinks it desirable so to do, as where the exact nature of the facts is in doubt, or where the exact legal nature of plaintiff's right and defendant's liability depend on facts not well known to the plaintiff, his pleading may set forth the same cause of action in varied and inconsistent counts with strict legal propriety. Pom. Code Rem. § 467; Remy v. Olds, 4 Cal. Unrep. 240, 34 Pac. 216, 21 L. R. A. 645; Cowan v. Abbott, 92 Cal. 100, 28 Pac. 213; Rucker v. Hall, 105 Cal. 425, 38 Pac. 962; Murphy v. Crowley, 140 Cal. 141, 73 Pac. 820; Froeming v. Stockton Electric R. R. Co., 171 Cal. 401, 153 Pac. 712.

[2, 3] Since, then, inconsistent causes of action may be pleaded, it is not proper for the judge to force upon the plaintiff an election between those causes which he has a right to plead. Plaintiff is entitled to introduce his evidence upon each and all of these causes of action, and the election, or in other words the decision as to which of them is sustained, is, after the taking of all the evidence, a matter for the judge or the jury. There is, of course, a corresponding right in the defendant to move for a nonsuit upon any of these causes which may not have been adequately supported by the evidence. Therefore it must be said that the court's ruling in forcing an election was erroneous, but nevertheless it was absolutely without injury. All of plaintiff's testimony had been received. Not one word of it substantiated the count charging duress. Plaintiff could not have been injured by the election to abandon a cause of action wholly unsupported by evidence. The court, in short, would have been justified in granting a nonsuit as to this cause of action, and the election insisted on in effect did no more than this. There was left, then, to the consideration of the court the single question: Was plaintiff induced to execute the deed through the fraud and deceit of her husband? The court by its findings answered this question in the negative, and from the judgment which followed this appeal is taken.

[4-6] Upon the appeal appellant's attorney does not argue with much conviction against the decision of the court in the matter of fraud and of duress. Indeed, he cannot well do so, since the latter cause of action was wholly unsupported by the evidence, and the first was decided against plaintiff under conflicting evidence. He therefore shifts his ground and advances with great earnestness the contention that the evidence clearly establishes a breach of trust, an abuse upon the part of the husband of the confidential relation existing between himself and wife—a gross advantage taken by the husband in his dealings with his wife, as evidenced by the disparity between the price the husband paid for the property, $1,000, and its value, which is asserted to have been $15,000. Wherefore it is said that by virtue of section 2235 of the Civil Code the deed of the wife should be canceled because of the undue influence exercised upon her by her husband. That familiar Code section declares that:

"All transactions between the trustee and his beneficiary during the existence of the trust, or while the influence acquired by the trustee remains, by which he obtains any advantage from his beneficiary, are presumed to be entered into by the latter without sufficient consideration and under undue influence."

In this connection appellant's attorney complains grievously of a declaration made by the court. The record discloses the following: The court asked the attorney for plaintiff if he would stipulate that the parties were unfriendly on the 18th day of February, the day of the execution of the deed. It was so stipulated. Then said the court:

"The confidential relation ordinarily presumed to exist between husband and wife is not at issue in this action. There is no presumption here of undue influence on the part of the husband in taking the deed from his wife."

To this declaration no response whatever was made by plaintiff's attorney. It is quite apparent that the court by this statement meant to declare what it conceived to be the nature of the issues joined by the parties. It is entirely unjustifiable to say that the court meant that it would listen to nothing touching the abuse of such a confidential relation if such abuse were fairly within the issues. If the court's declaration concerning the scope of the pleadings and the issues did not meet the views of plaintiff's attorney, then was the time for him to have spoken and, if necessary, to have amended his complaint and to have charged by a third count the procurement of the deed by undue influence. He did not do so. It certainly can require no citation of authority to the effect that a cause of action for undue influence as such, and particularly for that form of undue influence which is presumed to have been exerted because of the confidential relationship of the parties, is a cause of action wholly separate from that which would seek the cancellation of an instrument either for fraud or for duress. True, the execution of an instrument under such circumstances of undue influence is a species of fraud, but it is no part of the fraud, and partakes in no degree of the character of fraud which was specifically pleaded. As we have said, it was open to plaintiff to have amended her complaint after the court had expressed its views defining what it conceived to be the questions at issue between the parties. Plaintiff did not do so, nor make any effort to do so. The court's definition of the issues under the pleadings before it was strictly accurate, and the effort upon this appeal is to have this court treat the pleadings as sufficient to charge an abuse of confidential relations amounting to undue influence. But for the reasons given, this cannot be done. It is equivalent to asking this court to decide the litigation upon the ground that the defendant exercised undue influence in procuring the making of the deed, a charge which is not found in the pleadings, upon which, of course, issue was not joined, and upon which necessarily the trial court made no findings.

The judgment and the order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial are therefore affirmed.

HIRSCH v. ALL PERSONS, ETC.

(S. F. 7985.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 7, 1916.)
APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐2 — DECISIONS APPEALABLE — STATUTES — APPLICATION TO PENDING PROCEEDING.

Code Civ. Proc. § 963, abolishing appeals from orders granting new trials, with certain exceptions, applies where the order was made after its effective date, regardless of when the new trial proceedings were instituted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3-7, 1882, 2421; Dec. Dig. ⇐2.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by one Hirsch against All Persons, etc. From an order granting a new trial, certain defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Chas. F. Hanlon and Percy V. Long, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Henry Ach, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is a motion to dismiss an appeal taken from the order of the court granting a new trial, which order was made and given after the amendment of the Code of Civil Procedure abolishing the right of appeal from an order granting a new trial, saving "in an action or proceeding tried by a jury, or where such trial by jury is a matter of right," etc. (Code Civ. Proc. § 963), and further providing that upon appeal from a judgment the court may review "any order on motion for a new trial" (Code Civ. Proc. § 956). Respondent on this motion relies upon the case of San Francisco v. Superior Court of Alameda County, 157 Pac. 604. But in that case it is declared, touching the right of an appeal from such an order, in the following language:

"It has been held that as to the right of appeal from such an order [granting or refusing to grant a new trial] it is the condition of the law at the time of the denial of the motion for a new trial that controls, regardless of whether the proceeding for a new trial was initiated prior to or subsequent to the change in the law."

To the support of this language is cited Woodruff v. Colyear, 156 Pac. 475, where it is declared that the statute denying a right of appeal from an order denying a new trial is necessarily applicable in every case where such order was made subsequent to the date of the taking effect of the amendment. "It is the condition of the law at the time of the making the order that controls" the right of appeal.

The motion to dismiss is therefore granted.

CLEMMONS v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA.
(L. A. 4425.)

1. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSIONS —35—CERTIORARI TO REVIEW ORDERS—OBJECTIONS TO JURISDICTION—WAIVER.

Where order was issued for the Railroad Commission to show cause why certiorari should not issue to review an order of the Commission, and the Commission objected to the order for want of jurisdiction, but the writ was ordered without passing on the merits, the Commission was not precluded from insisting on their objection raised on reply to order to show cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Service Commissions, Dec. Dig. —35.]

2. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSIONS —29—ORDERS—APPEALS—TIME.

By specific provision of Public Utilities Act, § 66 (Laws 1911 [Ex. Sess.] p. 54), an aggrieved party, who fails to apply for rehearing of an order of the Public Utilities Commission before its effective date, loses his right to have such order reviewed in the courts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Service Commissions, Dec. Dig. —29.]

3. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSIONS —19(1) —ORDERS—APPEALS—TIME.

Public Utilities Act, § 61a, providing the effective date of certain orders of the Commission, applies only to proceedings instituted by persons or corporations against public utilities, and not to proceedings instituted by the public utility itself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Service Commissions, Dec. Dig. —19(1).]

4. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSIONS —19(1) —ORDERS—APPEALS—TIME.

In the absence of any statutory provision to the contrary the Public Utilities Commission may provide in its discretion the time when its orders shall take effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Service Commissions, Dec. Dig. —19(1).]

5. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSIONS —27—ORDERS—APPEALS—TIME.

Since the Legislature might have withheld from the courts of the state any power reviewing the acts of the Public Utilities Commission, the power of review which is given must be exercised within the limits and upon the conditions fixed by the Legislature.

In Bank. Application for writ of review by Dan Clemmons and William Clemmons against the Railroad Commission of the State of California and the members thereof. Proceeding dismissed.

James Donovan and F. E. Davis, both of Los Angeles, for petitioners. Douglas Brookman, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. This is a proceeding brought to review an order of the Railroad Commission. Tujunga Water & Power Company, a corporation engaged in supplying water in certain territory in the county of Los Angeles, applied to the Commission for an increase of rates. Certain consumers, including the petitioners above named, appeared and resisted the application. After a hearing the Commission, on July 8, 1915, made and filed its order establishing a schedule of rates greater than those theretofore in force. The order contained a provision that the authorized schedule be put into effect on and after July 15, 1915. On August 13, 1915, Dan and William Clemmons, petitioners herein, filed with the Commission their application for a rehearing. The rehearing was denied on various grounds, one of them being that the application had not been presented within the time allowed by law. The applicants petitioned this court for a writ of certiorari.

In the first instance, we issued an order to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue. In response to this order, the Commission raised the objection that its order could not be reviewed here because timely application had not been made to the Commission itself for rehearing. Public Utilities Act, § 66. On the return day of the order to show cause, the court directed the issuance of a writ of certiorari, and return to this writ has been duly made.

[1] Notwithstanding our order that a writ issue, the respondents are not precluded from continuing to insist, as they do, upon their preliminary objection raised in response to the order to show cause. In ordering the issuance of the writ of certiorari we did not finally pass upon the merits of this objection. In any event, the point goes to the jurisdiction of the court, and it may, therefore be raised at any stage of the proceedings.

The Public Utilities Act (section 67) provides that:

"Within thirty days after the application for a rehearing is denied, or, if the application is granted, * * * within thirty days after the rendition of the decision on rehearing, the applicant may apply to the Supreme Court of this state for a writ of certiorari or review * * * for the purpose of having the lawfulness of the original order or decision or the order or decision on rehearing inquired into and determined."

The same section, after defining the scope of such writ of review, declares that:

"No court of this state (except the Supreme Court to the extent herein specified) shall have jurisdiction to review, reverse, correct or annul any order or decision of the Commission or to suspend or delay the execution or operation thereof, or to enjoin, restrain or interfere with the Commission in the performance of its official duties; provided, that the writ of mandamus shall lie from the Supreme Court to the Commission in all proper cases."

[2] The validity of these limitations upon the control of the courts of this state over the acts of the Railroad Commission was definitely settled in Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Eshleman, 186 Cal. 640, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822. All of the justices who took part in the decision of that case agreed that the conclusion just stated was the necessary consequence of the constitutional grant to the Legislature of authority to confer powers upon the Railroad Commission, such authority being "expressly declared to be plenary and unlimited by any provision of this Constitution." Const. art. 12, § 22. Section 66 of the Public Utilities Act provides that:

"No cause of action arising out of any order or decision of the Commission shall accrue in any court to any corporation or person unless such corporation or person shall have made, before the effective date of said order or decision, an application to the commission for a rehearing."

Since in the case at bar "the effective date" of the order complained of was, by the order itself, declared to be July 15, 1915, and since application for rehearing was not made until 29 days after that date, it follows that the petitioners have lost their right to apply to this court, or to any court of this state, for a review of the action of the commission.

[3] The petitioners seek to escape the effect of this reasoning by the contention that, under section 61a of the act, orders of the Commission do not take effect until 20 days after service of such orders. It is claimed, and the evidence seems to support the claim, that there was no service of the order in this case upon these petitioners or their attorney until within 20 days prior to the filing of the application for rehearing. We are satisfied, however, that the provision of section 61a thus relied upon by the petitioners has no application to the present case. Section 60 provides for the making of complaint, by the Commission of its own motion, or by any person interested, against any public utility. Such complaint is to be served by copy upon the corporation or person complained of, and time is to be set for the hearing. Section 61a, which immediately follows, begins by providing for a hearing at the time so fixed. It then goes on to provide for the order of the Commission, and states that:

A "copy of such order, certified under the seal of the Commission, shall be served upon the corporation or person complained of, or his or its attorney. Said order shall, of its own force, take effect and become operative twenty days after the service thereof, except as otherwise provided. * * *

These provisions in section 61a have reference to an order made after the hearing contemplated in that section, and such hearing clearly is one following a complaint presented under section 60. Sections 60 and 61a both deal with a proceeding initiated by complaint against a corporation or person conducting a public utility. Neither section has any reference to a proceeding like the present, where the public utility itself has instituted a proceeding before the Commission, and is seeking relief which may affect all of its numerous patrons. The soundness of this distinction is made quite apparent by a consideration of the next succeeding section (62), which deals specifically with proceedings initiated by public utilities for the purpose of getting some affirmative relief. This section provides for complaints by public utilities, and authorizes the Commission to hear such complaints ex parte or after service upon such parties as may be designated by the Commission. In such proceedings, the many consumers or other members of the public who may be affected are not included in the term "the corporation or person complained of," as used in section 61a, and that section has no application. Where, as in this case, a public utility seeks to have its rates raised, every consumer is as much a person complained of as is any other. If the petitioners' contention be sound, an order authorizing an increase of rates would not be effective until 20 days after service of the order upon every consumer. We do not think this is the intent of the statute, or within a fair interpretation of its terms.

[4, 5] In the absence of any provision to the contrary in the statute, we see no reason to doubt that the Commission may provide in its discretion for the time when its orders shall take effect. It is urged by the petitioners that the Commission might fix so short a time that it would be impossible to petition for a rehearing, and might thereby deprive a party aggrieved of any right to resort to the courts for redress. But the answer to this is that the Legislature might have withheld from the courts of the state any power of reviewing the acts of the Commission. Pac. T. & T. Co. v. Eshleman, supra. The power of review which is given must be exercised within the limits and upon the conditions which the Legislature has seen fit to fix.

The necessary result of the foregoing discussion is that the failure of the petitioners to ask the Commission for a rehearing within the time allowed by the statute bars them of any right to ask this court to review the order complained of. There is therefore no occasion, and it would be improper to inquire into the merits of the attack made upon the order of the Commission. That order has become final, so far as the power of this court to review it in certiorari is concerned.

The proceeding is dismissed.

Where one was killed while cutting firewood at a certain price per cord under employment by the agent of a contractor with the landowner to have the wood cut from trees on the land, deceased furnishing his own working tools, determining his own hours of labor and his compensation depending on inspection and measurement of his work, the relation of master and servant did not exist.

In Bank. Application for writ of review by Donlon Bros. and another against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California. Award annulled.

Bradner W. Lee, Bradner W. Lee, Jr., and Kenyon F. Lee, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. [1] Review of an award of the Industrial Accident Commission. The admitted facts disclose that petitioners, Donlon Bros., a copartnership, contracted with K. Kataoka, agreeing to pay him $4.50 a cord for firewood which he was to cut from a row of eucalyptus trees growing on the tract of land owned by the Donlon Bros. Kataoka, a Japanese, contemplated having the contract performed by Japanese labor. Unable to procure it, he contracted with Angel Garcia for the doing of the same work, agreeing to pay Angel Garcia at the rate of $4.25 a cord. Thereafter Angel Garcia in turn contracted with Lachuga to pay him $4 a cord for the doing of the same work. Lachuga entered into the performance of this contract, and employed one Antonia Hernandez to assist him, with the understanding that they were to divide the $4 per cord received. Lachuga furnished his own tools and implements and labored at his pleasure. He was not under the authority or direction of the petitioner, nor was Garcia, who employed him. While Lachuga and Hernandez were so working together Lachuga was killed by a falling tree. The opinion of the majority of the Commission, upon which the award is based, is as follows:

"The evidence in this case makes out the case of a piece worker, cutting firewood upon property owned by Donlon Bros., who had undertaken to have the work done on their premises by letting a contract to one Kataoka, who, through his agent, employed the deceased to cut wood at $4 a cord. The principal question to be determined was whether the status of the deceased was that of an employé or an independent contractor. The deceased furnished his own working tools; he was a free agent as to his hours of labor, but he could be discharged at any time. His work was inspected and measured to determine whether or not it was satisfactory and to arrive at the amount of his earnings. His earnings are proved to have been less than the minimum of $333.33 fixed by the statute."

[2, 3] Commissioner Weinstock filed his dissent, holding that the relation of employer and employé necessarily involves the element of personal service, which is not delegable, and that the facts clearly established that such relationship did not exist; that Kataoka, the only one with whom petitioner had dealings, was an independent contractor, and that this relationship extended to the subcontractor. In this we think the dissenting commissioner was clearly right. We consider the case too plain to demand the citation of authority, which, however, is most abundant. As the question of the relationship is jurisdictional (Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 180, 149 Pac. 35; Western Indemnity Co. v. Pillsbury, 170 Cal. 686, 151 Pac. 398), it follows that the award must be annulled, even upon the findings of the Commission; and it is so ordered. Cars- tens v. Pillsbury et al., 158 Pac. 218.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Triest & Co. and another against Leo W. Goldstone and others. Transferred to the Supreme Court after judgment of the District Court of Appeal, affirming on appeal judgment for defendants, other than Jacob Goldstone, who was defaulted. Affirmed.

D. Freidenrich and Henry G. W. Dinkelspiel, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Joseph E. Bien and Milton B. Babb, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. The case comes to this court by virtue of an order of transfer, after judgment by the District Court of Appeal for the First Appellate District. The Court of Appeal, speaking through Mr. Justice Kerrigan, delivered an opinion which reads as follows:

"This is an appeal from a judgment in an action to recover rent alleged to be due according to the terms of a certain lease. Judgment went for the defendants, and plaintiffs appeal."

[1, 2] "On July 8, 1907, a lease was entered into between plaintiffs as lessors, and Goldstone Bros., a corporation, as lessee, of the basement, ground floor, and first floor of a building then under construction on Mission street in San Francisco, for the term of ten years from the time of the completion of the building, at a total rental of $48,000, payable in equal monthly installments of $400 in advance, on the 1st day of each month.

"The building was completed July 31, 1907, and the corporation went into possession under the lease. At the time of the execution of the lease and continuously thereafter up to the time that the corporation forfeited its charter, defendants were its directors, and they also constituted all of its stockholders. The corporation was engaged in the wholesale men's furnishing goods business. On December 1, 1909, the defendants divided among themselves the stock of merchandise belonging to the corporation. The value thereof was about $40,000. They divided among themselves the book accounts as collected, and by the end of the year 1910 there were no assets of any consequence remaining which had not been distributed. At the time the division was made the corporation had no debts and no obligations other than the obligations under the lease. The corporation failed to pay its license tax for the year 1910, and forfeited its charter on November 30, 1910. At the time the merchandise was divided, four of the defendants organized two partnerships. Leo W. and Joseph Goldstone became partners under the firm name of Goldstone Manufacturing Company, and Moses A. and Henry Goldstone became partners under the firm name of Goldstone Bros., and the two partnerships divided between themselves the leased premises, each taking one-half thereof. Commencing with the month of August, 1910, and up to and including the month of March, 1912, each partnership paid to the lessors $200 per month for the one-half of the premises which each occupied, plaintiffs giving to each a receipt for $200 rent of one-half of premises, 732 Mission street. During the month of March, 1912, one of the partnerships, Goldstone Manufacturing Company, removed from the premises. The installment of rent which was payable on the 1st of April, 1912, was not paid, and no rent has been paid since that time.

"This action was commenced after the installment of rent for the month of April, 1912, had accrued, to have it adjudged that the withdrawal and division by the defendants among themselves of the capital stock of Goldstone Bros., a corporation, in violation of the provisions of section 309, Civil Code, was unlawful, and that the defendants be required to account for the capital stock of the corporation so withdrawn and divided and its avails, and that plaintiffs have and recover from the defendants jointly and severally, to the full amount of the capital stock so withdrawn and divided, the unpaid rent for the month of April, 1912, and all additional installments of rent which shall accrue and become payable up to the time of the entry of judgment herein. The complaint also contains a prayer for general relief.

"Defendant Jacob Goldstone was served, but failed to answer, and his default was duly entered. The other defendants answered. The cause came on for trial, and resulted, as above stated, in a decision in favor of the defendants. A judgment having been entered in accordance therewith, this appeal was taken within 60 days after the entry based upon the judgment roll, and also a bill of exceptions containing the substance of all of the evidence which was offered and admitted.

"The court found and decided that on the 30th day of November, 1910, the plaintiffs resumed possession of the demised premises, and other persons became tenants of said plaintiffs of said premises. That the other persons who became tenants were the partnership of Goldstone Bros., consisting of Moses A. and Henry Goldstone, of one-half of the premises, and the partnership of Goldstone Manufacturing Company, consisting of Leo W. and Joseph Goldstone, of the other half.

"In addition to what has been said, it appears from the record that the plaintiffs were fully aware of the manner in which the Goldstone Bros. corporation was being dissolved. The place of business of one of the plaintiffs, Triest & Co., was next door on Mission street to the premises occupied by the corporation, and one of the officers of Triest & Co. was not only familiar with the manner in which the defunct corporation gave up its business, but he was very intimate with the members of the corporation, was frequently consulted by them concerning the dissolution, and, there being the possibility of an arbitration proceeding in connection with said dissolution, agreed to act as arbitrator. The plaintiffs were aware that the premises had been subdivided, each partnership taking a certain part of them, and each paying to the plaintiffs $200 a month for the portion occupied by it.

"It is not disputed that the defendants, under the provisions of section 309 of the Civil Code, are liable for the rent reserved in the lease unless there was a surrender by operation of law of the demised premises. We are of the opinion that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that there was such a surrender.

"A surrender is created by operation of law when the parties to a lease do some act so inconsistent with the subsisting relation of landlord and tenant as to imply that they have both agreed to consider the surrender made. In this state it has been said that the surrender operates by way of estoppel independently of the intention of the parties. 24 Cyc. 1367; Ladd v. Smith, 6 Or. 316.

"A surrender is the yielding up of an estate for life or years to the reversioner or remainderman. Under the statute of frauds it can be done by express consent of the parties in writing, or by operation of law when the parties do something which implies that the parties have consented. These acts are such as would estop the parties from disputing the fact of surrender, and which would not be valid unless the term were ended; as, for instance, a new lease accepted by the tenant, or the resumption of possession by the landlord, if the tenant acquiesces, or the giving of a lease to another; and any act which will amount to an eviction will estop the landlord and make a formal surrender unnecessary; and, while it is said that a surrender by operation of law is by acts which imply mutual consent, it is quite evident that such result is independent of the intention of the parties that their acts shall have that effect.' Welcome v. Hess, 90 Cal. 507, 27 Pac. 369, 25 Am. St. Rep. 145.

"The Goldstone Bros. Company disposed of its entire stock and retired from business, and four of the five persons who were perhaps liable under the provisions of section 309, Civil Code, to the plaintiffs for the rent reserved in the lease formed two copartnerships, constituting two distinct entities separate from the corporation, and each of these copartnerships, as we have seen, took a portion of the demised premises and paid rent therefor. This all was without objection, and with the knowledge and acquiescence of the plaintiffs, and we therefore entertain no doubt, and accordingly hold, that the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding of the trial court that the plaintiffs consented to the substitution of the new tenants, whereby the Goldstone Bros. corporation was released or discharged from any further obligation under the lease. 24 Cyc. 1142, 1370; Ettlinger v. Kruger (Sup.) 125 N. Y. Supp. 445; Fry v. Patridge, 73 Ill. 51; Page v. Ellsworth, 44 Barb. (N. Y.) 636; Colton v. Gorham, 72 Iowa, 324, 33 N. W. 76.

"In the case of Brayton v. Boomer, 131 Iowa, 28, 107 N. W. 1099, a tenant of a business building sold out his business on an agreement of the purchaser to pay the rent thereafter, and the arrangement was made known to the landlord, who made no objection and tacitly consented thereto. It was held that the original tenant became relieved from liability for rent accruing after that time, the court saying: 'No one will question that the parties to a tenancy, whatever the character, may, by mutual consent, terminate the same at pleasure, and consent in form of words is not necessary. If the lessor, with knowledge of the assignment, so deal with the parties that his consent to the assignment may fairly be implied—in other words, that he tacitly consented thereto—it is sufficient.'

[3, 4] We are satisfied, upon further study of the record and the arguments of counsel, that the foregoing opinion contains an accurate statement of the facts and a clear and correct disposition of the questions of law arising on these facts. In granting the application for transfer we were influenced by the thought that the decision of the Court of Appeal might be in conflict with the doctrine declared in Samuels v. Ottinger, 169 Cal. 209, 146 Pac. 638, and similar cases. Bonetti v. Treat, 91 Cal. 223, 27 Pac. 612, 14 L. R. A. 151; Brosnan v. Kramer, 135 Cal. 36, 66 Pac. 979. The rule laid down in these cases is well settled. It is that where a lessee has, by his lease, expressly agreed to pay rent, he is not absolved from this obligation by an assignment of his rights under the lease, even though the lessor may have accepted payment of rent from the assignee. But we have here no question of assignment. The defense, sustained by the findings of the trial court, was that the plaintiffs had resumed possession of the premises and accepted persons other than the original lessee, as tenants of different portions of the demised premises. In other words, the defendants relied upon a surrender of the lease, and such surrender, as is shown by the authorities cited by Mr. Justice Kerrigan, may be accomplished by operation of law without any written agreement to that end. Whether in any given case there has been such surrender is a question of fact to be determined in the first instance by the trial court. We entertain no doubt that the conduct of the parties, as set forth in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, together with inferences fairly deducible from that conduct, fully justified the finding that was made. If there was a surrender of the lease by the original tenant, and a letting of the premises to other tenants, who held thereafter under an oral agreement, rather than under the original writing, there was, of course, no assignment of the lease, and the decisions on the effect of acceptance of rent from the assignee have no bearing.

The judgment is affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action to foreclose a statutory lien by the County of San Bernardino against Frances Stewart. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. C. Campbell, of Long Beach, for appellant. R. B. Goodcell and Frank T. Bates, both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The defendant has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The county of San Bernardino began this action to foreclose an alleged lien upon the farm of the defendant for the amount of certain expenses incurred and paid by the county in fumigating the orchard of the defendant situated on said farm, done to free said orchard of noxious insects with which it was infested. The work was done and the proceeding instituted under the authority of sections 2322, 2322a, 2322b, and 2322c of the Political Code.

Section 2322 authorizes the board of supervisors of a county, upon the conditions therein stated, to appoint a horticulture commissioner for such county. Section 2322a makes it the duty of the horticulture commissioner of the county to cause inspection to be made of orchards within the county, and if any are found infested with pests or disease injurious to fruit—

"he shall in writing notify the owner or owners, or person or persons in charge, or in possession of the said places or orchards, * * * that the same are infested with said * * * pests * * * and require such person or persons, to eradicate or destroy the said insects, or other pests, or their eggs or larvæ, * * * within a certain time to be therein specified."

It also provides that:

"Said notices may be served upon the person or persons, or either of them, owning or having charge, or having possession of such infested place or orchard, * * * or upon the agents of either, by any commissioner, or by any person deputed by the said commissioner for that purpose in the same manner as a summons in a civil action."

Also that any places so infested with pests or noxious insects—

"are hereby adjudged and declared to be a public nuisance; and whenever any such nuisance shall exist at any place within his county, and the proper notice * * * shall have been served, as herein provided, and such nuisance shall not have been abated within the time specified in such notice, it shall be the duty of the county horticultural commissioner to cause said nuisance to be at once abated, by eradicating or destroying said diseases, insects, or other pests, or their eggs, or larvæ. * * * The expense thereof shall be a county charge, and the board of supervisors shall allow and pay the same out of the general fund of the county. Any and all * * * sums so paid shall be and become a lien on the property and premises from which said nuisance has been removed or abated in pursuance of this chapter."

It further provides that a notice of such lien shall be recorded in the recorder's office within 30 days after the right has accrued, and that "an action to foreclose the same shall be commenced within ninety days" thereafter by the district attorney of the county in the name of the county. This suit was begun upon the authority of this section.

[1,2] The effect of this statute is to impose upon the property owner, without his consent, the burden of the expense of fumigating his orchard. It is a proceeding in invitum for the public benefit. It requires no citation of authority to establish the proposition that the statutory method of procedure must be at least substantially followed in order to create a valid lien against the private property of an individual, for such expense, or to compel him to pay the expenses incurred by the county in that behalf. In this case the statutory procedure was not followed. The statute provides that the horticulture commissioner shall give the notice to the owner to destroy the pests in his orchard. The notice given in the present case was not signed by the horticulture commissioner, and does not purport to be given by him. It was signed by C. A. Nelson, a local inspector, and purports to be given upon his authority alone. The statute requires that the notice shall be served on the owner of the property, or on the person in charge thereof, by the horticulture commissioner or by any person deputed by said commissioner for that purpose. The notice was served by Nelson, the inspector, who signed the same, not by the horticulture commissioner. It does not appear that Nelson was deputed by the horticulture commissioner or authorized by him to serve said notice, or that he had any authority from the horticulture commissioner, or under the law, to serve the notice. The statute requires that it shall be served in the same manner as a summons in a civil action. The service of the notice in question was accomplished, so far as there was any service, by delivering it to one J. H. Stewart, who was at that time upon the premises. He was not the owner thereof, and he was not in charge or control thereof for the owner. The owner was at that time on the premises in question, and could readily have been served personally, if the necessary pains had been taken to that end. J. H. Stewart was her brother, and lived on the premises in the same house with his sister. He owned lands in the vicinity and cultivated them, and also at times assisted his sister in the cultivation of her land, and sometimes advised with her concerning the same, but he was in no legal sense her agent in charge of the property and had no control thereof. For these reasons we are of the opinion that no valid lien was acquired upon the property by the proceedings in question. This conclusion renders it unnecessary to determine whether or not the property owner may, in such a case, prove, as a partial defense, that the amount paid by the county for the expense of fumigating was in excess of the reasonable cost thereof.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action to foreclose a statutory lien by the County of San Bernardino against J. H. Stewart. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

E. C. Campbell, of Long Beach, for appellant. R. B. Goodcell and Frank T. Bates, both of San Bernardino, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The action was one by the county of San Bernardino to foreclose an alleged lien upon defendant's land for expenses incurred and paid by the county in fumigating defendant's orchard and freeing the trees of noxious insects. In some particulars the cause resembles County of San Bernardino v. Stewart, L. A. No. 3766, 159 Pac. 717, in which an opinion was filed on August 1, 1916. There are certain differences in this case. For example, it appears that service of notice was made upon defendant personally. He waived the five days within which he might have done the work, under the terms of the notice, and permitted the premises to be entered and the fumigating of the trees to proceed. In all other particulars this case is just like the one cited. In this, as in that, the notice was issued and signed by the local inspector, and not by the county horticultural commissioner. It does not appear that the commissioner either directed or was cognizant of the service of the notice to fumigate the trees. As the inspector's authority to give the notice does not appear, and as, this being a proceeding in invitum, it must be shown that the statutory method of procedure was followed in order that the lien should attach, we must hold on the authority of County of San Bernardino v. Stewart, supra, that the jurisdiction of the lower court was not shown, and that the judgment does not find full support in the record.

The judgment and order are reversed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Placer County; J. E. Prewett, Judge.

Action by Edmund Vore against Ferdinand Ephraim and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and order in effect denying new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

I. B. L. Brandt, of San Francisco, for appellants. John M. Fulweiler, of Auburn, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendants have appealed from the judgment.

The court below made an order that plaintiff's motion to dismiss defendants' motion for a new trial be granted. The defendants filed two notices of appeal from this order, one designating it as an order denying defendants' motion of a new trial, and the other designating it as an order dismissing defendants' motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] The appeal from the judgment was taken within 60 days after its entry. A bill of exceptions for use on the motion for new trial was duly proposed and settled and is set forth in the transcript. A bill of exceptions so settled for use on motion for new trial may be used in support of an appeal from the judgment, although it was not regularly used on the motion for a new trial. Wall v. Mines, 128 Cal. 138, 60 Pac. 682; Vinson v. Los Angeles, etc., Co., 141 Cal. 154, 74 Pac. 757; Gay v. Gay, 146 Cal. 240, 79 Pac. 885; Code Civ. Proc. § 950. As the appeal from the judgment was taken within 60 days, the sufficiency of the evidence may be considered, as well as the alleged errors of law occurring at the trial. Code Civ. Proc. § 939; Brown v. Tolles, 7 Cal. 398; Walls v. Preston, 25 Cal. 59; Harper v. Minor, 27 Cal. 107; Haviland v. Southern C. E. Co., 158 Pac. 328, decided May 25, 1916. From these principles it appears that the questions presented may be as well reviewed on appeal from the judgment as upon an appeal from an order denying a motion for new trial. Hence the elaborate discussions in the briefs regarding the action of the court below upon the motion for new trial and its effect upon our authority to review the errors of law presented are unimportant and require no consideration at our hands.

[3] The complaint stated a cause of action to quiet the plaintiff's alleged title to about 20 acres of land included within the boundaries of the east half of section 3, township 13, range 9 east, in Placer county. Therein the plaintiff claimed title to the land described under a mining location regularly made by him on September 11, 1911, under the mining laws of the United States, and on his allegation that at that time the said lands were unoccupied public mineral lands of the United States. The defendants claim title derived from the Central Pacific Railroad Company, under a patent from the United States executed on June 23, 1883, in pursuance of the grant of the United States to the Central Pacific Railroad Company by the act of Congress of July 1, 1862, c. 120, 12 U. S. Stats. 492, and the amendment of July 2, 1864, c. 216, 13 U. S. Stats. 356. The defendants are the successors in interest, by deeds regularly executed by the Central Pacific Railroad Company, to the title which it acquired by said patent. At the time said patent was issued in 1883, the particular land here involved was in the possession of the plaintiff and was worked by him as a mining claim. Gold had been discovered therein and was being taken therefrom by him in large quantities. In 1887 the plaintiff left said claim and abandoned it. So far as appears it was never again worked as a mining claim and there was no further assertion that it constituted mineral land until the plaintiff again located the parcel in 1911, as aforesaid. The patent under which the defendants claim contained an exception, which at that time was inserted in all patents issued by the United States, reading as follows:

"Excepting all mineral land, should any such be found in the tracts aforesaid."

The act of 1862, granting the land, contained this clause:

"Provided, that all mineral lands shall be excepted from the operation of this act."

The contention of the respondent is that by reason of this proviso in the granting act and the exception in the patent, coupled with the fact that at the time the patent was issued the land was known to be mineral in character and was worked as a mine, the railroad company and its successors obtained no title to that part of the land purporting to be conveyed by the patent which was covered by the mining location.

Every question upon which the respondent relies in support of this claim is decided against him in the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Burke v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 234 U. S. 669, 34 Sup. Ct. 907, 58 L. Ed. 1527. It is but fair to add that this decision was made after the rendition of the judgment herein. The decision in that case involved the construction of the grant to the Southern Pacific Railroad Company by the act of July 27, 1866, c. 278, 14 U. S. Stats. 292. That act also, as do the acts of 1862 and 1864, excluded from its operation all mineral lands other than coal and iron lands. In that case, as in this, mining locations had been made on the land in controversy and discovery made thereon prior to the issuance of the patent. At the time the patent was issued in 1894, the locators were in possession of the mining locations, but afterwards they abandoned the same and the plaintiff and his associates relocated the same under the mining laws of the United States. The patent in that case contained a clause excepting mineral lands, should any be found in the tracts, substantially the same as that contained in the patent here under consideration. After elaborate consideration the court there decided the following propositions: (1) That although mineral lands, known to be such at and before the issuance of patent, were excluded from the grant, yet that the act cast upon the land department of the United States the duty of determining the character of the land before issuing patents therefor; (2) that the land department was the legally constituted tribunal to determine the question whether or not the land to be patented was or was not mineral land within the meaning of the act, and that its determination was not void, but that a patent issued in due form passed the title, subject only to the right of the United States to attack the patent by a direct suit for its annulment if the land was known to be mineral when the patent issued; (3) that the clause in the patent purporting to except mineral land found to be in the tract is void, because the officers of the United States who prepare and issue the patent have no authority to insert such exception; (4) that a patent so issued constitutes "a conclusive and official declaration that the land is agricultural and that all the requirements have been complied with," except upon a direct attack by the United States, or some person acting in privity with it, to set aside the patent for fraud or mistake, or to declare a trust under it; (5) that one claiming under a mining location, made after the issuance of the patent and after the previous location was abandoned, is not in privity with the United States so as to be able to invoke the right to annul such patent; (6) that the fact that the claimant of the mining location was not in privity with the government when the patent was issued prevents him from attacking the patent on the ground of fraud or mistake.

These propositions cover the case made by the respondent and show beyond controversy that the court below erred in its findings and judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

[4] The defendants also pleaded in defense a former adjudication. The defendants here, other than Ephraim and his wife, are the heirs of one Michael Phillips, a former co-owner with Ephraim. In 1893, the defendants Ferdinand Ephraim and the executrix of the estate of Michael Phillips began an action against the plaintiff Vore to quiet their title to certain lands, including that here in controversy, alleging that Vore claimed some interest or estate therein adverse to the plaintiff which was without right. Vore appeared and demurred to the complaint, the demurrer was overruled, he failed to answer, and thereupon judgment was entered against him in favor of the plaintiffs in that action, defendants here, declaring that all claims of Vore to the land were invalid and that the plaintiffs were the true and lawful owners thereof and of every part and parcel thereof. The court below was of the opinion that this judgment was not a bar, its theory being that at that time the land was public land of the United States, and that the present claim of the plaintiff Vore is based upon a mining claim made after that judgment was given and is an after-acquired title on which he may prevail. As we have seen, the court was in error in the premise that the land was then public land of the United States. This is fatal to its conclusion. The land at that time belonged to the defendants and has ever since belonged to them. That judgment was a conclusive determination in their favor against the plaintiff in this case. There was no after-acquired title. No other points are discussed which require notice.

The judgment and order are reversed.

In Bank. Certiorari, on the relation of the Western Indemnity Company, a corporation, against A. J. Pillsbury and others, as members of and constituting the Industrial Accident Commission, to review proceedings leading to an award to H. H. Stevens. Award annulled.

Eugene F. Conlin, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Certiorari directed to the Industrial Accident Commission to review the proceedings leading to an award made to H. H. Stevens against the Western Indemnity Company. H. S. Tittle was a defendant before the Industrial Accident Commission, but the Western Indemnity Company, his insurance carrier, assumed all liability which might exist against its codefendant.

H. S. Tittle was a contractor engaged in performing work for the city and county of San Francisco in connection with the municipal railway line on Van Ness avenue. Mr. Stevens called upon Mr. Tittle and, presenting his card, which announced him as one engaged in "teaming and grading," offered to furnish teams and drivers for the work, if any should be required, at $6 a day for team, wagon, and driver. No contract was made at that time, but about a week later Mr. Tittle notified Mr. Stevens that he required a team. One was furnished; Mr. Stevens driving it himself. About a week later, Stevens was notified that another team was needed. He agreed to furnish and did furnish a second driver, team, and wagon at $6 a day, employing the driver himself and paying him $3 a day.

The Industrial Accident Commission found that Mr. Stevens was an employé, in that he had "agreed to provide a team and wagon and drive it himself." He was injured and demanded compensation. It is contended by petitioner here that the finding of the commission to the effect that Stevens agreed to drive the team himself is entirely without support in the evidence, and that under the facts as shown without conflict he was an independent contractor.

[1,2] It is the rule that, where there is a substantial conflict of testimony regarding the status of a person claiming compensation, the finding of the commission will not be disturbed. We must examine the record carefully, therefore, and if we find any evidence to support the finding that Stevens was an employé we should not annul the award. If he was not an "employé," unquestionably the commission had not authority to award compensation because the power of the Legislature only extends to the creation and enforcement of a liability on the part of employers to compensate their employes. Carstens v. Pillsbury, 158 Pac. 218.

There is no substantial conflict in the testimony. It is undisputed that the contract between Stevens and Tittle did not cover any definite period. It is also undisputed that the latter's foreman directed Stevens and his driver in the matter of the materials to be hauled. There was no agreement regarding the bulk of matter or the number of loads per day, but each wagon was to be used for the period of eight hours a day both in removing the rubbish and surplus sand that accumulated from Tittle's work as a general contractor constructing the railway tracks and also in hauling lumber and rock for the use of Tittle. But there is no word of evidence that Stevens was employed personally to drive either of his teams. He was to furnish the means of accomplishing certain results—namely, drivers, teams, and wagons—and there was no element of personal service in the contract. It is true that he did drive one of his own wagons; but, if he had desired to devote a day to other occupations, his contract with Tittle would have been fully performed if he had put any competent man in charge of the horses he had been driving, because he had been required to furnish "teams" (which included wagons and drivers). Neither Mr. Stevens nor the driver of his second team was listed as an employé on the books of Mr. Tittle (who did business under the name of "Tittle Company"); the account being carried as "H. H. Stevens Teams." At the end of each week an envelope was given to Stevens containing pay at the rate of $6 per day for each team; neither he nor his driver receiving any segregated sum from Tittle as wages. It is clear that the contract was not one between employer and employé in the sense of section 14 of the Compensation Act, but one by which Mr. Stevens agreed to furnish facilities for doing a certain sort of work. There was no stipulation between the contractor who was performing the work for the municipality and Stevens regarding wages. A lump sum was paid for each team, and Mr. Tittle knew nothing, so far as the testimony reveals, regarding the amount of wages paid Stevens' driver. Neither did he pay Mr. Stevens a certain sum for use of the teams and another sum for personal services. The amount paid was $12 a day for two drivers, two teams, and two wagons. After the accident another driver was substituted for the injured man. He continued to perform the work just as his employer had done it, and his name was never given to the Tittle Company, nor entered upon the books, but the money due for the two teams was paid to the wife of the injured man.

[3] Section 14 of the Compensation Act provides that:

"The term 'employé' as used in sections 12 to 35, inclusive, of this act shall be construed to mean: Every person in the service of an employer as defined by section 13 hereof under any appointment or contract of hire or apprenticeship, express or implied, oral or written." St. 1913, p. 284.

A "contract of hire" means a contract for personal services, and this is emphasized by the fact that the basis of compensation provided by the act is the amount of wages earned. Doubtless there could be a contract of service without stipulated wages, but there could be no employé unless his personal services were rendered to the employer, and since wages are generally paid for personal services, wages or salary are made the criteria of compensations given to injured employées.

[4] The word "servant" is generally synonymous with the word "employé" (35 Cyc. 1431; 3 Words and Phrases, 2369 and 2376; 7 Words and Phrases, 6426; Hand v. Cole, 88 Tenn. 400, 12 S. W. 922, 7 L. R. A. 96), and section 2009 of our Civil Code defines a servant as follows:

"A servant is one who is employed to render personal service to his employer, otherwise than in the pursuit of an independent calling, and who in such service remains entirely under the control and direction of the latter, who is called his master."

[5] Thus reasoning from the definition furnished by the act itself it seems clear that the man who received an award of compensation was not an "employé" of the railroad contractor.

But it is urged with much force that since the foreman for Tittle Company directed Stevens in the matters of the materials to be hauled the latter was not an independent contractor—that the test of what constitutes independent service lies in the control exercised and that the driver being under the supervision of the foreman was therefore an employé of Tittle. It is true that many authorities specify "control" of the person performing work as the means of differentiating service from independent employment. The test of "control," however, means "complete control." For example, the citizen who hires a taxicab to take him to a certain place exercises that amount of control over the driver but he does not thereby become the man's employer. Labatt, in his work on Master and Servant (2d Ed., § 25), says:

"It is well settled that, where one person is performing work in which another is beneficially interested, the latter may exercise over the former a certain measure of control for a definite and restricted purpose, without incurring the responsibilities, or acquiring the immunities, of a master, with respect to the person controlled."

In Driscoll v. Towle, 181 Mass. 416, 63 N. E. 922, the court said (Mr. Chief Justice Holmes delivering the opinion):

"In cases like the present, there is a general consensus of authority that, although a driver may be ordered by those who have dealt with his master to go to this place or that, to take this or that burden, to hurry or to take his time, nevertheless in respect to the manner of his driving and the control of his horse he remains subject to no orders but those of the man who pays him. Therefore he can make no one else liable if he negligently runs a person down in the street. Huff v. Ford, 126 Mass. 24 [30 Am. Rep. 645]; Reagan v. Casey, 160 Mass. 374, 379 [36 N. E. 58]; Jones v. Liverpool, 14 Q. B. D. 890; Waldock v. Winfield [1901] 2 K. B. 596; Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499; Laugher v. Pointer, 5 B. & C. 547, 558; Murray v. Dwight, 161 N. Y. 301 [35 N. E. 901, 48 L. R. A. 673]; Lewis v. Long Island Railroad, 162 N. Y. 52, 66 [56 N. E. 548]; New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad v. Steinbrenner, 47 N. J. Law, 161 [54 Am. Rep. 126]; Joslin v. Grand Rapids Ice Co., 50 Mich. 516 [15 N. W. 887, 45 Am. Rep. 54]; Little v. Hackett, 116 U. S. 366 [6 Sup. Ct. 391, 29 L. Ed. 652]."

That was a case in which it was sought successfully to hold responsible a person engaged in a general teaming business for injuries inflicted by the carelessness of his driver, who at the time was, and for some time theretofore had been, carrying property for an electric light company. The case of Reagan v. Casey, cited supra, was also one in which the injury was inflicted by the negligence of a driver of a team furnished by the owner for a specified sum per day to the city and subject to the orders of the city's foreman. The driver was paid by the owner of the team and wagon and not by the city. It was held that the employer of the driver and not the city was responsible. The same rule is announced in Hedge v. Williams, 131 Cal. 455, 63 Pac. 721, 64 Pac. 106, 82 Am. St. Rep. 366, in which it was held that a firm of plumbers engaged by the defendant to repair a tank on his property were independent contractors and that defendant was not liable for an injury inflicted upon his servant by reason of the carelessness of the servant of the subcontractor. In that case confusion arose in the minds of some of the counsel in the case from the fact that defendant's foreman was also a member of the firm of plumbers. As foreman he directed the repairer to do the work on the tank, but this court held that there was no contractual relation between defendant and Fontaine, who was sent to mend the tank, and that the latter could not be considered the servant of the former.

In the case at bar confusion arose out of the fact that Stevens drove his own team, but we see nothing in that fact which made him a servant and not a contractor. The commission found that Tittle had the right and power of discharging the applicant (Stevens) "and ruling his team off the work" if the services rendered were unsatisfactory but the conjunctive is very significant. Tittle could not, under the contract, discharge Stevens or dispense with the services of the team. The agreement was not thus divisible, and clearly Stevens was not the employé of Tittle. The same distinction between a servant and an independent contractor is observed in Bennett v. Truebody, 66 Cal. 510, 6 Pac. 329, 56 Am. Rep. 117. If Mr. Stevens' driver who had charge of the other wagon had met with an accident his employer would have been liable and the assumption by Stevens of a dual role of contractor and driver did not shift the liability.

It has been said that the true test of a contractor is that he renders service in the course of an independent occupation, following his employer's desires in the results but not in the means used. 1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (6th Ed.) 396. But in weighing the control exercised we must carefully distinguish between authoritative control and mere suggestion as to detail or the necessary co-operation where the work furnished is part of a larger undertaking. Standard Oil Co. v. Anderson, 212 U. S. 221, 222, 29 Sup. Ct. 252, 53 L. Ed. 480. The same principles are announced in Fink v. Missouri Furnace Co., 82 Mo. 276, 52 Am. Rep. 376. In Chisholm v. Walker & Co., 2 B. W. C. C. 261, a case very much like the one at bar, arising under a workmen's compensation statute, it was held that the man who received a certain sum per day for the work of himself and his horse was not engaged in a "contract of service." A similar ruling was made in Ryan v. County Council of Tipperary, 5 B. W. C. C. 578. Spiers v. Elderslie S. S. Co., 2 B. W. C. C. 205, was a case in which a workman engaged by one Williamson, a subcontractor, to work in removing scales from boilers on a ship was injured. It was held that the shipowner was not liable.

It is suggested that, inasmuch as the statute enjoins upon the court liberal construction, we should ignore common-law and other definitions, and should, in determining who are and who are not employes, regard only decisions under compensation acts. In re Rheinwald, 168 App. Div. 425, 153 N. Y. Supp. 598, is cited as authority for this position, although counsel for respondents frankly admits that the New York Supreme Court has taken very advanced ground in that decision. With all due respect to the ability and learning of the majority of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of New York, we must say that we can find no satisfactory answer to the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Lyon, in which Mr. Justice Howard concurred, arguing that under the undisputed facts Rheinwald was an independent contractor, as held by the compensation commission.

This court has always endeavored to construe the Workmen's Compensation Act liberally and with a view to carrying out its benevolent purposes, but we cannot see why we should discard the wisdom and learning of the past in our efforts to decide what the Legislature intended by the language used. Especially should we avoid all temptation to stretch the law to cover individual cases where those demanding compensation arouse our sympathy. This man to whom compensation was given was badly injured, but we should not for that reason shut our eyes to the fact that he was an independent contractor, and not an employe. The very strength and propriety of compensation statutes rest in the fact that where a business is charged with the care of injured employes, the hirers in that business of men and women whose daily tasks place them in jeopardy, may insure against the liability imposed by the law. It would be unfair to the employers, unfair to the insurers, and unfair to the legitimate beneficiaries of the statute for us to try by every devious twist of interpretation to uphold every award made, merely because the person seeking it might be unfortunate.

For the reasons set forth above the award is annulled.

GONSALVES et al. v. PETALUMA & S. R. RY. CO. (S. F. 7669.)

1. DEATH — § 32 — WHO MAY SUE — DEPENDENCY ON DECEASED.

Civ. Code, § 1970, as to recovery of damages against employer for death of employe by employe's personal representative for his "widow, children, dependent parents and dependent brothers and sisters," must be construed with Code Civ. Proc. § 377, giving an action for wrongful death to heirs or personal representatives of decedent not a minor against the person causing the death or his employer if responsible for an employe's conduct, so that, in action for employe's death, proof that the action is prosecuted for the benefit of the class of dependents limited in section 1970 is necessary only in actions based upon that section, and not in actions based upon section 377.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 47, 48; Dec. Dig. § 32.]

2. DEATH — § 32 — WHO MAY SUE — UNSAFE PLACE TO WORK.

A cause of action for death founded upon employer's negligence in furnishing employe an unsafe place in which to work may be brought under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, giving an action for wrongful death to heirs or personal representatives of decedent, and need not be brought under Civ. Code, § 1970, limiting recovery to dependents, which section does not supersede rights given by section 377.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 47, 48; Dec. Dig. § 32.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by John Gonsalves and another, administrators of the estate of Manuel Gonsalves, deceased, against the Petaluma & Santa Rosa Railway Company. From judgment for plaintiffs and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin T. McMurray, of San Francisco, for appellant. Ornbau & Fraser and Preston & Preston, all of San Francisco, and W. B. Rinehart, of Oakland, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiffs, suing as administrators of the estate of Manuel Gonsalves, deceased, brought their action against defendant for having negligently occasioned his death by putting him to work in an unsafe place. So far as concerns this appeal, the negligence is conceded, it being stated in the transcript that "evidence was introduced by plaintiffs which, for the purpose of any appeal from the judgment herein, defendant admits tended to prove and was sufficient to prove that the death of Manuel Gonsalves was caused by the negligence of defendant." The complaint charged that the deceased at the time of his death was unmarried; that he died intestate, and left surviving him as his sole heirs at law and next of kin Antonio Gonsalves, his father, and Isabell Gonsalves, his mother, "both of whom at the said time of his death were dependent upon him for their support and maintenance." Further, the complaint alleged that the action was brought for and on behalf of the deceased's heirs to recover the damage occasioned to them by his death. The jury rendered a verdict for plaintiffs in the sum of $1,000, and they submitted to a reduction and remission of this verdict in the sum of $400, upon the suggestion of the court that if this were not done a new trial would be granted. Thereafter defendant appealed.

[1] Section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure is as follows:

"When the death of a person not being a minor is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another, his heirs or personal representatives may maintain an action for damages against the person causing the death, or if such person be employed by another person who is responsible for his conduct, then also against such other person. In every action under this and the preceding section, such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case may be just."

Section 1970 of the Civil Code formerly read as follows:

"An employer is not bound to indemnify his employé for losses suffered by the latter in consequence of the ordinary risks of the business in which he is employed, nor in consequence of the negligence of another person employed by the same employer in the same general business, unless the negligence causing the injury was committed in the performance of a duty the employer owes by law to the employé, or unless the employer has neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the culpable employé."

Subsequently this section was amended in important particulars, and as amended was in force at the time Gonsalves met his death and this action was brought. It is not necessary here to do more than to point out that these amendments greatly modified the earlier rules touching the assumptions of risks and nonliability for injuries occasioned by the negligence of a fellow servant. The section as a whole deals with the question of the indemnification by an employer of an injured employé and of the right of action to the personal representative of an employé who may be killed. Touching this latter matter, the section provides as follows:

"When death, whether instantaneous or otherwise, results from an injury to an employé,

* * * the personal representative of such employé shall have a right of action therefor against such employer, and may recover damages in respect thereof, for and on behalf, and for the benefit of the widow, children, dependent parents, and dependent brothers and sisters, in order of precedence as herein stated. * * *

The Court of Appeal, which first heard the appeal in this case, held that the dependency of the parents—the heirs at law of the deceased—was not proved, and held further that touching the right of action of an injured employé, or of his representatives in case of his death, the general provisions of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure had been superseded by the provisions of section 1970 of the Civil Code, and that as a result, in the case of any and every employé who is killed, a recovery could be had only where dependency was proved.

It was for the consideration of this important question that a hearing before this court was ordered. Heretofore this court has not been called upon to determine the matter. Thus in Ruiz v. Santa Barbara Gas Co., 164 Cal. 188, 128 Pac. 330, we declared that in that case it was immaterial whether it be considered that the action was brought by virtue of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure or by section 1970 of the Civil Code. Again in Pritchard v. Whitney Estate Co., 164 Cal. 564, 129 Pac. 989, the only pronouncement of the court upon this subject is that:

"So far as injuries arising out of that relation are made actionable where death ensues, where they were not actionable before, section 1970 is now the only statute authorizing the action."

This, of course, is a perfectly sound declaration, but it is giving it an unwarranted meaning to say that by it this court even intimated that the general provisions of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure were abrogated in every case of actions by the representatives of deceased employés. Indeed, it would call for very direct and positive language to lead a court to say that the lawmakers in giving the general right of action provided for by section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure to everybody else, and therein declaring that in every such action such damages may be given "as under all the circumstances may be just," meant to deny that right of action and forbid that measure of recovery in the case of representatives of deceased employés, and to declare that as to them there could be no recovery at all unless the heirs of such employés were actual dependents upon them. But there is no language in our law which prompts, much less which forces, the view that the Legislature thus designed to restrict this right of action in cases where the death of an employé had been negligently caused. Section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure still remains in full force and gives the right of action and fixes the measure of recovery in all cases. Section 1970 of the Civil Code is to be construed with section 377, not as superseding it, and so construed it means, as declared in Pritchard v. Whitney Estate Co., supra, that where section 1970 has created rights of action growing out of the relationship of employer and employé, which rights of action did not formerly exist, such rights of action by the representative of an employé who has lost his life may be prosecuted for the benefit of the class limited and designated in the section itself. So construed there is no conflict between the two sections. This construction, we repeat, is not only reasonable, but uniformly it is the construction which other courts have put upon their laws in cases where the provisions of those laws are similar to or identical with our own. We need not be at pains to review these authorities at length. It will be sufficient to refer to St. Germain v. Potlatch, 76 Wash. 102, 135 Pac. 804; Chiara v. Stewart Mining Co., 24 Idaho, 473, 135 Pac. 245; Payne v. N. Y. & Susquehanna R. R. Co., 201 N. Y. 436, 95 N. E. 19; Behringer v. Inspiration Con. Copper Co. (Ariz.) 149 Pac. 1065; Statts v. Twohy Bros. Co., 61 Or. 602, 123 Pac. 909; Colorado Milling Co. v. Mitchell, 26 Colo. 284, 58 Pac. 28.

[2] The only question remaining is whether this cause of action, founded upon the employer's neglect in furnishing the employé an unsafe place in which to do his work, is one created by section 1970. But this question readily answers itself. It is not a cause of action created and given by section 1970, but one that has always existed under the statutory provision of the earlier section 377, Code of Civil Procedure. Hillebrand v. Standard Biscuit Co., 139 Cal. 233, 73 Pac. 163; Sneed v. Marysville Gas Co., 149 Cal. 704, 87 Pac. 376; Clark v. Tulare Dredging Co., 14 Cal. App. 414, 112 Pac. 564.

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇐87—REMEDY OF PURCHASER—RECOVERY OF MONEY PAID.

Where a vendor, after the purchaser's breach of his contract, agreed to a mutual abandonment and rescission, and promised to repay the purchaser the amount paid under the contract as soon as the land was sold, the purchaser was entitled to a repayment of the purchase money.

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇐341(3)—RECOVERY OF PURCHASE MONEY—EVIDENCE.

In a purchaser's action, brought after his breach of his contract, to recover the amount paid thereunder, evidence held to sustain a finding that the vendor had promised to repay all money paid by the purchaser under the contract as soon as the premises were sold by him, and had not declared a forfeiture of any of the purchaser's contracts.

3. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS ⇐46(2)—SALE OF LAND—RECOVERY OF PRICE.

In such case, where the sale to be made by the vendor was made April 21, 1911, the statute of limitations did not begin to run against the purchaser until that date.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Joe Hay against Martin E. Casey and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Richard Belcher and W. H. Carlin, both of Marysville, for appellants. Brittan & Raish and Wetmore & Davies, all of Marysville, for respondent.

HART, J. On February 13, 1909, a written agreement was entered into between the parties to this action, by the terms of which appellants agreed to sell and respondent agreed to buy, for the sum of $7,500, certain real property in the city of Marysville. $900 was paid by respondent at the time of the execution of the agreement, the balance being payable in monthly installments. In addition to the first payment of $900, plaintiff claims to have paid $900 and defendants admit receiving $800, but whether during the life of said contract or under a succeeding one does not clearly appear. On the 4th of March, 1910, a second contract was entered into for the sale of the property, at a consideration of $5,893, payable in installments. Default being made by plaintiff in all or some of these payments, on May 23, 1910, a third contract was executed, the purchase price being specified as $5,916. On this contract also default was made by plaintiff. On October 22, 1910, appellant Martin E. Casey, as party of the first part, J. Ross Traynor, as party of the second part, and respondent, Joe Hay, as party of the third part, entered into a written agreement by which said Traynor was given a 30-day option to sell said property for the sum of $8,000, and appellant Martin E. Casey and respondent therein agreed that the contract of May 23, 1910, "shall be and hereby is canceled and declared null and void. * * * In consideration of which said party of the first part agrees to pay said party of the third part," out of said $8,000, the sum of $1,850, less certain bills for lighting, water, taxes, etc. "In the event said eight thousand dollars be not paid in accordance with this agreement said party of the third part shall receive nothing and shall have no further right, title, claim, or interest in or to any part of said land, premises or personal property." In each of the abovementioned contracts time was made of the essence. On January 25, 1911, appellants entered into an agreement with one T. J. Tyrell for the sale of said property for the sum of $6,000, and, on April 21, 1911, pursuant to said contract, the property was deeded to one Barney Van Buskirk. In the complaint it is alleged:

"On or about the 9th day of February, 1911, and while said plaintiff was in possession of said real property under said contract as aforesaid (the contract of February 13, 1909), said plaintiff and defendants entered into an agreement whereby plaintiff agreed to cancel and rescind the said contract hereinabove referred to in consideration of the payment to plaintiff by defendants of all the sums of money paid by plaintiff to defendants, together with the sums of money expended by said plaintiff in repairing and improving said real property amounting in all to the sum of $2,870" —and the complaint prays judgment in that amount. In their answer defendants denied that they entered into the agreement, above quoted, to pay plaintiff the sum of $2,870, or that plaintiff rescinded the contract of February 13, 1909; but they allege that the payments provided for in the contract of October 22, 1910, to be made by said Traynor, were never made by him, "and at the expiration of the time in said agreement provided, defendant Casey exercised his right, and declared the same forfeited and null and void." The court found that, under the contract of February 13, 1909, plaintiff entered into possession of the property and remained therein continuously until January 25, 1911, and that "defendants had and received of the plaintiff, under said contract, the sum of $1,700." Finding No. 5 is:

"That on or about the 4th day of March, 1910, the said plaintiff and defendants mutually agreed to rescind the contract of February 13, 1909."

There are similar findings as to the contracts of March 4, 1910, and May 23, 1910. Respecting the Traynor contract, of October 22, 1910, the court found:

"That there was no consideration for the waiver of the rights of plaintiff contained in said contract," and "at no time did the defendants, or either of them, declare a forfeiture of any of the contracts referred to."

"(11) That in the month of December, 1910, the plaintiff delivered the keys of said premises unto said defendants at their request, and upon their promise to repay to plaintiff the said sum of $1,700 when the said premises were sold by said defendants, and that the plaintiff was permitted to remain in possession thereafter until on or about the 25th day of January, 1913 (1911?)."

"(12) That said defendant, Martin Casey, repeatedly promised to repay to plaintiff all moneys paid by plaintiff under said contract, as soon as the said premises were sold by said defendant."

The court also found that the cause of action was not barred by the provisions of either section 339, subdivision 1, or section 1668 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $1,700, and defendants appeal from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] Appellants claim that, on November 22, 1910, 30 days after the execution of the tripartite agreement between Traynor and the parties to this suit, "plaintiff's right to the property terminated by his own agreement," and that whatever he paid on the purchase price defendants properly retained as liquidated damages.

Respondent cites Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. 794, 22 Am. St. Rep. 257, where the Supreme Court declared, as stated in the syllabus:

"The stipulation in the contract that the purchase money paid should be taken as liquidated damages for the breach of the contract by the purchaser is void under sections 1670 and 1671 of the Civil Code, it not being impracticable or at all difficult to fix the actual damage to the vendors, the measure of which is definitely fixed by section 3307 of the Civil Code as the excess of the agreed price, if any, over the value of the property to the vendors."

This is answered by appellants by citing Glock v. Howard & Wilson Colony Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17, where the case of Drew v. Pedlar is distinguished and it is said:

"Where time is expressly made of the essence of the contract, equity will not ignore the provision, for equity follows the law, and will neither make a new contract for the parties, nor violate that which they have freely and advisedly entered into."

But the court also said in that case:

"It has been said that after the vendee's breach the vendor may agree to a mutual abandonment and rescission, in which last instance, and in which alone, the vendee in default would be entitled to a repayment of his money."

It is the claim of respondent that this quotation is exactly applicable to the case at bar.

The transcript of the testimony is far from satisfactory, though probably defendants are free from blame in the matter. The plaintiff is a Chinese, and testified without an interpreter. His testimony, in some respects, seems confused, but he testified that after the sale of the property to Van Buskirk, appellant Martin E. Casey many times promised to pay him as soon as he received the purchase money from Van Buskirk. The witness Traynor said that on several occasions Casey told him "he would do right with Joe Hay," and "he would return Joe what money he had paid."

Appellant Martin E. Casey, testified on direct examination that he agreed to pay Joe Hay $1,800 if the property was sold for $8,000 and "outside of that I know of no promise I have made to Joe Hay to repay any money at all." On cross-examination he said:

"I don't remember making any direct promise at all. I don't remember whether I made a promise to Joe Hay in the month of February or the month of March."

We think the trial court was justified in finding "that said defendant Martin Casey repeatedly promised to repay to plaintiff all moneys paid by plaintiff under said contract, as soon as the said premises were sold by said defendant," and also in finding that "at no time did the defendants, or either of them, declare a forfeiture of any of the contracts referred to."

Appellants claim that the testimony of plaintiff and of Traynor shows that any promise by appellant Martin E. Casey to repay plaintiff was made in November, 1910, but it is clear that such promises were made at a later time. Plaintiff testified:

"Mr. Casey promised to pay me, but he never paid me any. I asked him several times, but he said the man didn't pay him yet. I had reference to Barney Van Buskirk."

And Traynor testified:

"I believe I talked with Mr. Casey about 3 days before the property was actually sold. That was why I asked him if he sold this property would he do right by Joe Hay, and he said he would."

[3] The complaint in this action was filed February 6, 1913. As the sale to Van Buskirk was made on the 21st day of April, 1911, the statute of limitations did not begin to run against plaintiff until that date.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

HAY v. CASEY et al. (Sac. 2254.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 24, 1916.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Application to the Supreme Court for a rehearing. Rehearing denied.

Richard Belcher and W. H. Carlin, both of Marysville, for appellants. Brittan & Raish and Wetmore & Davies, all of Marysville, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

SHAW, J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing in the Supreme Court. There is no support in the evidence for the finding of the trial court "that there was no consideration for the waiver of the rights of plaintiff contained in said contract," meaning the contract of October 22, 1910, between Martin E. Casey, J. Ross Traynor, and the plaintiff, Joe Hay. The contract itself shows a valuable consideration in the mutual agreements of the respective parties. Gallagher v. Equitable G. L. Co., 141 Cal. 707, 75 Pac. 329; Siddall v. Clark, 89 Cal. 321, 26 Pac. 829. It was a complete novation and a settlement of all previous transactions and obligations between Hay and Casey. The condition therein stated upon which the money was to be paid to Hay never happened, and never can happen. The obligation is at an end. Unless it has suddenly become the law that contracts made freely and for a valuable consideration do not fix the rights of the parties under it, the decisions of the trial court, of the District Court of Appeal in affirming that judgment, and of this court in denying a rehearing, are erroneous.

BRUSCHI v. COOPER et al. (Civ. 1425.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 7, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court, Aug. 4, 1916.)

1. NAMES $\S$ 16(2) — IDEM SONANS — NAME WITHOUT RULE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1963, subd. 25, providing that the identity of a person from the identity of name is to be presumed unless controverted by other evidence, and the rule idem sonans, the name "Dimetra" may be said to mean the name "Demetra."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Names, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 13; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 16(2).]

2. ESTOPPEL $\S$ 70(1)—GROUNDS—FAILURE TO ASSERT TITLE.

The fact that a certificate of sale and tax title deeds were issued "without any objection on the part of the owner of the property" is not, in itself, sufficient to establish estoppel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 183, 185, 187; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 70(1).]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION $\S$ 16(1)—OCCUPANCY—SUFFICIENCY.

Use of an undefined part of uninclosed lots as a dumping ground for sand and storage of loose personal property did not constitute occupancy within Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 322, providing that continued occupation and possession of land for five years under a written instrument or judgment is deemed to have been held adversely, except that possession of one lot in a tract is not possession of other lots.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. $\S\S$ 82, 83, 87, 88; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 16(1).]

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION $\S$ 79(1)—EXTENT OF POSSESSION—COLOR OF TITLE.

A certificate of purchase issued at a tax sale does not constitute color of title, since there must be an apparent transfer of title, a tax sale certificate being an admission that the property is held subject to the owner's right of redemption.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 459; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 79(1).]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES $\S$ 231—IRRIGATION TAX DEEDS—NOTICE OF SALE—SUFFICIENCY.

Under Irrigation Act (St. 1897, p. 254), $\S$ 45, providing that the collector must make out a certificate in duplicate dated on the day of sale, and specifying the time when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed, a certificate, incorrectly dated, but stating the correct date of the sale in the body of the instrument, and that the property might be redeemed within 12 months, sufficiently complied with the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 320; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 231.]

6. WATERS AND WATER COURSES $\S$ 231—IRRIGATION TAX DEEDS—RECITALS—STATUTE.

Under Irrigation Act, $\S$ 35, requiring the assessor to assess all real property and prepare an assessment book, in which must be listed all such property, specifying the name of the person to whom the property is assessed, if known, section 45, requiring the assessor, in his certificate of sale for delinquency, to state the name of the person assessed, and section 48, requiring the matter recited in the certificate of sale to be recited in the deed, although section 50 provides that, when property is sold for taxes correctly imposed, no misnomer of the owner shall affect the sale, a certificate of sale and deed, reciting the name of such person as "D. Bruscia," were void, where the assessment was to "D. Bruschie," since the listing of land for assessment necessarily means that the name of the owner, if known, must be correctly stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 320; Dec. Dig. 231.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Suit by Demetra Bruschi against Ida B. Cooper and others. From a judgment quieting title in defendant O. H. Williams, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Rehearing denied by Supreme Court, 159 Pac. 734.

J. R. Webb and George Cosgrave, both of Fresno, for appellant. Hatton & Scott, of Modesto, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This case was before the court and decided January 29, 1916, reversing the judgment of the lower court. A rehearing was granted and further light on the case invited, particularly upon the validity of the assessment, certificate of tax sale, and the tax deeds involved in the action. In discussing the question presented we found what seemed to us a very close analogy between the general code provisions for assessments and delinquent tax sales and the provisions of the Irrigation Act. Following the decisions of the Supreme Court as we understood them, we were constrained, with some reluctance, to hold the title asserted by defendants to be invalid. In reviewing the opinion heretofore filed in the case, respondents contend:

First. That section 35 of the irrigation act (Stats. 1897, p. 254) does not require that "the property must be assessed to the owner." The section does provide that:

The assessor "must prepare an assessment book with appropriate headings, in which must be listed all such property within the district, in which must be specified, in separate columns, under the appropriate head: (a) the name of the person to whom the property is assessed (if the name is not known to the assessor, the property shall be assessed to 'unknown owners'). * * *"

The assessment was made not "to unknown owners," but to a person named, viz., D. Bruschie. How far a mistake in the name may affect the validity of the assessment need not now be considered. The fact is that the owner's name was given.

Second. It is urged:

"That section 45 of that act does not absolutely require that the certificate of sale must state the name of the person assessed. Said section 45 requires the collector to make out in duplicate a certificate dated on the day of sale, stating (when known) the name of the person assessed," etc.

We have seen that the assessment was not to "unknown owners," but to a person named D. Bruschie, presumably believed by the assessor to be the owner. In making out his certificate the collector gave the name of the person to whom the property was assessed as D. Bruscia. It is claimed that the statute expressly makes the naming of the person assessed "subject to the condition that the assessor knows the name of the persons assessed." This may be so where the assessment is to "unknown owners," but where an owner is named in the assessment and is named in the certificate, it cannot be said that it was the case where the person was unknown.

Third. It is contended that, "the irrigation act does not require that an irrigation tax deed issued thereunder 'shall correctly recite the name of the person to whom the property was assessed, as a condition of its validity,' " as held in the former decision. Section 47 provides:

"If the property is not redeemed within the time herein provided, the collector, or his successor in office, must make to the purchaser, or his assignee, a deed of the property, reciting in the deed substantially the matters contained in the certificate," etc.

It is true that the statute does not in terms require that the name of the person assessed must be recited in the deed, neither does it require a description of the property to be given, but we held at the former hearing that, in requiring the deed to recite "substantially the matters contained in the certificate" the name of the person assessed should be regarded as among the substantial matters to be recited if the name in fact did appear in the certificate.

We fail to discover, upon a re-examination of the statutory provisions relating to the subject, any satisfactory grounds on which to reach a conclusion different from that expressed in our former opinion. And we therefore adopt that opinion, which is as follows:

"This is an action, as set forth in plaintiff's second amended complaint, to quiet the title of plaintiff to lots 28, 29, 30, 31, and 32 in block 33 of the city of Modesto, Stanislaus county. An amendment was, by leave of court, made to the amended complaint stating that 'should the court find that defendants, or either of them, had expended money in payment or taxes or assessments on said property, and are justly entitled to reimbursement of the same, then plaintiff is ready, willing, and able to pay * * * such sum as the court may find that they are entitled to and offer to pay the same and to do equity in the premises.'"

"Defendant Williams answered: Denied generally and specifically the averments of the said complaint; alleged that the cause of action is barred by sections 318, 319, and 322 of the Code of Civil Procedure; and as a separate defense alleged that prior to the commencement of the action defendant was, and he still is, the owner in fee of the said lots; that, on February 20, 1906, said lots 30 and 31 were sold to satisfy the tax levied on said property last referred to by Modesto irrigation district for the year 1905, which said tax had become delinquent; that at said sale M. L. Cooper became the purchaser, and, no redemption having been made, a deed of conveyance to said two lots was, on March 4, 1907, made to said Cooper, 'conveying to said M. L. Cooper absolute title to said real property'; that, on May 6, 1910, said M. L. Cooper conveyed said two lots to his wife, Ida B. Cooper, and, on December 26, 1911, said Ida conveyed the same to defendant Williams, and ever since said date he has been the owner of said real property. Similar averments in said answer are set forth as to lots 28, 29, and 30; defendant Williams thus deraining title thereto. As a further defense it is set forth that 'plaintiff is precluded or estopped from instituting or maintaining this action for the following reasons: That, on December 26, 1911, said property was conveyed to defendant by good and sufficient deed for a good and valuable consideration; that since said date "said defendant, at great cost and expense, to wit, about $9,000, has erected and built upon said premises a large and expensive building," and has made other improvements on said real property amounting to $1,000; that plaintiff "was fully cognizant of the erection of said building on said premises at the time said building was in course of erection, and until and long after the said building was erected and completed plaintiff made no claim to the ownership of said property, or any part thereof." Like averments are made as to said improvements other than said building; that had defendant known or had he been informed that plaintiff made any claim to or interest in said property, defendant would not have made said improvements; that, by reason of the foregoing, plaintiff "intentionally endeavored to perpetrate, and by instituting this action is now willfully, knowingly, and intentionally endeavoring to perpetrate, a fraud upon said defendant, to his loss in the sum of not less than $15,000." For a further defense: That plaintiff is estopped from maintaining the action for the following reasons: That plaintiff is guilty of laches, in that he abandoned said real property. * * * and for many years prior to the commencement of the action, failed and refused to pay any taxes or assessments whatever levied upon or assessed against said property, * * * and that said real property and the whole thereof has frequently been sold for taxes,' and that plaintiff purposely refrained from paying said taxes for the purpose of attempting to defraud the purchaser at any sale of said property for delinquent taxes; that plaintiff was well aware of all said assessments and sales of said property; that following said sales certificates of purchase were duly issued with plaintiff's full knowledge, and conveyance made without protest or objection by plaintiff. By way of cross-complaint, defendant sets up the facts first above stated as to the sale and purchase of said property for delinquent taxes, and also pleads adverse possession by himself and predecessors in estate.

"Defendants Ida B. Cooper, Z. E. Drake, and F. E. Johnston answered: Denied plaintiff's alleged ownership; alleged ownership in defendant Williams on December 26, 1911, at which time he, said Williams, conveyed the south 60 feet of said property by deed of trust, in which said Williams was party of the first part, the said Drake and Johnston parties of the second part, and defendant Ida Cooper party of the third part, to secure to said Cooper the payment of $2,000 and other sums, no part of which has been paid, and said deed of trust is a lien on said property, and is in full force and effect.

"Defendant the Modesto Savings Bank denied plaintiff's ownership, and alleged ownership in defendant Williams. It also set up a deed of trust by Williams, on the east 80 feet of the property, to secure a loan of $2,000.

"Plaintiff answered the cross-complaint of defendant Williams: Denied the alleged adverse possession, and denied that defendant Williams or his grantors or predecessors in interest have paid all, or any, taxes or assessments levied on said property; denied that plaintiff has no right, title, or interest in said property, or that plaintiff's claim is without right.

"The court made findings in favor of defendants: That at the commencement of the action plaintiff was not, and is not now, the owner of said property, or any part thereof, or any interest therein, and is not entitled to the possession thereof; that the alleged cause of action in plaintiff's second amended complaint is not barred by either section 318, 319, or 322 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that, prior to the commencement of the action, defendant Williams was, and now is, the owner in fee simple of said property. The court found further: That, on February 20, 1906, the whole of said property 'was by the collector of Modesto irrigating district sold to satisfy the assessment or tax levied and imposed on said real property by Modesto irrigating district for the year 1905, which said assessment or tax had become and was delinquent at the time of said sale, said lots Nos. 30 and 31 of said block No. 33 in said city of Modesto being assessed and sold as one parcel to M. L. Cooper, and lots Nos. 28, 29, and 32 in said block No. 33 in said city of Modesto being assessed and sold as a separate parcel to said M. L. Cooper,' and said Cooper became the purchaser of all said lots; that thereafter, on March 3, 1906, the said collector made out in duplicate a certificate, stating name of the person to whom said property, to wit, lots 30 and 33, were assessed, a description of the land sold for assessment, giving the amount and year of assessment, and specifying the time when the purchaser, said Cooper, would be entitled to a deed; that said certificate was signed by said collector and a copy delivered to said purchaser and a copy filed in the office of the county recorder of Stanislaus county. Similar finding was made as to lots 28, 29, and 32; that, immediately after the delivery by said collector of said certificates to said purchaser, he, the said purchaser, entered into the actual possession of the whole of said real property, and took actual possession thereof, and claimed the same, and thereafter and up to March 4, 1907, 'continuously and actually occupied, possessed, and publicly claimed said real property, and the whole thereof, as his property'; that said claim and possession was under said certificate of sale during the period from March 3, 1906, to March 4, 1907, 'and prior to the erection of the building hereinafter mentioned the whole of said premises was entirely uninclosed.' It is also found that said Cooper had like possession of said land, claiming the same openly and notoriously from March 6, 1906, to May 6, 1910, and, during all said period, paid all the taxes and assessments levied or assessed against said property, and that no part of said property was redeemed from said sales, and that, on March 4, 1907, a deed of conveyance was made by said collector to said Cooper, conveying said lots 30 and 31, and on said day a deed was also made to said Cooper by said collector, covering said lots 28, 29, and 32, conveying to said Cooper absolute title to all said lots; that said certificates of sale were duly issued, delivered and recorded, as were also the said deeds of conveyance, 'without any objection on the part of plaintiff'; that, on May 6, 1910, said M. L. Cooper conveyed all said property to his wife, Ida B. Cooper, who thereupon entered into actual possession of said property, and, ever since said date, and up to December 26, 1911, continued to occupy and possess said property openly and notoriously, and adversely during said period collected the rents, issues, and profits of said property and paid all taxes levied or assessed against the same; that, on December 26, 1911, said Ida B. Cooper conveyed all said real property to defendant O. H. Williams for a good and valuable consideration, and ever since said date Williams has been, and now is, the owner in fee of all said property; that said Williams, on said date, entered into possession of said property, and ever since said date has been in open and notorious possession thereof under claim of right, and has paid all taxes levied and assessed against said property; that neither plaintiff nor any other person except said L. M. Cooper, Ida B. Cooper, and said Williams 'was or were in the possession of said real property, or any portion thereof, within more than five years before the commencement of this action'; that said occupation and possession 'was, under claim of title by said O. H. Williams, M. L. Cooper, and Ida B. Cooper, based upon said certificates and said deeds of conveyance, and exclusive of any other right and hostile to any right, title, or claim or right of possession of plaintiff, his grantors or ancestors'; that said Williams purchased said property in good faith, and paid therefor the sum of $4,000; that, since December 26, 1911, said Williams has erected on said premises a building which cost about $9,000 and has made other improvements there-to amounting to $1,000; that plaintiff has made no attempt to pay any of said taxes, 'but has at all times been able, ready, and willing to pay the same.' The court finds the averments of the answer respecting said loans, secured as alleged, to be true.

"Judgment was accordingly entered, quieting defendant Williams' title to the property. Plaintiff appealed from the judgment under the alternative method.

[1] "That the government title to the lots in question vested in Francisco Bruschi, father of plaintiff, by deed of Charles Crocker, November 8, 1882, seems not to be controverted. On January 1, 1883, Francisco conveyed lots 28, 29, and 32 to Dimetra Bruschi. The name 'Dimetra' may be said to mean the name 'Demetra,' and would, in our opinion, fall within the rule idem sonans. The identity of name carries with it the identity of person. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 25.

"As to lots 30 and 31, plaintiff claims as heir and as a distributee under the will of Rosa Bruschi, his mother. By the decree of May 27, 1905, in the estate of Francisco Bruschi, lots 30 and 31 were distributed to Rosa. The decree of distribution in her estate recites that 'the residue of the estate, consisting of the property hereinafter particularly described, is now ready for distribution,' names certain nine heirs, among them a son, Demetrio M. Bruschi, and devises in equal shares 'the residue of said estate of Rosa Bruschi, deceased, hereinafter particularly described and now remaining in the hands of said administratrix, and any other property not now known or discovered which may belong to the said estate.' The property particularly described is $112.20 in money and a promissory note of $547.06. Plaintiff was shown to be the son and hence an heir at law of Rosa. We think it sufficiently appeared that he had a one-ninth interest in lots 30 and 31 which were devised to Rosa, and of which the decree of distribution in her estate made no disposition except under the clause 'any other property not now known.'

[2] "Upon the question of estoppel pleaded, no fact is found except that said certificate of sale and said tax title deeds were issued 'without any objection on the part of plaintiff' which is not in itself sufficient to establish an estoppel. Plaintiff offers in his complaint 'to pay to defendants, or either of them, such sum as the court may find that they are justly entitled to, and offers to pay the same and to do equity in the premises.' There is no finding as to what payment plaintiff should make to defendants in the event of plaintiff's succeeding in the action or what the court would deem equitable—whether such payment should include all taxes and cost or the improvements made upon the lots, or both. The court found for the defendant Williams, and it was not necessary to deal with this feature of the case.

[3, 4] "If the findings may be construed as showing title in defendant Williams by adverse possession, they are not supported by the evidence. The period of five years after the execution and delivery of the tax deed had not elapsed before the action was commenced, although it had elapsed if the date of the certificate of sale may be considered. However, the lots were not inclosed until about the time the building was erected on them by Williams in 1911. They had been used as a dumping ground for sand and storage of some loose personal property by a man who paid Williams a rental for such use, but otherwise there was no occupancy of the lots. There was no evidence showing what portion of the lots was thus used, even if such use could be regarded as occupancy, which we do not think would be so regarded. Code Civ. Proc. § 322; Cohen v. Anderson, 22 Cal. App. 634, 135 Pac. 1096. Defendant's claim that he held under color of title by virtue of the certificate of sale cannot be sustained, for a certificate of purchase issued at a tax sale does not constitute color of title. 1 Cyc. 860, 1099. There must be an apparent transfer of title. 1 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 859, 973; Packard v. Moss, 68 Cal. 123, 8 Pac. 818; Investment Co. v. Fox, 32 Utah, 301, 90 Pac. 564, 13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 627, 125 Am. St. Rep. 865, where the court said: 'The fact that Moon went into possession under and by virtue of the tax sale certificate was, in effect, an admission on his part that he held the property subject to the owner's right of redemption.' The court found against defendants on their plea of the statute of limitation.

"It seems to us that the judgment must stand or fall upon the strength of the title of defendant Williams derived through the tax proceedings which were taken under the act of March 31, 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 254).

"Appellant relies upon the following points for reversal: (1) Insufficiency of the assessment; (2) invalidity of the certificate of sale; (3) insufficiency of the deed made pursuant to the sale.

"The assessment is attacked on the grounds: (a) That the assessment levied to pay the general expenses of the district is not segregated from the assessment to pay annual interest on outstanding bonds; (b) that noncontiguous lots are not separately assessed.

"The assessment was made pursuant to the authority of the above-mentioned act. Lots 28, 29, and 32 were assessed to D. Bruschie, and lots 30 and 31 to F. Bruschie, and in each case the assessment was of the group of lots, and not separately; also, the valuation was made on each group as a whole, and not separately. As we have reached the conclusion that the certificate of sale and the deed of the collector of the district to defendant Williams are invalid, we refrain from passing upon the objections raised to the assessment.

"Section 48 of the act is relied upon by defendants as validating any and all the tax proceedings under which they claim. The construction given this section by the Supreme Court may as well be shown here as elsewhere. After stating that certain matters recited in the certificate of sale 'must be recited in the deed,' and that 'such deed duly acknowledged or proved is prima facie evidence of such matters, the section reads: 'Such deed duly acknowledged or proved is (except as against actual fraud) conclusive evidence of the regularity of all the proceedings from the assessment by the assessor, inclusive, up to the execution of the deed. The deed conveys to the grantee the absolute title to the lands described therein free of all incumbrances, except when the land is owned by the United States, or this state, in which case it is prima facie evidence of the right of possession.' This conclusive evidence clause is the same as is found in section 3787 of the Political Code, except that the word 'other,' just before the word 'proceedings,' is omitted in section 48 of the Irrigation Act. The Supreme Court, in Escondido High School District v. Escondido Seminary, 130 Cal. 128, 62 Pac. 401, said: 'If it were necessary to pass upon the question in this case, it might, consistently with recognized rules of construction, be held that the language used in the act of 1887 (the language is the same in the act of 1897) means all the proceedings other than those as to which the deed is made prima facie evidence and the act would thus be relieved from the constitutional objection in support of which appellants cite copious authorities.' The court did not find it necessary to decide the question, but we do not hesitate to hold that the section means what is thus, at least inferentially, said it does mean. Otherwise, construed literally, the deed is made prima facie evidence of certain seven enumerated things, and conclusive evidence of the same things, as well as all others. The deed is made prima facie evidence that: (a) The property was assessed as required by law; (b) that the property was equalized as required by law; (c) that the assessments were levied in accordance with law; (d) the assessments were not paid; (e) at a proper time and place the property was sold as required by law; and by the proper officers; (f) the property was not redeemed; (g) the person who executed the deed was the proper officer.'

"In Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, 151 Cal. 234, 239, 240, 90 Pac. 936, 938, the scope of the conclusive evidence clause is defined. Section 3680 of the Political Code provides that upon all bills or statements there must be stamped the words 'sold for taxes' and the date of sale. In the case before the court this memorandum was not made, and it was urged that this provision was intended as notice required to be given the owner, and a failure to give it deprived him of his property without due process of law. The court said: 'Of course it is true that the Legislature has not the power to make such a certificate or deed conclusive as to any of the essentials of the listing, valuation, apportionment, or notice (Cooley on Taxation, pp. 355, 356; 1 Blackwell on Tax Titles, § 640), but it can make the certificate or deed conclusive as to matters or things which in the first instance the Legislature might not have required to be done, and which are in their nature, therefore, nonessentials. * * * But there is nothing in the law which makes the giving of such a notice essential—no rights of the taxpayer would be violated if such a provision for notice were not required at all. * * * It is quite within its power to do away with this provision, or, as here, to hold that the tax deed shall be conclusive evidence that it was given.' See Smith v. Furlong, 160 Cal. 522, 527, 117 Pac. 527.

"The invalidity of the certificate of sale is urged: (a) Because it is not dated on the day of the sale; (b) it does not specify when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed; (c) it does not give the name of the person assessed. The certificates are identical in substance. Taking the certificate of the sale on the assessment to D. Bruschie, it states that the property, describing it, was duly assessed as required by law, by the proper officers of said district and for the purposes thereof, in the year 1905; that the name of the person so assessed was D. Bruscia; that said property was equalized as required by law; that the assessments were levied in accordance with law, and the amount of the assessment is the sum of $8.16 and the year of the assessment 1905; that 'the assessments were not paid; that at the proper time and place, after all due and legal proceedings heretofore had, I did, on this 20th day of February, 1906, offer the said real estate (describing it, being lots 28 and 29) for sale for said assessments'; that M. L. Cooper became the purchaser. 'Said property may be redeemed within twelve months from the date of said purchase, viz.: this 20th day of February, 1906, by the person and in the manner as provided by law and if the property is not so redeemed, said purchaser will, on or after said expiration of twelve months from the date of sale and purchase and after having complied with the provisions of the law relating to his right thereto be entitled to a deed.' The certificate then states that a description of the land as in the certificate has been entered in a book kept, as a record by said district, known as 'Vol. 1, Certificate of Sale,' which description is numbered 809 on the margin and is put on this certificate as the number thereof.

"In witness whereof I have signed this certificate, and filed a duplicate thereof in the office of the county recorder of the said county of Stanislaus, in which said land sold is situated, this 3d day of March, 1906. G. R. Stoddard, Collector of Modesto Irrigation District.'

[5] "Section 45 of the act of 1897, among other things, provides that 'the collector must make out in duplicate a certificate, dated on the day of sale stating (when known) the name of the person assessed * * * and specifying the time when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed.' The certificate was made out in duplicate, but was dated March 3, 1906, instead of February 20, 1906, the day of the sale. But it clearly appears in the certificate that the sale was made on February 20, for it is twice stated, and it as clearly therein appears, that the 'property may be redeemed within twelve months from the date of said purchase, viz., this 20th day of February, 1906,' and if not so redeemed, 'said purchaser will, on or after the expiration of twelve months from the date of sale and purchase, and after having complied with the provisions of the law relating to the right thereto be entitled to a deed.' The certificate gives the name of the owner of the assessed property as D. Bruscia. The name of the owner in the assessment roll is D. Bruschie. One of the objects of the certificate doubtless, is to give notice to the owner of the date of the sale, and to inform him when the purchaser will be entitled to a deed; i. e., inform him of the period of redemption. We think the purpose of the statute in this regard is fully met by the statement found in the body of the certificate. Best v. Wohlford, 153 Cal. 20, 21, 94 Pac. 98. The Idaho Revised Codes, § 1759, provides that after receiving the amount of the taxes, and costs from the purchaser at tax sale, the collector must make out in duplicate a certificate dated on the day of sale. In McGowan v. Elder, 19 Idaho, 153, 113 Pac. 103, the tax sale was on July 8, 1904, and the certificate was dated July 9, 1904. The Idaho Supreme Court held it good, and that the provision of the statute is directory and not mandatory. The decision of this point does not, as appellant contends, rest upon the provision of the statute that no assessment is illegal on account of informality.

[6] The objection to the deed is the same as one of the objections to the certificate of sale—that the party assessed is 'D. Bruschie,' whereas the name of the person assessed as given in the certificate and deed is 'D. Bruscia.' Section 35 of the Irrigation Act requires the assessor of the district to assess all the real property of the district to the persons who own the same. 'He must prepare an assessment book, with appropriate headings, in which must be listed all such property within the district, in which must be specified, * * * under the appropriate head: (a) The name of the person to whom the property is assessed; * * *.' Section 45 requires the assessor, in his certificate of sale, to state the name of the person assessed. Section 48, among other things, states that: 'The matter recited in the certificate of sale must be recited in the deed.' Just how much of the matter and what particular matter 'must be recited in the deed' the statute does not inform us. It does not in terms require that the deed shall contain the name of the person assessed. But the statute requires that the name of the person assessed should appear on the assessment roll and also in the certificate of sale. It would seem reasonable to hold that 'the matter' referred to in section 48 includes the name of the person assessed. The point now before us being raised on both the certificate of sale and the deed, it may be considered in connection with both.

"Appellant relies upon Henderson v. De Turk, 164 Cal. 296, 128 Pac. 747. In that case defendant claimed solely upon a deed from the state, based on a sale and alleged deed to the state on account of delinquent taxes. The deed to the state recited the name of the person assessed as 'E. W. Davis,' while the assessment was to 'E. W. Davies.' Section 3785 of the Political Code provided that the deed must recite, among other things, 'the name of the person assessed.' It was held that 'this means, of course, the name of the person assessed as it appears on the assessment roll,' and that a deed which 'misrecites, or fails to recite, any one of the facts required by statute to be recited therein is void.' It was also held, on the authority of Emeric v. Alvarado, 90 Cal. 444, 465, 27 Pac. 356, that the rule of idem sonans does not apply 'to assessments and other cases of description, where the written name is material.' It was further held, in the Henderson v. De Turk Case, that the failure of the deed to recite correctly the name of the party assessed is not remedied or cured by either the section 3807 or 3628 of the Political Code, because section 3628 refers only to the assessment, which is not rendered invalid by reason of a mistake in the name of the owner. Section 3807 provides: 'When land is sold for taxes correctly imposed as the property of a particular person, no misnomer of the owner, or supposed owner, or other mistake relating to the ownership thereof, affects the sale, or renders it void or voidable.' Of this section the court said: 'It does not purport to apply to the deed made in pursuance of the sale, * * * and cannot be held to dispense with the requirement that the deed shall correctly recite the name of the person to whom the property was assessed, as a condition to its validity.' Finally, it was held that section 3787 of the Political Code 'makes such a tax deed evidence of regularity of such proceedings as are named therein only when it is a deed conforming to the requirements of the law.' The deed relied upon was held to be invalid.

"Turning to the Irrigation Act, we find, as already pointed out, that section 35 makes it the duty of the assessor to assess all real property at time stated. 'He must prepare an assessment book, with appropriate headings, in which must be listed all such property within the district, in which must be specified, in separate columns, under the appropriate head: (a) The name of the person to whom the property is assessed (if the name is not known, * * * to "unknown owners"); (b) land (describing it) * * *.' On the last day of December of each year, 'all unpaid assessments are delinquent,' etc. Section 41. Sections 42 and 43 provide how the delinquent tax sale is to be conducted, and who may purchase, etc. Section 45 provides for issuing a certificate of sale to the purchaser: 'After receiving the amount of assessments and costs, the collector must make out in duplicate a certificate dated on the day of sale, stating (when known) the name of the person assessed,' etc., and section 46 provides that, before delivering any certificate, the collector 'must in a book enter a description of the land sold, corresponding with the description in the certificate, the date of sale, purchasers' names, and amount paid,' etc., but does not require to be entered in this book the name of the person assessed, as does the certificate. Section 47 provides how and when redemption may be made, and section 48 provides that if the property is not redeemed the collector 'must make to the purchaser, or his assignee, a deed of the property,' and 'such deed duly acknowledged or proved is prima facie evidence that'—then follow the seven several facts thus made prima facie evidence, and the conclusive evidence clause already quoted. Section 50 is the same as section 3807 of the Political Code mentioned in Henderson v. De Turk, supra. We thus find a very close parallel between the general code provisions for assessments and delinquent tax sales and the provisions of the Irrigation Act. The property must be assessed to the owner (section 35); the certificate of sale must state 'the name of the person assessed.' Section 45. 'The matter recited in the certificate of sale must be recited in the deed.' Section 48.

"As to section 50, which is the same as section 3807 of the Political Code, the case cited holds that it 'cannot be held to dispense with the requirement that the deed shall correctly recite the name of the person to whom the property was assessed, as a condition of its validity.' As to the conclusive evidence provision, holding it to mean, as we do, the same as the like provision in the Political Code (section 3787), the court said, in the case cited, that said section 'makes such tax deed evidence of regularity of such proceedings as are named therein only when it is a deed conforming to the requirements of the law'; that is to say, in the case then before the court, conforming to the requirement that the deed must correctly recite the name of the person to whom the land was assessed.

"We are brought to the single consideration, Is the requirement in the certificate of sale and in the deed that there must appear therein 'the name of the person assessed' such an essential in the proceedings as could not be dispensed with by the Legislature, or may it be classed as a nonessential and subject to the rule laid down in Bank of Lemoore v. Fulgham, supra, where it was held that the Legislature can make the certificate or deed conclusive as to matters or things which, in the first instance, the Legislature might not have required to be done, and which, in their nature, therefore, are non-essentials? It was said, in the case cited, that the Legislature has not the power to make such a certificate or deed conclusive as to any of the essentials of listing, valuation, apportionment, or notice. Cooley on Taxation, pp. 355, 363; Blackwell on Tax Titles, § 640. What is meant by 'listing' the land? Mr. Cooley says: 'An assessment consists of two processes of listing the persons, property, etc., to be taxed, and of extending the sums which are to be the guide in an apportionment of the tax between them.' 1 Cooley on Taxes, p. 596. Mr. Black says: 'Statutes generally require that real property shall be listed and assessed to the owner or to the occupant; and it is generally admitted that this requirement is imperative and a compliance with it essential to jurisdiction.' Black on Tax Titles, § 105, citing State v. Vanderbilt, 33 N. J. Law, 38, where it was held that real estate must be assessed in the name of some person or persons or corporation, as the owner thereof.

"It seems to us that the 'listing' of land for assessment necessarily means that the name of the owner, if known, and a description of the property assessed must be stated, and, as was held in the De Turk Case, 'correctly stated.' In the present case, the assessment was to 'D. Bruschie.' The certificate of sale and the deed recited the name as 'D. Bruscia.'

"We confess to some regret at not being able to find some way to escape from following the rule laid down in Henderson v. De Turk, supra. The record shows that the state and county tax on these lots was delinquent for several years prior to 1905, and they were sold to the state and were redeemed by Cooper after he purchased the land at tax sale in 1906. The owners seem to have paid no heed to their duty to the state, and not until valuable and expensive improvements were in good faith put upon the lots did they assert any claim to them. The law, however, we conceive to be the same, under the facts appearing, as if no improvements had been made on the lots, and we are constrained to follow the law as our Supreme Court has established it.

"We have vainly tried to convince ourselves that the name of the owner cannot be deemed an essential in the assessment, on the theory that section 3628 of the Political Code and section 50 of the Irrigation Act expressly provide that no misnomer of the owner 'affects the sale,' and on the theory that if the name is not known to the assessor, the assessment may be made to 'unknown owners.' It might be said that the owner of the land is presumed to know its description, and that the recorded duplicate certificate is notice to him, if it correctly describes the land, whether or not his name appears as the owner, and hence 'the name of the person assessed' might be dispensed with by the Legislature as a nonessential. We cannot accept such reasoning as sound, for we are always brought back to the proposition that the essential requirement of 'listing' land for assessment necessarily involves the coupling of the owner's name, if known, with the description of the land, and, if not known, a statement of that fact."

The judgment is reversed.

WATERS AND WATER COURSES — 231 — IRRIGATION — TAX DEEDS — EFFECT AS EVIDENCE.

Irrigation Act (St. 1897, p. 254) § 48, providing that a deed of property sold for assessments duly acknowledged or proved is, except as against actual fraud, conclusive evidence of the regularity of all proceedings from assessment by the assessor, inclusive, up to the execution of the deed, etc., does not extend to defects in the deed itself.

SHAW, J. The petition for a rehearing of this cause in the Supreme Court is denied.

Nothing in the opinion should be deemed to hold that the correct name of the owner is so essential to a tax assessment or a certificate of tax sale that an error therein as to the name of the owner cannot be cured by the section making the deed conclusive evidence of the regularity of the assessment and certificate. The decision can be supported on the ground that the conclusive evidence clause does not extend to defects in the deed itself, as was held in Henderson v. De Turk, 164 Cal. 296, 128 Pac. 747.

COURTS — 190(9) — APPEAL — DELAY IN PROSECUTING DISMISSAL.

Code Civ. Proc. § 583, providing that an action shall be dismissed by the court in which the same shall have been commenced, or to which it may be transferred, on motion of the defendant, unless brought to trial within five years after the defendant has filed his answer, does not apply to an action transferred to the superior court from a recorder's court by appeal on questions of both law and fact, after a trial upon the issues, joined by defendant's answer filed in the recorder's court.

Petition for writ of review by S. O. Long against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of San Diego, and W. A. Sloane, Judge thereof, to review the action of the Superior Court, denying a motion to dismiss an appeal from a recorder's court, and rendering judgment for plaintiff in the case of T. P. Banta v. S. O. Long. Proceedings of the superior court. Affirmed.

W. A. Martin and F. J. Trude, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner. W. P. Cary, of San Diego, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Pursuant to a writ of review issued out of this court, the superior court of San Diego county through its clerk has made a return of the transcript and record of the proceedings had and taken by respondents in a certain case, entitled "T. P. Banta v. S. O. Long," from which it appears that on November 6, 1905, a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff therein by the recorder's court of Imperial township (then a part of San Diego county), from which the defendant, who is petitioner here, on November 7, 1905, perfected an appeal upon questions of both law and fact to the superior court of San Diego county. No further proceeding was taken by either party to said action until June 7, 1915, at which time defendant therein, pursuant to notice given, moved the court to dismiss the same upon the grounds: First, that the action had not been prosecuted with diligence; second, that it had not been brought to trial by plaintiff within five years after defendant had filed his answer therein, as required by section 583, Code of Civil Procedure. The court denied the motion, and proceeded to a trial of the case, as a result of which, judgment went for plaintiff.

The contention of petitioner is that upon the facts stated, the court had no jurisdiction other than to make an order granting his motion to dismiss the action.

The sole point involved is whether the provision of section 583, Code of Civil Procedure, providing that an action shall be dismissed by the court in which the same shall have been commenced, or to which it may be transferred on motion of the defendant, unless brought to trial within five years after the defendant has filed his answer, applies to actions transferred to the superior court on appeal from a recorder's or justice's court. This question was involved in the case of Pistolesi v. Superior Court, 26 Cal. App. 403, 147 Pac. 104. There the petitioner applied for a writ of mandate to compel the superior court to dismiss the action upon facts identical with those here presented. The court held that section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure did not apply to actions pending in the superior court on appeal thereto from a justice's court, and that, while the court possessed inherent power in its discretion to make an order of dismissal, it could not be compelled to do so. To what is said in the opinion in that case, we may add that the case is not brought strictly within the provisions of the statute, since it appears that defendant filed his answer in the justice's court, and upon the issues so joined a trial was had. We regard the case above cited as determinative of the question presented, and upon the authority thereof the proceedings of the superior court in the action of T. P. Banta v. S. O. Long, made the subject of this review, are affirmed.

APPEAL AND ERROR §1011(1)—REVIEW—QUESTION OF FACT—FINDING.

In an action on a note, wherein defendant set up a counterclaim, where there was a substantial conflict in the evidence on such counterclaim, the finding of the trial court against it must be sustained on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Georgenia E. Clark against Q. E. Hotle, with counterclaim by defendant. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ezra W. Decoto, of Oakland, for appellant. Carleton Gray, of Oroville, A. F. St. Sure, of Alameda, and St. Sure, Callaghan & Rose, of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendant in an action on a promissory note. The defendant does not deny that he executed and delivered the note to plaintiff's assignor, one S. J. Norris, as alleged in the complaint, but he sets forth in his answer a counterclaim for a certain amount. The court found against this defense; and the sole question presented by the record is as to whether or not the evidence supports that finding.

After the making of the note and before its maturity Norris, the payee thereof, and the defendant borrowed from the First National Bank of Oroville $1,000, giving the bank their joint note for that sum, the proceeds by agreement being placed to the personal account of Norris. At the time of this transaction defendant and Norris had entered into a tentative agreement concerning some development work of the Feather River Canal Company's property, under the terms of which Hotle was to make certain monthly advances. This agreement was subsequently reduced to writing and signed by the parties. According to the testimony of Hotle the money borrowed from the bank was for the personal account of Norris, and when the note became due Norris refused to pay it; that Hotle thereupon took it up, and that Norris refused to allow him credit therefor upon the amount to be advanced under their Feather River Canal Company contract. Norris, on the other hand, testified that the $1,000 borrowed from the bank and placed to his personal account, was used and paid out, as intended by both parties, for the account of the Feather River Canal Company, and that the defendant was given credit therefor. The surrounding circumstances tend strongly to support the testimony of Norris; but, in any event, there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, in view of which the settled law is that the finding of the trial court must stand.

Judgment affirmed.

CONVICTS §6—ACTIONS—STATUTE—EFFECT OF CONVICT'S DISABILITY ON OTHER PARTY.

Under Pen. Code, § 673, providing that a sentence in a state prison for any term less than for life suspends all civil rights of the person sentenced and forfeits all public offices, private trusts, authority, or power during such imprisonment, a defendant is not obliged to submit to the pendency of a civil action against him, while the plaintiff is undergoing a sentence pursuant to a conviction of felony, but is entitled to have the case heard and determined.

Petition for mandamus by John Castera against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and Frank G. Finlayson, Judge thereof. Peremptory writ issued.

Slosson & Mitchell, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Henry W. Nisbet, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Mandamus. There is now pending in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles and in the department thereof presided over by the respondent judge, an action in which one J. E. Youtz is plaintiff and the petitioner is one of the defendants. Petitioner and other defendants in that action, having been duly served with summons, filed a demurrer to the complaint. After the filing of his complaint, the plaintiff Youtz was imprisoned in the state penitentiary pursuant to his conviction of a felony and is now undergoing a three-years' term of imprisonment. On account of such imprisonment of the plaintiff, the respondent judge has ordered said demurrer stricken from the calendar and refuses to hear and determine the same or proceed further in said cause. The petitioner seeks a peremptory writ of mandamus, commanding that said cause be restored to the calendar of said court, and that the court proceed to hear and determine the same. To this petition a general demurrer is filed, alleging that the petition does not state facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to the relief sought by him. It is understood by the parties that our determination of this demurrer is to dispose of the case without further hearing. Permission was granted respondents' counsel to file a brief in support of the demurrer, but no brief has been presented.

"A sentence of imprisonment in a state prison for any term less than for life suspends all the civil rights of the person so sentenced, and forfeits all public offices and all private trusts, authority, or power during such imprisonment." Pen. Code, § 673.

We are not aware of any decision covering the precise question involved in this matter. It is stated that, even where conviction of a felony results in civil death (as it does in this state upon a sentence of imprisonment for life), the weight of authority is apparently in harmony with the English doctrine to the effect that the convict still remains subject to be sued. 8 Ruling Case Law, p. 707, and citations there found. This doctrine is specifically recognized in this state in the statutory provisions allowing a divorce to be granted upon proof that defendant has been convicted of a felony.

To say that a defendant in a civil action is obliged to submit to the continued pendency of an action against him under these circumstances, because the plaintiff is undergoing a sentence of the kind herein described, would be to impose upon the defendant a punishment for the plaintiff's crime. The sentence might be for a long term of years, and all of defendant's property might be subject to an attachment in the action, and yet the defendant would be without relief, no matter how groundless in fact the action might be. This cannot be the law. The interests of the plaintiff in such an action will ordinarily be sufficiently protected by the vigilance of the attorneys who have charge of his case; but, if in any case he is not so protected, the loss should fall upon him rather than upon those unconnected with his offense.

Let the peremptory writ issue as demanded.

Application by Charles R. McCarty for a writ of prohibition to restrain the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and Hon. Fred H. Taft, Judge thereof, from proceeding with the trial of a certain action pending in such court on appeal. Application denied.

Niles Chapin Folsom, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Pendell & Gleason, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Application has been made on the part of the petitioner for a writ of prohibition to restrain the superior court from proceeding with the trial of a certain action pending on appeal from the justice's court of Los Angeles township to said superior court, and in which this petitioner is the plaintiff. The action was commenced in the justice's court on the 23d day of February, 1915, and judgment was thereafter rendered against one Leuschner, the defendant. The defendant gave notice of appeal and undertaking on appeal in the amount required by law. As ground for the writ here sought it is alleged that the sureties on the undertaking on appeal failed to justify after exception had been taken to their sufficiency, and that therefore, under the provisions of section 978a, Code of Civil Procedure, the appeal should have been dismissed by the superior court. A motion was made in the superior court, asking for an order dismissing the appeal for want of jurisdiction in the court to hear the matter because of the failure of the sureties to justify. Upon the alternative writ issuing, an answer was filed on behalf of respondents herein. One of the disputed questions between the parties was as to whether in fact service of notice of exception to the sureties was made. The petitioner here contends that he made such service by delivering the notice of exception to the defendant in the justice court action, and the defendant contends that, as attorneys had appeared for him at the trial of the action in the justice's court, they were entitled to have the notice of exception to the sureties served upon them; that otherwise such service would be ineffectual. The defendant in the justice court action further contends that, even though it might be lawful to serve a notice of exception to sureties on an undertaking on appeal on a defendant in person, in fact such service was not made. However, we are of the opinion, as this court has heretofore decided, that a notice of exception to the sufficiency of sureties on an undertaking on appeal from a judgment of a justice's court, in order to be effectual, must be filed with the justice. Budd v. Superior Court, 14 Cal. App. 256, 111 Pac. 628. Nowhere in the petition filed herein is it set forth that the notice of exception to the sureties was ever filed with the justice, and, referring to the certified copy of the justice's transcript which is attached to the answer of respondents, we find no record showing that any notice of exception was filed in the justice's court, or any papers at all referring to the sufficiency of the undertaking on appeal. In the case above cited this court has intimated that it is not essential that such a notice of exception shall be served upon the party or his attorney, but that it must be filed with the justice. The reasons upon which that holding is based are quite fully set forth in the opinion.

The application for a peremptory writ is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by James McNeil and others against F. L. Kredo and others. From an adverse judgment and order, the named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. M. De Vall, of San Francisco, for appellant. E. B. Mering, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The defendants herein were sued individually and as copartners.

The appeal is from the judgment entered in favor of the plaintiffs and against the defendant F. L. Kredo individually and from an order denying him a new trial.

The action was for the recovery of the sum of $980 alleged to have been paid to the defendants pursuant to the terms of an executory contract for the purchase and sale of certain ranch property situate in the county of Mendocino. The plaintiff's complaint proceeded upon the theory that, subsequent to the payment of the sum sued for and without default by the plaintiffs, the defendants repudiated the contract and elected to rescind the same. Upon the trial of the case it developed in evidence that the contract in controversy was not a partnership obligation, and that it had been executed only by and between the plaintiffs and the defendant F. L. Kredo individually. Accordingly a nonsuit was granted to the defendant H. F. Kredo and the partnership.

[1-3] The complaint states a cause of action. It in effect alleged that the defendants without cause repudiated the contract, declared it canceled, and denied to plaintiffs any right or interest thereunder. This being so, the plaintiffs were relieved from the obligation of further performance on their part and were privileged to consider and accept the defendant's renunciation of the contract as a rescission of the same. Liver v. Mills 155 Cal. 459, 463, 101 Pac. 299; Simmons v. Sweeney, 13 Cal. App. 283, 289, 109 Pac. 265; Seals v. Davis, 25 Cal. App. 68, 142 Pac. 905. In the absence of a special demurrer the complaint is sufficiently certain in its allegations to the effect that the plaintiffs had not received and retained by virtue of the contract, anything of value from the defendants. Consequently it was not essential to the statement of a cause of action to allege that the plaintiff had placed or had offered to place the defendants in statu quo before electing to accept the defendant's alleged rescission of the contract. The allegation of the complaint that the contract in controversy was a partnership obligation did not preclude proof of the fact that it was the individual obligation of the defendant F. L. Kredo. Code Civ. Proc. § 578; Grangers' Union v. Ashe, 12 Cal. App. 757, 108 Pac. 533.

The evidence, in our opinion, sustains the findings of the trial court as to the making of the contract, its performance by the plaintiffs, the sums paid by them thereunder, and its repudiation and rescission by the defendants. The findings support the judgment. Standing alone, finding No. 6 may, as a result of a clerical misprision, be somewhat uncertain; but, when considered and construed with the context of the findings as a whole, their numerical order and general arrangement, it is fairly certain that finding No. 6 refers to paragraph 6 of the complaint.

This disposes of all of the points made in support of the appeal which we deem worthy of discussion.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

Action by W. H. Bone against H. V. Traf-ton. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edward J. Kelly, of Watsonville, for appellant. George P. Burke, of Watsonville, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment. In this case the trial court prepared an opinion, which correctly sets forth the facts and the law applicable thereto, and which, omitting what is said touching one point not necessary, we think, to a disposition of the case, we adopt as follows:

In this action plaintiff seeks to recover damages from the defendant, as sheriff, for the alleged wrongful sale of personal property under a writ of attachment, without having first tendered to plaintiff the amount of a chattel mortgage owned by plaintiff, and which plaintiff claims antedated said writ of attachment.

The decision in the case involves a question of law based upon the following facts, which are undisputed, viz.: On October 7, 1914, in an action filed in this court (the superior court of the county of Santa Cruz), entitled, "Arbanasin v. Radovan," Radovan was sued for $370, and costs, alleged to be due for merchandise sold to him by assignor of Arbanasin. On the day the action was filed an affidavit and undertaking for attachment were also filed, and the writ of attachment was issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff for service. The writ was levied by the sheriff upon personal property the title to which, so far as this action was concerned, was vested in Radovan free from incumbrance. On October 16, 1914, nine days subsequent to the levying of the attachment, Radovan executed and delivered to the plaintiff in this action, W. H. Bone, a chattel mortgage for $630 covering the attached property. The mortgage was duly recorded on October 17, 1914. Thereafter, on the same day, Radovan filed a notice of motion that he would on October 23d move the court to discharge the attachment, on the ground "that the undertaking required by law before the writ should issue was not accompanied by the affidavit of the sureties thereon and therein that they were freeholders or householders within this state." Thereafter, to wit, on October 19, 1914, Arbanasin made and filed another affidavit and undertaking on attachment, and had issued thereon another writ of attachment, which was also placed in the hands of the sheriff for service. On October 23d, the day on which the motion to discharge the attachment was heard, Arbanasin presented to the court an application and asked permission to file a third undertaking, amending the undertaking filed on October 7th, and he based his application upon an affidavit in which, among other things, it was stated that the defect in the first undertaking was the omission of the word "free" or "house" in the blank space before the word "holder" in the affidavit of justification of sureties attached to said undertaking, and was "a mere unintentional oversight on the part of the officer or notary taking such affidavit." The court thereupon on said 23d day of October, 1914, allowed the amended undertaking to be filed, and denied the motion to discharge the attachment. No appeal was taken from the order of the court in this respect, and it became final. The plaintiff Bone now claims that the act of Arbanasin in filing the second affidavit and undertaking on October 19th, and having procured thereon a new writ of attachment, all of which was done before the court permitted the filing of the amended undertaking, constituted a total abandonment of the original or first attachment, and that thereby the mortgage lien of Bone became and was a first lien.

[1, 2] The defect in the affidavit was amendable (Tyson v. Reinecke, 25 Cal. App. 696, 700, 145 Pac. 153; Peterson v. Beggs, 26 Cal. App. 760, 148 Pac. 541; Jones v. Leadville, 10 Colo. 464, 17 Pac. 272), and there is ample authority holding that, where a statute permits the correction of an original undertaking, or the substitution of a new one, it has the effect of validating the proceeding from its inception (Griffith v. Milwaukee Harvester Co., 92 Iowa, 634, 61 N. W. 243, 54 Am. St. Rep. 573; Standard Encyc. of Pro. vol. 3, p. 460; McCraw v. Welch, 2 Colo. 284; State Bank v. Morris, 13 Iowa, 136; Pierse v. Miles, 5 Mont. 549, 6 Pac. 347; Langstaff v. Miles, 5 Mont. 554, 6 Pac. 356; Drake on Attachment, § 148).

[3] Accordingly, in the present case, under the broad terms of section 558, Code of Civil Procedure, it must be assumed that at all times subsequent to the filing of the first undertaking there was a valid attachment, unless, as claimed by the plaintiff, the first attachment was abandoned by the filing of the new affidavit and undertaking. In the case at bar the evidence shows without contradiction that the sheriff levied upon, at all times held possession of, and finally sold the personal property by virtue of the first attachment; and the sheriff in thus holding and selling the property did not attempt to levy the second attachment at all, but entirely ignored it. There was no evidence that Arbanasin or the sheriff intended to abandon the first attachment. In order to prevail it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to make such proof; and, having failed to do so, judgment was properly rendered against him. The authorities support this view. Stephens v. Mansfield, 11 Cal. 363; Marquart v. Bradford, 43 Cal. 526-529; Wood v. Etiwanda Water Co., 147 Cal. 228, 234, 81 Pac. 512; Utt v. Frey, 106 Cal. 392-397, 39 Pac. 807; Words and Phrases, vol. 1, p. 4. In the case of Wright v. Westheimer, 3 Idaho (Hask.) 232, 28 Pac. 430, 35 Am. St. Rep. 269, the facts are almost identical with the facts of the case at bar. In that case an attachment was levied upon real estate. That was an action to quiet title to land by removing a cloud therefrom caused by the issuance and levy of certain attachments. Subsequently a second attachment was obtained by the same plaintiff and levied by the sheriff upon the same property. Defendant claimed, among other grounds, that the act of procuring the second attachment operated as an abandonment of the first. The court said:

"The appellant alleges in the complaint that the levy of the first writ was abandoned by reason of the issuance of the second writ and levying it upon the identical property on which the first writ was levied. The respondents by their answer deny the abandonment of the levy of the first writ, and state in their answer the reason for procuring the issuance of the second writ as follows: 'The said plaintiff having at that time come into more open and notorious assertion of rights and ownership in the said real estate, the defendants herein caused a new writ to issue, as provided by law, and procured the same to be levied on all the interest the said D. D. Wright then had in said real estate.' The abandonment of the first writ made an issue in the pleadings, the burden resting on the plaintiff. The record contains no evidence of abandonment. It is, however, contended that the abandonment was established by the issuance of the second writ, and the levying of the same upon the identical parcel of land on which the first writ had been levied. The answer to this is that the respondents denied any intention of abandoning the lien secured by the first writ, and aver that they procured the issuance of the second writ as a precautionary measure only. The law does not presume or favor abandonments. The issue having been made by the pleadings, it was incumbent upon the appellant to establish the fact of abandonment, which he failed to do."

Judgment affirmed.

UNION TRUST CO. OF SAN FRANCISCO v.
PACIFIC TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH
CO. (Civ. 1794.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 7, 1916. Rehearing Denied Aug. 5, 1916. Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 5, 1916.)

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS $\Leftrightarrow$ 519(1)— ANCILLARY ADMINISTRATOR—ACTION—DEFENSE.

That stock of a domestic corporation, owned by a resident of another state at the time of his death, was voluntarily surrendered by it to his foreign domiciliary executor, and subsequently to his devisee, prior to any local ancillary administration, is a good defense to action for the stock, by the local ancillary administrator, subsequently appointed, against the corporation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Union Trust Company of San Francisco against the Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Company. From an adverse judgment and order plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Heller, Powers & Ehrman, of San Francisco, for appellant. Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant. The facts as set forth in the brief of appellant are conceded to be correctly stated, and, so far as they are material to the questions of law involved, are as follows: David R. Downer died in the state of New Jersey on March 1, 1911, being then a resident of that state. Thereafter his will was admitted to probate in the courts of New Jersey having jurisdiction of his estate. A part of the property of the estate of the decedent consisted of fifteen shares of preferred capital stock of the defendant corporation, valued at $1,500. The defendant's office and principal place of business was and is in the city and county of San Francisco. At the time of the death of the decedent the certificates of stock in question were in his possession in the state of New Jersey, and came into the possession of the executor named in his will, who thereafter, as such executor, surrendered the certificates of said stock to the defendant, which transferred the shares of stock on its books to said executor and issued to him a new certificate for the same. Thereafter the said executor duly indorsed and transferred said stock to Edith A. Barnes, one of the devisees under the will of said decedent, who subsequently surrendered the same to the defendant, which thereupon issued to Edith A. Barnes a new certificate for the stock in question. On July 29, 1913, the courts of New Jersey approved the final accounts and acts of the executor in said estate. Thereafter an exemplified copy of the will of said decedent was admitted to probate by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, and ancillary letters of administration with the will annexed issued to the plaintiff, which thereupon demanded of the defendant that it issue to plaintiff, as such ancillary administrator with the will annexed, a certificate for the fifteen shares in question, and, this demand being refused, brought this action against the defendant for the possession of said stock.

The trial court from the foregoing facts found in favor of the defendant and entered its judgment accordingly, and from that judgment the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The sole question presented for determination upon this appeal is as to whether the delivery by the defendant of the shares of stock in question to the foreign administrator of the decedent, and also to his devisee entitled thereto, in the absence of prior ancillary administration, and the appointment of the plaintiff as administrator with the will annexed in this state, constitutes a good defense to this action by such ancillary administrator to recover said stock. The appellant chiefly relies for its right to such recovery upon the case of Murphy v. Crouse, 135 Cal. 14, 66 Pac. 971, 87 Am. St. Rep. 90, as approved in the cases of Richards v. Blaisdell, 12 Cal. App. 101, 106 Pac. 732, and McDougald v. Low, 164 Cal. 107, 127 Pac. 1027. It is pointed out on behalf of the respondent that the case of Murphy v. Crouse involved a controversy between the domiciliary administrator of a foreign state and the ancillary administrator appointed here as to which had the better right to the possession of the personal property of the decedent, and that in such a case the respondent concedes that the local ancillary administrator has the better right; but insists that such is not the situation in the case at bar, and in support of such insistence directs our attention to the early case of Brown v. San Francisco Gaslight Co., 58 Cal. 426, wherein it was held that, in the absence of local ancillary administration, the foreign administrator of a decedent was entitled to a transfer of the stock of a nonresident decedent in a California corporation without taking out letters here; and that the case of Brown v. S. F. Gaslight Co. was considered and distinguished in the case of Murphy v. Crouse upon the very ground contended for by the respondent here; and that the two later cases above cited do not undertake to lay down a contrary rule. Our attention has not been called by the appellant to any case in this or other jurisdictions declaring a different rule to that invoked in the case of Brown v. S. F. Gaslight Co.; but, on the contrary, the respondent cites a large number of cases from other states wherein the principle for which it contends has found adoption, and in many of which the facts are identical with those of the instant case—notably the cases of Luce v. Manchester & L. R. R., 63 N. H. 588, 3 Atl. 618; Hutchins v. State Bank, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 421; In re Cape May, etc., Co., 51 N. J. Law, 78, 16 Atl. 191; Putnam v. Pitney, 45 Minn. 242, 47 N. W. 790, 11 L. R. A. 41. The principle invoked in these cases has been well set forth in the one last mentioned, wherein the court says:

"The modern decisions * * * have so far drifted away from former narrow views as to hold almost universally that, although the executor or administrator of the domicile cannot maintain a suit in another state to recover personal property, or collect a debt due the estate, yet he may take possession of such property peaceably without suit, or collect a debt if voluntarily paid; and that, if there is no opposing administration in the state where the property was situated, its courts will recognize his title as rightful, and protect it as fully as if he had taken out letters of administration there; also, that the voluntary payment of the debt by the debtor under such circumstances would be good, and constitute a defense to a suit by an ancillary administrator subsequently appointed."

We think the foregoing embodies a correct statement of the principle declared in the case of Brown v. S. F. Gaslight Co., supra, and that the cases of Murphy v. Crouse, Richards v. Blaisdell and McDougald v. Low, supra, are not to be understood as departing from it or as applicable to cases of the voluntary delivery of the stock of a local corporation to a foreign domiciliary administrator prior to any local ancillary administration, or to cases involving no rights arising out of the inheritance tax laws, or out of the claims of local creditors; and that the defendant herein, having voluntarily surrendered the possession of the stock in question to the foreign domiciliary executor of the decedent, and subsequently to the rightful devisee under his will prior to any local ancillary administration, has by proof of so doing established a good defense to this action.

Judgment affirmed.

(31 Cal. App. 68)

LYNCH et al. v. BEKINS VAN & STORAGE CO. (Civ. 1982.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 7, 1916.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR — 1071(5) — MATTERS CONSIDERED — IMMATERIAL FINDINGS.

The evidence sustaining the finding of an express contract that the storage should be in a fireproof warehouse, it is immaterial whether, as also found, an implied contract to the same effect arose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4238; Dec. Dig. — 1071(5); Trial, Cent. Dig. § 940.]

2. EVIDENCE — 355(5) — COMPETENCY — CORROBORATION.

To corroborate plaintiffs' evidence of defendant's express contract to store in a fireproof warehouse, evidence of representations by advertisements and printed matter that defendant had at its disposal fireproof warehouses and offered to customers to furnish storage of that kind is admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1488, 1489; Dec. Dig. — 355(5).]

3. EVIDENCE — 271(7) — SELF-SERVING DECLARATIONS — BOOK ENTRIES.

The entry made by defendant's agent in its order book at the time of the giving of the order to it for warehouse storage, not having been seen or known of by plaintiffs when the transaction was closed, is self-serving and not admissible to corroborate its evidence, consisting of the positive statement of its agent, contradicting plaintiffs, that nothing was said in the conversation about fireproof storage, that the contract was for non-fireproof storage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1075; Dec. Dig. — 271(7).]

4. CUSTOMS AND USAGES — 12(1) — KNOWLEDGE — HABIT OF PARTY.

Defendant's practice or habit of charging a different price for storage, according to whether or not it was fireproof, not being known to plaintiffs prior to contracting for storage, is inadmissible on the issue of an express contract for fireproof storage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Customs and Usages, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. — 12(1).]

5. CUSTOMS AND USAGES — 12(1) — KNOWLEDGE.

There being no question of misrepresentation of the character of plaintiffs' goods, a general custom, undisclosed to plaintiffs, among warehousemen to insert in warehouse receipts a provision limiting their liability for loss by fire to $50 per package, or one of refusing to accept antiques and jewelry of great value, is inadmissible in an action for the value of goods which defendant contracted to store for plaintiffs, and which were burned after delivery to defendant and before a receipt therefor was issued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Customs and Usages, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. — 12(1).]

6. WITNESSES — 406 — CONTRADICTION — COMPETENCY OF EVIDENCE.

As tending to contradict defendant's agent, who, denying there was an express contract for storage in a fireproof building, as testified by plaintiffs, stated that nothing was said in the conversation to the effect that the storage should be fireproof, defendant's advertisement of ability to furnish fireproof storage, though unknown to plaintiffs, was admissible.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by John G. Lynch and others against the Bekins Van & Storage Company. From an adverse judgment and order, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Collier & Clark, and Jones & Evans, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Williams, Goudge & Chandler, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiffs in this case were awarded judgment for the sum of $11,376 as the value of certain household goods, antique articles, bric-a-brac, etc., which had been delivered into the charge of defendant as a warehouse keeper. The merchandise had been transported from an Eastern point to Los Angeles by a corporation conducted as an adjunct to the defendant, although separate in its operation and management. On the arrival of the merchandise in Los Angeles plaintiffs visited the office of the defendant and there, through the agent of defendant, arranged for the storage of the goods. The merchandise was taken in charge by the defendant and stored in a warehouse near the railway station, but before a receipt therefor had been delivered to the plaintiffs a fire occurred which destroyed the warehouse and its contents, including the property of plaintiffs. The warehouse in which the property was stored, as has already appeared, was not fireproof. Plaintiffs, in suing to recover the value of their property, alleged that an express contract had been made with them that the storage should be in a fireproof warehouse; second, that, irrespective of the express verbal contract, defendant had by numerous advertisements which had come to the attention of plaintiffs, represented that the storage furnished by it was fireproof, and that the plaintiffs relied upon such representations; and nothing having been said by any agent of the defendant to the contrary, by the storage of the goods with defendant, plaintiffs contended that an implied contract arose that the merchandise was to be protected in a fireproof building. Both of these contentions were sustained by the trial judge, although the further claim that the fire occurred through the negligence of the defendant was decided against the plaintiffs. An appeal was taken from the judgment.

[1, 2] The trial judge having determined that there was an express contract for the furnishing of fireproof storage, and the record disclosing evidence amply sufficient to sustain that finding, the judgment should be affirmed, unless alleged errors pointed out in the admission and rejection of testimony are found to be meritorious. We think it unnecessary to go into any discussion of the question as to whether the implied contract arose by reason of the printed representations made by defendant as to the character of storage furnished by it. On the part of the plaintiffs the testimony showed that, when the order was given to the defendant to store the goods of the plaintiffs, inquiry was made on the part of the plaintiffs of the person in charge of defendant's office as to whether the storage would be "fireproof," to which the defendant's agent replied, "Oh, yes." The plaintiffs were strangers in the city of Los Angeles, and were not acquainted with the buildings used by the defendant for warehouse purposes. It seems that the defendant had a fireproof storehouse under its control, which was at a greater distance from the railroad tracks than the non-fireproof building in which the goods were stored. It is admitted that the defendant was able to and could furnish, when required, storage which by reason of the character of the building would furnish absolute protection against fire. The admission of evidence showing representations, by advertisements and printed matter, to the effect that the defendant had at its disposal fireproof warehouses and offered to customers to furnish storage of that kind, was without error, as it tended to corroborate the evidence given by plaintiffs as to the express contract made and found by the court. That it also tended to furnish a basis for an implied contract we need not discuss, for the reasons already given.

[3] It is claimed on the part of appellant that the court erred in rejecting the evidence of an entry made in the defendant's order book at the time of the giving of the order. This entry was made by the agent of defendant, and it was offered as corroborative evidence tending to sustain defendant's contention that the contract was for non-fireproof storage. It was not claimed that the plaintiffs saw this entry, or had any knowledge thereof at the time the transaction was closed. Such a declaration would be purely self-serving, and incompetent to be introduced in evidence. It was not claimed that defendant's agent, when she testified, needed to refer to the order as a memorandum refreshing her recollection, for she testified very positively that nothing was said in the conversation to the effect that the storage to be furnished should be fireproof.

[4, 5] It is claimed again that the court erred in rejecting evidence as to the difference between the prices charged by the defendant for fireproof and non-fireproof storage. It is not contended that any knowledge of such difference had been conveyed to the plaintiffs prior to the making of the contract for storage, and, so far as they were concerned, this practice or habit of the defendant was a secret matter which could not in any way affect the contract. Defendant was allowed to show by its employé that the charge as made against the plaintiffs for the storage of their goods was a charge customarily made by it for non-fireproof storage. This evidence, no doubt, was considered by the trial judge in making up his conclusion of fact as to the existence of the express contract, the correctness of which conclusion we have no right to here consider. It must be deemed to be the fact. There was no error committed by the court in rejecting evidence offered by the defendant to prove a general custom among warehousemen to insert in warehouse receipts a provision limiting their liability for loss by fire to $50 per package, or a custom of refusing to accept antiques and jewelry of great value. Such a custom, undisclosed to plaintiffs, as it was, could not have been considered to their detriment in the trial of the issues presented. There is no claim that there was any misrepresentation made by the plaintiffs as to the character of their goods, or that they refused upon demand to truly state that character.

[6] It is also contended that as to some of the evidence of representations by advertisements, there was no proof that the plaintiffs saw or relied upon such statements, and that the court for that reason should not have received the evidence. The evidence objected to under this head consisted of a calendar upon which was printed an advertisement that defendant was able to provide fireproof storage. It was objected that, as the plaintiffs had not seen this calendar at the time they gave their order for storage, it furnished no evidence in support of their cause of action because they could not have relied upon such representations. The trial judge limited the effect of this evidence and admitted it for a proper purpose when he said:

"They cannot claim that they relied upon the advertisement unless they saw it. They did not see it. They are not offering this in evidence to prove that they relied upon this, but to show that at that time the person representing the company with whom they were dealing knew that her company advertised that it had a fireproof building. That being so, there being one fireproof building and one that was not, it may legitimately be argued that, if nothing was said about it being a fireproof building, she would naturally have said, 'We have one which is fireproof and one which is not; which do you want?' On the other hand, if the plaintiff did contract for a fireproof building, there would be no occasion for saying that, or for calling their attention to the fact that there was one fireproof building and one which was not, because, if they had contracted for it, and this witness knew it, she would either order the goods to be sent to the building which was fireproof or else notify them of not doing so. In other words, the advertisement of the fireproof warehouse is a circumstance that has some tendency to contradict her present testimony, to show that her recollection is not accurate; that is, that there is to some extent an inconsistency between her saying that there was no contract for a fireproof warehouse, and her knowledge that there was an advertisement that there was a fireproof warehouse.

"Mr. Collier (for the defendant): I see the purpose which the court presents.

"The Court: That is the purpose for which it may be admitted. I presume that is the reason running through counsel's mind."

The brevity of this opinion may not seem commensurate with the voluminous record and briefs as filed in this cause, but to our minds the appeal is entitled to no more extended consideration than has been given to it. The trial court, by its determination that an express contract had been made for fireproof storage, determined the whole case, except as the defendant might be able to show that there was error committed at the trial. We think that none of the contentions for error is of merit, and that the judgment should be affirmed.

The judgment is affirmed.

FACTORS ⇐6 — CANCELLATION OF CONTRACT WITH PRINCIPAL.

Plaintiff's contract to deliver to defendants for sale on commission a certain number of cases of salmon of the pack of the next year, if defendants assented to the price thereafter to be named, was not canceled by plaintiff subsequently negotiating with defendants to handle its entire pack for that year, the defendant declining the business by letter referring to the letters, by dates, containing the proposition.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John L. Childs, Judge.

Action by E. Williams against Parrott & Co. From an adverse judgment and order, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. Early Craig, of San Francisco, for appellant. Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from the judgment and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The action was brought by plaintiff for sums alleged to be due from the defendant to the assignor of plaintiff, the Apex Fish Company, for a consignment of canned salmon which defendant had sold for the account of said fish company, which was a corporation engaged in the business of packing salmon having its principal place of business in the state of Washington. Defendant in its answer admitted itself to be accountable for the moneys received from the transaction set forth in plaintiff's complaint, but set up a counterclaim for $1,034, and denied liability for anything in excess of the difference between that sum and plaintiff's demand, and which difference it paid.

The facts of the case were stipulated to, except when consisting of letters, which were introduced in evidence. The counterclaim was based on the following facts:

On October 7, 1908, the Apex Fish Company entered into an optional agreement with defendant, whereby the former agreed to deliver to the defendant 5,100 cases of certain kinds of canned salmon of the pack of the year 1909, to be sold by the defendant at what is conventionally termed the opening price for the pack of that year, thereafter and before delivery to be named, and to be communicated by the Fish Company to the defendant, and to be by the defendant confirmed and assented to within five days after the same had been communicated to it. Defendant was to receive a brokerage of 5 per cent. upon its sales of the 5,100 cases. Thereafter in the month of December, 1908, the defendant entered into six optional contracts with different persons for the sale of these goods, subject to approval of opening price of the year 1909 when named. The "opening price" was annually fixed by certain large packers in the early fall, and it was the custom of packers to notify those holding contracts for salmon of the naming of the opening price. The six contracts referred to were accepted by the Apex Fish Company.

In the early part of the year 1909 the company entered into negotiations with the defendant for the handling by the latter of the whole of its 1909 pack of salmon, amounting to some 50,000 cases. These negotiations were terminated on May 12, 1909, when the defendant wrote the Apex Fish Company a letter, in which it stated, referring to the company's offer to allow the defendant to handle its entire pack for 1909, that after duly considering the matter "we have concluded that it is best to decline the business, which we do, thanking you for your offer and the courtesies extended." Subsequent to the writing of this letter the opening price was named. The fish company gave to the defendant no notice thereof, but immediately upon learning of it the defendant telegraphed to its representative, who was then in Washington, to confirm to the Apex Fish Company the opening price on its behalf. Its representative did so, and requested delivery of the 5,100 cases agreed to be delivered under the contract of October 7, 1908. The fish company refused to make the delivery taking the position that the contract was canceled by the fact of the negotiations for the entire pack of 1909 and their termination in the spring of that year. This was the view adopted by the trial court, which rendered its judgment accordingly in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $1,034, with interest and costs.

We are of the opinion that the contention of the defendant must be sustained that the contract of October 7, 1908, between the Apex Fish Company and the defendant, and the subsequent negotiations relative to the entire pack of salmon for the year 1909, were separate transactions, and that the letter of May 12, 1909, written by the defendant, declining the business, referring as it did to the letters by dates containing the proposition, had reference to the latter negotiations alone, and did not operate as a cancellation of the earlier contract. Accordingly it must be considered that the refusal of the Apex Fish Company to deliver the 5,100 cases of salmon, when defendant confirmed the opening price, constituted a breach of contract, for which the defendant is entitled to recover, and that the conclusion reached by the court that the contract of October 7, 1908, was canceled in May, 1909, is not supported by the evidence, and that its judgment based on such conclusion cannot stand.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Suit by James W. Hagan against Emma J. Hagan. From that part of the decree adverse to her, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, of San Francisco (R. L. McWilliams, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Milton L. Schmitt, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from that portion of a judgment which is in plaintiff's favor in an action wherein the plaintiff seeks a decree that the defendant, his wife, holds the title to several certain pieces of real estate in the counties of Santa Clara, San Diego, and Kern in trust for the plaintiff's use and benefit. The trial court held that the properties in Santa Clara and San Diego counties were the sole and separate property of the defendant by virtue of certain deeds of gift from the plaintiff to her but that as to the Kern county property, which the plaintiff had also transferred to the defendant by a conveyance in the form of a deed of gift, she took and held an undivided one-half of the same in trust for the plaintiff's use. It is from this latter portion of the judgment of the lower court that the defendant has appealed.

Practically the only question presented for the consideration of this court is whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings and judgment of the trial court as to the property involved in this appeal. There are certain undisputed facts which may be first recited. The plaintiff and defendant were married in the city of New York in the year 1887. The plaintiff had been married before and had three daughters. At the time of his second marriage he was 45 years of age, while the defendant was then but 25 years old, and was a school-teacher with a salary of from $40 to $50 a month, but with no other income or property. The plaintiff had been for several years a traveling salesman for a large jewelry house in which he had an interest, and was earning from $15,000 to $20,000 a year. At the time of his marriage he was the owner of some personal and real property including the Kern county ranch consisting of about 640 acres of land, which was at that time however believed to be of comparatively small value. The married life of plaintiff and defendant was for many years a happy and congenial one. He was a fond, trustful, and doting husband, and she a faithful helpmeet, traveling with him, looking after the details of his financial affairs, collecting his earnings and depositing them in various banks, and drawing upon them and upon his account with his firm at her own pleasure and without any question on her husband's part. At Christmas in 1888, being in Santa Clara county, he bought a lot in San Jose and gave it to his wife for a Christmas present. In the following year he executed and delivered to her a deed of gift to the Kern county lands. In December, 1890, being in San Diego, he bought at the suggestion of a mutual friend the San Diego lot, and gave it also to her for a Christmas present. In the year 1900 he acquired and conveyed to her lands in Tacoma, Wash., by like deed of gift; in fact, the plaintiff at various times conveyed to his wife all of his real estate which he owned before marriage and all that he acquired afterwards; and he also practically placed in her control all of his earnings and personal property. He also had his life insured in her favor in sums amounting to $13,000, some of the policies of which have matured and their amounts become available to her. In the meantime the plaintiff had grown old, and had lost his position and earlier earning capacity and been otherwise unfortunate in certain business ventures. In the year 1911 the plaintiff and defendant quarreled over some trifling financial matter, and the difficulty then occasioned presently involved the whole question of their property rights. The defendant claimed all of the property which had been given into her hands as her own, and left the plaintiff penniless and practically dependent upon his daughters for support. Thereupon the plaintiff commenced this action to have a trust in his favor declared as to the California property rights.

Thus far the evidence in the case is practically undisputed; and the trial court upon this state of the record was entirely justified in finding that the plaintiff had presented the defendant outright with the title to the Santa Clara and San Diego lots; but as to the Kern county property the testimony of the plaintiff and of the defendant is in sharp conflict as to the real purpose of the purported gift, the plaintiff testifying that his intention in placing the title to said property in the name of his wife was simply for their mutual protection in view of the perils incident to his nomadic life, and as an assurance of a means of livelihood for them both in their old age; and he also testified to numerous incidents tending to illustrate his claim that they both considered and spoke of it as their common property. The plaintiff is supported in his testimony by the testimony of his three daughters and their husbands as to similar illustrative conversations and incidents occurring between the parties. On the other hand, the defendant testifies that at all times the conveyance of the Kern county property to her was intended and considered to be a gift absolute investing her with the whole title to the property; and in this she also is in a measure supported by the testimony of her relatives and friends.

[1, 2] If the trial court believed, as it was entitled to do, the testimony offered by and on behalf of the plaintiff in preference to that presented by and on behalf of the defendant, we make no question but what a sufficiently clear and convincing case was made justifying the court's decree that the defendant had received and held at least an undivided one-half of the Kern county property for the plaintiff's use and benefit; and the trial court having so decreed upon evidence of such character and conflict this court will not under well-settled rules disturb the findings and judgment of the lower tribunal.

Judgment affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by E. A. Majors against Mark A. Girdner. From judgment for defendant and order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

E. J. Dole, of Petaluma, for appellant. L. G. Scott, of Sebastopol, for respondent.

HART, J. The action is on a promissory note for the sum of $350 which, it is alleged, was made and delivered by the defendant to the Pacific Coast Securities Company, a corporation (for brevity to be hereinafter referred to as "the corporation"), and after such execution and delivery, assigned by the original payee to the plaintiff, "who is now the lawful owner and holder thereof."

The answer admits the execution and delivery of the note as alleged in the complaint, but asserts that the instrument was procured from the defendant by the corporation above named through misrepresentation and fraud.

The gist of the charges of fraud set out in the answer may thus summarily be stated: That the corporation, through its duly accredited agents, called upon the defendant and offered him the stock of the corporation at the price of $15 per share, the par value of which was $10 per share; that said agents guaranteed and warranted said stock to be of the value at least of $15 per share; that at said time, as an inducement to the defendant to buy said stock, said agents entered into an agreement in writing, whereby they bound the corporation "to extend the time of payment of note to suit applicant for stock and to resell stock for $20, if so desired, by January 15, 1914," said agreement being signed by "E. H. McConkey, by Clements & Harold, agent." The further representations were made, so the answer states, that said stock "was very valuable," that the same could be turned and sold at any time for $15 per share, and that the corporation was in a flourishing condition and was financially sound. It is alleged that each and all of said representations were made for the purpose of inducing the defendant to purchase said stock, and that they were false and fraudulent, made with the intent to deceive the defendant and to persuade him to buy the stock; that said stock was not, at said time, of any real market value, that there were no prospects of the same being of any material market value, and that it was not then "worth $10 per share, or any other amount, and that said corporation never intended to resell the same for $20 per share, or $15 per share, or $10 per share, or for any other amount so far as said corporation had any knowledge"; that said corporation "was not in a money-getting and flourishing financial condition at the time, or at any other time." It is alleged that the defendant believed the representations so made, and was thus deceived and misled into purchasing, and did purchase, 25 shares of said stock "which he would not otherwise have purchased."

It is further charged that the corporation represented and agreed that, upon the execution and delivery by the defendant to it of the note in suit, it would, at once and without delay, issue to said defendant 25 shares of its stock, which would, as it was then represented was true of other stock of the same kind, earn and return dividends of not less than 7 per cent. per annum, "which was the only consideration for the execution of said note to said corporation, and that this was the only consideration ever to be given or paid for said promissory note, but defendant alleges that said corporation did not execute and deliver or issue stock to defendant, or in his name, or in any other person's name for him, and did never deliver to said defendant any certificate of stock, or thing at all, and there was nothing whatever given for said promissory note, and the same was without consideration, and has been at all times without consideration." These facts, it is declared, were not discovered by the defendant until the time at which he applied for a renewal of the note so as to extend the time for the payment thereof, when, upon giving the renewal note and at the same time paying to the corporation $25 in cash as and for principal and paying the interest accrued upon the original note, he asked what had become of the corporate stock certificate which the corporation had agreed to issue to him, and that he was then told and assured that the certificate for the 25 shares of stock had been issued as agreed upon, "which statement was false, and said corporation and the officers and members thereof knew that the same was false and untrue"; * * * that "said stock was not then, nor had it ever at any time, issued to defendant." It is averred, in effect, that but for the false representation then made as to the issuance of said stock and the further false representations as to the value of said stock and the flourishing and sound financial condition of the corporation, the defendant would not have made and delivered to the corporation the renewal note in lieu of the original note or paid to the corporation the sum of $25 on the principal and the accrued interest on the original note.

The "separate and further defense" set up in the fourth paragraph involves, in effect, along with some conclusions of the pleader, an iteration, substantially, of the allegations of the preceding paragraphs of the answer. It is to the effect that all the agreements, etc., between the corporation and the defendant "were purely executory, in that the matters and things and agreements on the part of said corporation were never performed, and were matters precedent to the issuance of said note and notes, in that said corporation was, as per the stipulations, to execute and deliver to defendant the certificate of stock * * * before said note or notes were to be delivered or to take effect, and said corporation was to place defendant in a position that he should be protected, and guaranteed that the stock would and should be of the guaranteed value of $15 per share, and in that said stock should meanwhile be drawing dividends, none of which matters and things were done or performed by said corporation, and the defendant had the right to rescind the same at any time, and did rescind the same in writing before the bringing of this action, and before the acquisition or possession thereof by plaintiff herein, all of which matters and things plaintiff well knew before the taking over of said note by him," etc.

The efficacy of the answer in the statement of a defense to the action was not challenged by demurrer.

The cause was tried by a jury and a verdict returned in favor of the defendant. Judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

In the outset, it is proper to state that no claim is here made that the plaintiff is an innocent purchaser of the note for value. On the contrary, it is conceded that the plaintiff is acting solely in this action for the corporation, the original payee, and that the note was assigned to him for the purpose of collection only.

The point is made for the first time in this court that the answer does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense to the cause of action pleaded by the plaintiff.

[1-4] One of the objections specifically made against the answer is that the defendant, who asks for affirmative relief by way of a rescission of the contract of sale upon the ground of fraud and the surrendering up and cancellation of the note in suit for want of consideration therefor by reason of such fraud, has not, by appropriate or other averment in his answer, offered to restore the stock which he alleges he purchased from the corporation. The point is well taken. The transaction between the corporation and the defendant constituted, according to the history thereof as it is explained by the answer, an executed contract of sale, and the stock became the property of the defendant upon the consummation of that transaction, notwithstanding that the certificate for the stock was not, so the answer declares, issued and delivered to the defendant. Mason v. Lievre, 145 Cal. 514, 78 Pac. 1040. A certificate for the stock of a corporation is only the evidence of the ownership thereof, or, as the cases put the proposition, it merely constitutes proof of property which may exist without it. Mitchell v. Beckman, 64 Cal. 117, 28 Pac. 110, and cases therein cited. In that case, it is among other things said:

"When the corporation has agreed that a person shall be entitled to a certain number of shares in its capital, to be paid for in a manner agreed upon, and that person has agreed to take and pay for them accordingly, he becomes their owner by a valid contract made upon a valuable consideration."

In this case, according to the answer, the defendant made application for the purchase of the stock, and the same was approved by the corporation by accepting the note of the defendant in payment therefor. This, as stated, constituted a sale. (Civ. Code, § 1721; Johnson v. Dixon Farms Co., 155 Pac. 134; 35 Cyc. 25), and thereupon the title to or ownership of the stock, ipso facto, vested in the defendant.

It is a settled rule in equity, and expressly affirmed by legislative fiat (Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 2), that in an action for rescission the party seeking the remedy "must restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract," etc. While there are in the answer some vague and indefinite allegations intended to disclose that the stock was not of the value it was represented to be by the agents of the corporation, there is no allegation in the defendant's pleading that it is wholly valueless. If it was of some value (and it may be assumed that it was, it being property), it was the duty of the defendant, as a prerequisite to his right to a rescission of the contract on the ground of fraud, to restore, or offer to restore, by appropriate and sufficient averment in his answer the stock to the plaintiff or to the corporation, for whose benefit the plaintiff is admittedly suing (Kelley v. Owens, 120 Cal. 502, 47 Pac. 369, 52 Pac. 797), and to do this it was not requisite, as we have already shown, that he should have previously had issued to him, or had in his possession, the certificate for the stock, which is, as suggested, the mere physical evidence of the interest he owned in the capital stock of the corporation.

[5] The answer, as a pleading seeking affirmative relief, is in other respects by no means an exemplar in pleading. But, taken in its entirety, we are able to say that the allegations of fraud on the part of the corporation in the transaction, eventuating in the sale of the stock, are sufficient in substance for the purpose for which they were intended to place the answer, as a pleading looking for affirmative relief, beyond the reach of a general demurrer.

But, notwithstanding the defectiveness of the answer, the case appears to have been tried by the plaintiff upon the theory that the defendant's pleading was sufficient in all respects, no objection whatever having been made by the plaintiff to the evidence offered by the defendant in support of the charge of fraud as set forth in his answer. Even if it be true, however, that, by failing to demur to the answer and to object to evidence offered in support of the allegations thereof, the plaintiff waived restoration of the stock by the defendant, and that the case was tried by the plaintiff upon the theory that the defendant had, in the matter of pleading, gone as far as required in an action for rescission, still the evidence falls far short of supporting the verdict.

The defendant's was the only oral testimony offered and received in his behalf; and, since the plaintiff presented no evidence from which even the remotest inference of fraud on the part of the corporation in the transaction may be drawn, it necessarily follows that the jury predicated their verdict wholly upon the testimony of the defendant. The facts of the transaction will therefore be taken from his version thereof, and, as so taken, may be briefly stated as follows: On the 22d day of October, 1913, the defendant made an application to the corporation for 25 shares of its capital stock for $15 per share. The application was in printed form, presumably the form regularly used by the company for that purpose, and the same was signed by the defendant. At the same time that said application was executed and delivered to the agents of the corporation, Messrs. Clement & Harold, by whom the transaction was conducted for the corporation, the defendant as in payment for said stock made and delivered to said agents his promissory note for the sum of $375, payable on the 15th day of January, 1914. For this note a receipt was delivered to the defendant, the same being signed:

"E. H. McConkey [vice president and manager of the corporation], by Clement & Harold, Agents."

Among other things, said receipt contained the following agreement on the part of the corporation:

"We agree to extend time of payment on note to suit applicant for stock and to resell stock for $20, if desired, by January 15, 1914."

The defendant, some time before the 15th day of January, 1914, made a demand upon or request of the corporation to sell the stock in accordance with the above agreement. The corporation did not sell the stock. On or about January 15, 1914, the defendant gave the corporation a renewal note for the original one (page 25, transcript) and, on the 19th day of that month, the corporation, through its secretary, W. B. Slade, forwarded the original note to the defendant, with the following letter:

"Inclosed you will find your old note for $375, due on January 15, 1914, marked 'canceled.'"

On the 15th day of May, 1914, the defendant paid the corporation the accrued interest and the sum of $25 on the principal of the note previously given, and asked for and was granted a further extension of time for the payment of the balance of said note, giving in lieu thereof the note in suit for the sum of $350. Said note was dated on the day of its execution and delivery (May 15, 1914), and made payable four months after date, or on the 16th day of September, 1914. On the 11th day of September, 1914, the defendant addressed to McConkey, manager of the corporation, the following letter:

"It will be necessary for you to extend the time on my note to Oct. 15, 1914, as I have no funds at present, but expect to cash some securities before that time to pay same with. I have explained to the lady in the office as she can tell you."

On September 5, 1914 (ten days prior to the date of the maturity of the note in suit), the defendant received from the corporation a duly executed certificate for the 25 shares of stock purchased by him.

The defendant testified: That, when the matter of the sale and purchase of the stock was under negotiation between him and the agents of the corporation, the said agents "represented that they had the agency for the California State Life Insurance Company; that they were reselling all of their business for them. As I had stock in the California State Life Insurance Company, I took a chance. They represented that the dividends were enormous, and that the dividends were already earned; they had the money to pay the dividends. * * * After representing that they had the agency for the California State Life, and as I knew that they were doing a big business, and representing that the dividends were earned, they had them there to pay, and that if I didn't want the stock, that they would resell it on the 15th day of January. Q. Now, you are speaking about this stock in the Pacific Securities Company? A. Yes, sir. Q. This was the stock that these agents tried to sell you? A. Yes, sir." The defendant, after so testifying, further said that the reason he renewed the note on the several occasions referred to above was because he was told that the stock had been issued to him, although he had not received the certificate therefor. He declared that the agreement was that the certificate would be issued and dated at the time of the delivery of the original note, and that he would therefore be entitled to any dividends earned by the stock from that time on; that, as a matter of fact, the certificate was not issued until nearly a year after he had bought the stock, and that he would, as a consequence, lose the dividends, if any accrued upon the stock, for the entire time during which he believed he was the owner of it. On cross-examination, however, the defendant testified that the reason he renewed the note as indicated was because he did not have ready money with which to take the note up. The above is the sum of the testimony upon which the jury founded their verdict.

Nowhere is there any testimony to be found in the record that the corporation was not financially sound or not doing a business profitable to its stockholders. Nor did the defendant testify or show by any other testimony or proof that the capital stock of the corporation was not of the value that it was represented to be by the corporation's agents. And there is absolutely no proof whatever that the stock purchased by the defendant was not dividend earning property.

As to the representations made by the corporation's agents to the defendant at the time the stock was purchased by the latter, it is difficult to say from the testimony of the defendant whether, in making said representations, the agents were referring to the California State Life Insurance Company and its stock or to Securities Company and its stock. In any event, the testimony of the defendant, as it is presented in this record, is that he personally knew that the stock to which said agents were referring, and as to which the representations mentioned were made, was of great value and profitable to the stockholders.

But, when boiled down to its actual purport, the real gist of the defendant's complaint against the transaction involved herein, as the same is gathered from his testimony, is that he has been defrauded of the dividends to which he was entitled on his stock because the corporation failed to keep its alleged agreement that, contemporaneously with the delivery to it of the original note, it would issue and deliver to the defendant a certificate for the 25 shares of stock purchased by him, and, furthermore, that he suffered injury because it failed to keep its agreement to sell said stock for him, upon his demand, at a price in advance of that paid by him therefor, by January 15, 1914. It is very obvious that these omissions on the part of the corporation do not involve such misrepresentation or fraud as will work a rescission of the contract of sale. Indeed, they cannot be said to involve misrepresentation at all. They amounted to a mere breach of certain covenants of the contract. As above stated, the stock purchased by the defendant became his property the moment that the sale was completed, and the certificate amounted only to tangible proof of such ownership. He was, of course, entitled to a certificate showing his ownership of the stock, but the failure of the corporation to issue and deliver it to him could not have the effect of vitiating the contract of sale or impairing his title to the stock. It was, as above suggested, merely the violation by the corporation of an obligation which the defendant by appropriate legal proceedings could have compelled it to discharge.

[6] As to the point involving failure by the corporation to resell the stock, it is perfectly clear that, even if that were a legitimate ground upon which rescission of the sale could be worked, the defendant, having made a payment on the original note and given a new note for the balance subsequent to the expiration of the time within which he was authorized to require the corporation to resell his stock, thereby waived that covenant or, at any rate, is by that act estopped from setting up the breach thereof as against the honesty and good faith of the transaction culminating in the making of the note in dispute, or as against the legal integrity of the note itself.

[7] Our conclusion is that the proofs utterly fail to disclose fraud on the part of the plaintiff in the transaction involved herein, and that if the stock of the defendant earned dividends during the period of time intervening between the date of the purchase thereof and the date of the issuance and delivery to the defendant of the certificate for said stock for which the corporation has not accounted or which it has not paid to the defendant, the latter should have set up the amount of such dividends as a set-off or counterclaim to the note in suit. This was the only recourse left to him under the facts of the transaction as he himself has detailed them in this case.

The judgment and the order are reversed, with directions to the court below to grant the defendant leave, if he may elect to take that course, so to amend his answer as to plead therein any counterclaim available to him by reason of the stock dividends claimed by him.

CURTIN et al. v. KINGSBURY, Surveyor General. (Civ. 1552.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 6, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 1, 1916.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—§93(1)—TAXATION—§696—SCHOOL LANDS—TAX SALE—REDEMPTION—STATUTE—VESTED RIGHTS.

Pol. Code, § 3817, prescribing the method for the redemption of school lands sold for delinquent taxes, was amended by St. 1895, p. 333, to apply where the full amount of the purchase price at $1.25 per acre had not been paid, except where the deed to the state provided by section 3785 had been filed with the surveyor general, and was amended by St. 1909, p. 42, by adding, "and an application has been filed therefor in that office." Section 3785, as amended by St. 1895, p. 328, provided that, where the full price of the land had not been paid, and the tax deed to the state had been forwarded to the surveyor general, the state should dispose of the land as prescribed in section 3788, which section, as amended by St. 1895, p. 329, provided that the land should become subject to entry and sale, that the former possessors should be preferred purchasers for six months after the deed was filed with the surveyor general, if they paid all the delinquent taxes, penalties, and costs, and, as amended by St. 1909, p. 122, gave the former possessors the right to repurchase within the six months' period, before any other application therefor, on payment of taxes, costs, and unpaid interest, and which was repealed by St. 1915, p. 605, §§ 1-3, requiring unsold school lands to be sold at public auction. Land purchased in 1901 upon payment of 20 per cent. of the purchase price was in 1904 assigned to petitioners, and in 1909 was sold to the state for delinquent taxes, followed by deed to the state in 1912. Held, that the sale and deed to the state passed the title to it, subject to redemption, and that the state had power to say upon what terms its title might be divested and sold to either the original purchasers or a new purchaser, so that petitioners had no vested right violated by the repealing statute.

Application for writ of mandate by C. Curtin and R. C. Jay, administrator of the estate of W. C. Hensley, deceased, against W. S. Kingsbury, Surveyor General of the State of California and ex officio Register of the State Land Office. Application denied.

W. H. Larew and Jos. Barcroft, both of Madera, for petitioners. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robertson T. McKisick, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Mandate. It appears by the petition that on November 19, 1901, the state of California issued its certificate of purchase to one J. Frank Miller for all of section 36, township 9 south, range 19 east, M. D. B. & M., in Madera county, for which he paid 20 per cent. of the purchase price of $1.25 per acre, said land being "only fit for grazing purposes"; that there remained due to the state $1.00 per acre, or $640, with interest at 7 per cent. per annum; that in 1904 said Miller assigned said certificate of purchase to plaintiff Curtin and W. C. Hensley, who "entered into the possession of said land and became and were the sole owners thereof, subject only to the paramount title of the state." On February 21, 1910, said Hensley died, and thereupon petitioner R. C. Jay was appointed and now is administrator of his estate. On June 22, 1907, the land in controversy was sold to the state for nonpayment of taxes, followed by a deed to the state dated July 16, 1912. On June 13, 1913, petitioner Curtin applied for and received from the auditor of Madera county an estimate of the amount necessary to redeem said land from tax sale, and on the same day paid to the treasurer of said county the amount of said estimate, together with other delinquent taxes on the land, which "redemption was duly recorded, and it was noted upon the recorded certificate and the recorded tax deed that the land was redeemed." On September 10, 1915, at the request of petitioners, the auditor and treasurer furnished them "a statement of all interest then due and unpaid on said" land, and petitioners paid to the treasurer the amount shown by said statement. It is then alleged that the certificate of sale issued to said Miller has been lost, and that the defendant refuses to accept from the treasurer of Madera county the amounts paid by petitioners, and refuses to issue a new certificate of purchase in lieu of the lost one. It is alleged, upon information and belief, that there are no claims adverse to petitioners to said land. There is also an allegation:

"That no foreclosure for nonpayment of interest ever was had or attempted in the matter of the delinquency in payment of interest as provided in the Political Code or at all; that the certificate of purchase remains uncanceled by any foreclosure."

The prayer is for an alternative writ of mandate directing defendant to receive the moneys tendered by petitioners and to issue a new certificate of purchase in lieu of the lost one. The issue presented is raised by a general demurrer filed by respondent to the petition.

By an act approved May 19, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 605), which, for convenience, will hereinafter be referred to as chapter 389, it was provided that "the unsold portions of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of school lands * * * shall be sold at public auction by the surveyor general." It is the contention of respondent that "under this method all applications to purchase school lands at a fixed statutory price are abolished. Nobody can apply to purchase lands of the character described in the act. Intending purchasers must attend the sale at the time and place stated in the notice of sale, and there bid in open competition against any and all other persons who desire to acquire the land," and respondent maintains that "this act conflicts with the provisions of section 3788, Political Code, in toto, and with so much of section 3817 as affects school lands"; that "under the law as it stood when the sale was made the sole remedy of the delinquent purchaser was to repurchase the land within six months from that date"; that the delinquent purchaser had no vested right to redeem the property, his only right being a preference given him to repurchase within six months; and that this privilege was withdrawn by chapter 389, supra.

Petitioners' reply to the above contention that "the state may diminish the penalties, extend the time for redemption, or lessen the burden upon the delinquent taxpayer, but the state cannot increase the penalties, shorten the time for redemption, or add further penalties, burdens, and conditions of redemption, after the date of sale to the state," and "none of the statutes relied upon by the defendant purport to be retroactive."

The method prescribed by section 3817, Political Code, in 1883 for the redemption of school lands sold for delinquent taxes applied only to purchasers who had paid "the full amount of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre." Stats. 1883, p. 23. This section remained unchanged until 1895, when it was made to apply to purchasers "when the full amount of the purchase price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre has not been paid, except where the deed to the state, provided for in section three thousand seven hundred and eighty-five has been filed with the surveyor general." Stats. 1895, pp. 308-340. By this act there were many changes made in the sections of the Political Code relating to the sale, redemption, and disposition of lands sold for delinquent taxes.

School lands were made subject to the act, and were referred to in sections 3785 and 3788, as well as in section 3817. By section 3785 it was provided that, where the full price for the land has not been paid, and where the tax deed to the state has been forwarded by the county recorder to the surveyor general, "the state shall dispose of such lands in the manner provided in section three thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight." Section 3788 provided that in such case "the said lands shall again become subject to entry and sale, in the same manner, and subject to the same conditions, as apply to other state lands of like character, except that the former possessors * * * of the land thus deeded to the state, their heirs or assigns, shall be preferred purchasers thereof for the period of six months, after the deeds are filed with the surveyor general." It was required of the intending purchaser that as a condition to his purchase he should pay, in addition to the price of the land, all delinquent taxes, penalties, costs and accrued costs prior to and subsequent to the date of sale to the state. The sections of the Political Code as amended by the act of 1895 was the law of 1901 when the purchase was made by plaintiffs' assignor. By that act (section 3788, Pol. Code) the right given to the purchaser whose land had been sold to the state for delinquent taxes was not to redeem, as was the right given by the act of 1883, but was a right to become a purchaser in preference to any other person if, when application was made, there was no other conflicting application. His rights were no greater than those of any other purchaser, except that he was a preferred purchaser for a limited period.

We have seen that the taxes became delinquent and the land was sold to the state in 1907, and a deed made to the state in 1912 which was duly filed with the surveyor general. Had no other statute intervened, plaintiffs' right would have been that of a preferred purchaser, and not of a redemptioner.

Section 3817 was amended in 1897, 1901, and 1905 (St. 1897, p. 433; St. 1901, p. 651; St. 1905, p. 499), but not affecting that part of the section referring to school lands. In 1909 the Legislature added to the section the following: "And an application has been filed therefor in that office." This act was passed February 22, 1909, and took effect 60 days thereafter. Stats. 1909, p. 42. At the same session, on March 2, 1909, section 3788 was also amended, retaining the provision making the former possessor or owner of the lands sold a preferred purchaser for a period of six months after the filing of the deed in the office of the surveyor general. And it was further provided: "That the former possessors or owners of said land thus deeded to the state, their heirs or assigns, shall have the right to be restored to their former state and title (at any time either during the said period of six months above referred to, or afterwards, and before application for said land is made and filed with the surveyor general by any other person) upon paying to the county treasurer"—(1) A sum equivalent to the taxes, penalties, and accruing costs; (2) all delinquent taxes, penalties, and costs which have accrued upon such lands subsequent to the date of the certificate of purchase under which the former possessors or owner, or their heirs or assigns, claimed title to said lands; (3) also all unpaid interest up to the 1st day of January following the day when he shall make payment to the county treasurer. Stats. 1909, p. 122.

The payments made by plaintiffs to the county treasurer, as appears from the petition, seem to have been made as redemptioners, whereas whatever right they had was given to them by the statute as preferred purchasers. It is perhaps immaterial whether these payments were made as redemptioners or as purchasers if they were sufficient to comply with the law applicable when the payments were made. Now, the sale to the state for delinquent taxes extinguished all rights of plaintiffs to the lands subject to the right of redemption during the five-year period and before the deed passes the legal title to the state. Such sale vests the equitable and the deed the legal title of the land in the state. Santa Barbara v. Savings Soc., 137 Cal. 463, 465, 70 Pac. 457. As against the state the property owner at the end of five years has forfeited all rights to the property, except the privilege accorded him by the statute of redeeming it at any time before the state actually enters, sells or disposes of it. Baird v. Monroe, 150 Cal. 560, 567, 89 Pac. 352. The state had the power to say upon what terms and in what manner the title thus vested in the state might be divested. It could have denied all right to redeem or to purchase.

In 1907, when the land was sold for delinquent taxes, plaintiffs' right under the amendments to the Political Code by the act of 1895 was that of a preferred purchaser for the period of six months after the deed is filed with the surveyor general. Pol. Code, § 3788. They did not avail themselves of that right, and it was lost to them. By the acts of 1909 the state offered to restore them "to their former state and title" upon conditions more favorable than were given by the act of 1895, for they were allowed to comply with the statute as preferred purchasers within six months, and were to be restored to their title at any time before another application was made for the same land and upon terms no different than were imposed by the act of 1895, except that the payment of interest upon the unpaid purchase price was required to be paid. As this was an obligation attached to the original contract, its payment cannot be regarded as an additional burden. But whether it was or not, we think the state had the right as the absolute owner of the land under the tax deed to dictate the terms upon which it might be repurchased by the original or a new purchaser, or the conditions upon which the purchasers or owners or their assigns might be restored to their original state and title.

The payments made by the plaintiffs to the county treasurer were made June 13, 1913, at which time no other application had been made to purchase the land, but the payment did not include interest, and no interest was then paid or tendered and on September 10, 1915, they again attempted to redeem from delinquent tax sale by paying the then accrued taxes, penalties, and costs, and they also paid to the auditor and treasurer of Madera county "all interest then due and unpaid on said land."

It appears from the petition that on July 15, 1915, the surveyor general advised petitioners that said land could be redeemed under section 3788 of the Political Code, but also advised petitioners of the act of 1915 (S. B. 906, c. 389), copy of which was inclosed in the letter of advice, stating that said "act became effective August 8, 1915, superseding section 3788 of the Political Code" and that, in the opinion of the surveyor general, "all land that had been sold to the state for nonpayment of taxes wherein the tax deed was filed in this office would be subject to sale under the provisions of said S. B. 906. Inasmuch as the land was not redeemed on or before August 8, 1915, this office considers" (describing the land) "to be vacant state land and subject to sale under the provisions of S. B. 906." Petitioners were therefore fully aware of the attitude of the state and that they were required to make payment on or before August 8, 1915, in order to preserve their rights. This they did not do.

The act of 1915 provided:

"Section 1. The unsold portions of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of school lands * * * shall be sold at public auction by the surveyor general. * * *

"Sec. 3. Those parts of all acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed."

Stats. 1915, p. 605.

Without question, section 3788 of the Political Code is in conflict with this act, and is thereby repealed so far as it provided a different method for the disposition of school land.

We do not think petitioners had any vested right which was violated by the act of 1915. The absolute title to the land, as we have said, vested in the state by the tax deed, and the state could provide any method it chose for the subsequent disposition of the land, and could at any time change such method without impairing the right of any applicant to purchase who had not complied with the then existing law.

Petitioners claim that:

"The penalty provided by law for the nonpayment of interest is foreclosure, whereby the principal paid upon the purchase price becomes forfeited and the certificates canceled upon foreclosure and not otherwise."

And it is hence contended that, as there has been no such foreclosure, petitioners were not required to pay accrued interest as a condition to the repurchase or redemption of the land, and that it was a violation of their contract to require such payment.

It was held in the recent case of Aikins v. Kingsbury, 170 Cal. 674, 151 Pac. 145, that:

"The method of * * * procedure * * * by the act of 1867-68 for terminating the right of a defaulting purchaser of school lands purchased under that act was not exclusive, and he may not complain of a different method of procedure subsequently established by the state for accomplishing that end which did not impose upon him more onerous conditions than the former." Syllabus.

As above suggested, we do not think the method of enforcing payment of interest by making it a condition for repurchase or redemption where the land is sold for nonpayment of delinquent taxes is any more burdensome than to enforce payment by foreclosure. Certainly it is less expensive and less annoying to the intending purchaser or redemptioner. But, aside from this consideration, we think, as already pointed out, the sale to the state for nonpayment of taxes culminating in a deed to the state extinguished all rights of petitioners, and that they thereafter could be restored to their former or any rights only by compliance with the law existing at the time they might apply for such restoration.

The writ is denied.

SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al. v. SPRING VALLEY WATER CO. et al. (S. F. 6846.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 22, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Sept. 21, 1916.)1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨191—WATER COMPANY—CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT.

In view of Civ. Code, § 1636, requiring a contract to be interpreted to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties, an instrument, whereby a railroad, in consideration of $5 and the construction and maintenance of a hydrant at a station and the free use of water therefrom for fire and railroad purposes, granted a water company the right to lay and maintain a water conduit on its railroad line, passing through the station grounds at an unincorporated village where no water rate had been fixed, constituted an agreement by the water company to furnish water for the railroad from its main free of charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. ⇨191.]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨191—WATER COMPANY—CONTRACT—RIGHTS OF PARTIES.

Under such instrument, the right granted to the water company to lay and maintain its pipe line in the railroad's land and to conduct water therein was a species of real property, incorporeal in nature, though the pipe and the water while passing through it were corporeal in character, and were real property belonging to the water company, and was in exchange for the railroad's right to take a part of the water which water right was a burden or servitude upon the water company's pipe line and system, which respective rights, upon the completion of the pipe line and the running of water therein, became executed and not executory, and which, though not limited as to time, were not perpetual, but continued while the conduit was used.

3. CONTRACTS ⇨108(2)—PUBLIC POLICY.

Such instrument or contract, in the absence of any regulation or any public authority forbidding it, and in the absence of any showing that the taking of water for railroad uses reduced the supply below the quantity necessary or convenient for the water company's consumers entitled to or applying for it, or that it would have been used but for such taking, was not void because opposed to public policy; as in such case the company, though its water was devoted to a public use, might freely contract with the railroad as a consumer regarding the price of service and the manner of payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 498-503, 505, 507-511; Dec. Dig. ⇨108(2).]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨188(2) — WATER COMPANY — CONTRACTS — REVISION AND REFORM.

The persons in charge of property devoted to a public use are trustees in the execution of a public trust, and cannot burden such trust, or the property devoted to its purposes, by imposing obligations upon themselves or upon the property which destroy or impair the public use, and cannot convey it away absolutely to private uses, or contract for a preference to one consumer to the detriment of others; and any contract, purporting to give such preference or to transfer a part of the dedicated public supply to private use, is subject to revision by competent public authority, and to reformation to make them conform to the public interest, which power to revise and reform applies to a contract of a public service water company, creating an easement in the water held for a public use.

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨197—WATER SUPPLY—CONTRACTS—REMEDY.

Under Const. art. 12, § 23, and Public Utilities Act (St. 1911, Sp. Sess. p. 18), vesting the power of revision and regulation of the acts, contracts, etc., of railroads in the Railroad Commission, and section 74 of the act, declaring that it shall not release or waive any right of action of any person for any right which shall accrue under the law of the state, a railroad, party to an instrument whereby a water company, in consideration of a grant of an easement for its pipe line, was to furnish it with water for railroad purposes, though it might apply to the Commission for Relief, might also resort to an ordinary action in the court for the enforcement of its rights under such instrument.

6. SALES ⇨96, 113 — PERSONAL PROPERTY — CONTRACT—TERMINATION.

A contract, properly classified as an agreement to buy and sell personal property, whereby one party agrees to supply a commodity to the other, as required, at a fixed price payable in advance, or on delivery, and silent as to its duration, is terminable by either party after a reasonable time and upon reasonable notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 261, 286, 287; Dec. Dig. ⇨96, 113.]

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨191—CONTRACTS—TERMINATION—EASEMENTS.

Such principle does not apply to a case where a contract creates an easement or servitude in real property, and the alleged buying and selling of the water of a water company consists merely in its continued enjoyment of an easement for its pipe line, in consideration of furnishing water to a railroad.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. ⇨191.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Company and another against the Spring Valley Water Company and another, to have plaintiffs' right to receive water from defendants' main established, and to enjoin defendants from depriving plaintiffs of such water. Judgment for defendants, new trial denied, and plaintiffs appeal. Judgment and order reversed.

Frank Thunen, Stanley Moore, and Frank McGowan, all of San Francisco (A. A. Moore, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. McCutchen, Olney & Willard, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The object of this action was to have the right of the plaintiffs to receive water from the defendants' main to the water tank of the plaintiffs at Newark station in Alameda county declared and established, and to enjoin the defendants from cutting the connection between said main and the tank, or from depriving plaintiffs of said water. The court made findings and gave its judgment in favor of the defendants. From this judgment and from an order denying a new trial the plaintiffs appeal.

The plaintiffs claim the right to have the delivery of water into their tanks at Newark continued indefinitely and without further charge, under an instrument in writing executed on May 10, 1888, by the two plaintiffs and by the defendant Spring Valley Waterworks. The instrument of May 10, 1888, omitting the unimportant parts, is as follows:

"Know all men by these presents: That the South Pacific Coast Railway Company and the Southern Pacific Company, grantors, in consideration of five dollars to them in hand paid, and in consideration of the construction and maintenance of a hydrant at Newark station and the free use of water therefrom for fire and station and all other railroad purposes, have granted and by these presents do grant unto the Spring Valley Waterworks, grantee, the right to lay and maintain a line or lines of iron water pipe conduit for the waters of said grantee on and along the line situate, lying and being in the county of Alameda in the state of California, described as follows, to wit [here follows a description of the line of the conduit]."

"The said pipes to be laid so that the upper surface there shall be at least two and one half feet below the natural surface of the ground, and the ground to be restored and maintained by the said grantee, its successors and assigns, to the natural level and grade thereof;" "To have and to hold the said right of way unto the said grantee, its successors and assigns forever."

At the time this instrument was executed the Spring Valley Waterworks was constructing a water main to carry water from its source in Alameda county to San Francisco, for the use of the city and county of San Francisco and its inhabitants. The right of way granted by said instrument was to be used as a place along which to lay said water main. The South Pacific Coast Railway Company was the owner of a line of railroad running from Oakland through Newark Station to Santa Cruz. The Southern Pacific Company was operating said railroad under a lease from its coplaintiff. The right of way granted extended along the line of the railroad through the village of Newark, and was nearly four miles in length. It was parallel to the track, partly on one side thereof and partly on the other, passing under the track twice, and was situated from 32 to 36 feet therefrom. A main 3 feet in diameter was immediately laid by said waterworks along the line described, and for the purpose of supplying water to the plaintiffs' water tank it inserted, near the station at Newark, a 6-inch tap in the water main, which was reduced to a 3-inch pipe extending from the tap to the water tank. The plaintiffs thereafter regulated the flow through this connection, so as to keep the tank filled with water for use when wanted. On September 14, 1903, the Spring Valley Waterworks transferred its sources of supply and system of works, including the main through Newark, to the Spring Valley Water Company, and the latter has ever since continued to operate the system and to keep water flowing in said main and to plaintiffs' water tank. The Southern Pacific Company has taken from said tank the water needed at that place for use in the operation of its railroad and for the other purposes mentioned.

Shortly before this action was begun the defendants threatened that unless the plaintiffs would thereafter pay a reasonable charge for the water taken for such railroad purposes, the defendants would, on March 10, 1913, cut off the connection to the tank and refuse to deliver water thereafter. The village of Newark is unincorporated. The supervisors of Alameda county have never fixed rates for the service of water devoted to public use within the county, and no public authority has ever fixed such rates or made any orders regarding the supply to the plaintiffs.

At the time of the sale or transfer of the water system from the Spring Valley Waterworks to the Spring Valley Water Company, in 1903, the latter company had full knowledge of the existence and contents of said agreement of May 10, 1888, above set forth. At the time of the execution of said instrument the plaintiffs did not take from said tank for their use more than 25,000 gallons of water per day. Since that time the railroad has been changed from narrow gauge to standard gauge, a branch line from Newark to Dunbarton point has been built, and more locomotives and trains have been run, so that at the present time the railroad takes and uses an average of 50,000 gallons daily.

The respondents, in support of the judgment, advance the following propositions: (1) That the language of the instrument of May 10, 1888, does not constitute an agreement by the Spring Valley Waterworks to furnish water to the railroad company. (2) That the defendants are corporations engaged in supplying water for public use of which the water in controversy constitutes a part, and that a contract by such public utility corporation to furnish water from its supply perpetually is opposed to public policy, and consequently invalid. (3) They also claim that the case is an action to enjoin the breach of a contract, which, under section 3423 of the Civil Code, cannot be maintained, unless the facts would support an action for its specific performance, and that it does not appear that the consideration was adequate, or that the contract was just and reasonable, or that there is not an ample remedy at law by an action for damages after the threatened breach occurs.

[1] 1. The claim that the instrument does not constitute an agreement by the Spring Valley Waterworks to furnish water to the plaintiffs is untenable. The railroad companies were the owners of the land through which the waterworks desired to lay a main in which to carry water. The grant by the railroad company to the waterworks consisted of an easement in their land to lay and maintain, perpetually if desired, the said water main along the line described, which passed through Newark near the plaintiffs' station there, and to carry its water therein. It declares that this easement was granted—

"in consideration of the construction and maintenance of a hydrant at Newark Station and the free use of water therefrom for fire and station and all other railroad purposes."

This language necessarily implies that the hydrant was to be constructed and maintained by the waterworks, and that the free use of water therefrom was to be of the water which the waterworks was to have flowing through said main. "A contract must be so interpreted as to give effect to the mutual intention of the parties as it existed at the time of contracting, so far as the same is ascertainable and lawful." Civ. Code, § 1636. The intention that the waterworks was to furnish the water, of which the plaintiffs were to have the free use, is clearly ascertainable from the contract itself. To hold that the instrument does not express such agreement would not give effect to its obvious intention, but would defeat it.

[2] The nature of some of the elements of the right thus granted by the waterworks to the railroad companies is well established. The right granted to the waterworks to lay and maintain the pipe line in the land and to conduct water therein was a species of real property, incorporeal in nature. The pipe and the water while passing through it were corporeal in character and were real property belonging to the waterworks. Stanislaus W. Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 725, 93 Pac. 858, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 359; Copeland v. Fairview Land Co., 165 Cal. 154, 131 Pac. 119. The instrument was, in legal effect, in the nature of an exchange, a grant of a right of way for the water conduit by the railroad companies to the waterworks, and a grant by the waterworks to the railroad of a water right, consisting of a right to take a part of the water flowing in the conduit, by means of the connecting pipe, as needed. The water right was a burden or servitude upon the pipe line and water system of the waterworks, a right to a part of its water. Washburn on Easements, 3, 5, 305; Civ. Code § 801. As to the respective rights, upon the completion of the pipe and the running of water therein, the respective agreements became executed, not executory. The right of way and its use thereafter was accepted by the waterworks as payment in advance for the future use of the water by the railroad companies. These respective rights were indefinite and unlimited, as to time, but they were not necessarily perpetual. There was no covenant or agreement by the waterworks to lay the pipe line, or to carry water therein, or to maintain either the pipe line, or the flow of water therein, for any period of time, or at all. Its only agreement was that, after it had laid the conduit and when it did carry water in it, the plaintiffs should have free use of that water for the purposes designated. The waterworks could, at any time, change the route of its main to other lands without violating the contract, and would thereafter have been relieved of the burden. The waterworks was authorized to own, sell, and distribute water to public use, and the water in question was a part of the water supply which it held, managed, and controlled for that purpose. It could at any time, by purchase, or, if necessary, by condemnation suit, acquire a new route for its main. But so long as it maintained the route given, the right of plaintiffs was a burden or servitude thereon which entitled them to take and use water from the main to the quantity necessary for the purposes specified.

[3] 2. We perceive no valid reason for holding the contract void because opposed to public policy. It is not claimed that it was not freely made, or that it was procured by fraud or undue influence. There is nothing inherently wrong in such a contract to give water service upon payment in advance. No regulation or rule of any public authority empowered to control or regulate public water service in Alameda county had or has forbidden it. There is no claim that the taking of this water by the plaintiff has reduced the supply remaining in control of the defendants below the quantity necessary or convenient for the other consumers entitled to it or applying for it, or that the supply to plaintiffs has not been from a surplus that would have been unused but for their taking. Where the rates for water devoted to public use have not been fixed by public authority, the person in charge of the use and the consumer may freely contract regarding the price of service and the manner of payment, and such contracts will be deemed valid by the courts, and may be enforced by any appropriate mode. Fresno, etc., Co. v. Park, 129 Cal. 437, 62 Pac. 87; Stanislaus W. Co. v. Bachman, supra, 152 Cal. 730, 93 Pac. 858, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 359; Leavitt v. Lassen Irr. Co., 157 Cal. 90, 106 Pac. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213.

[4] It is true, as said in the Leavitt Case, that the person in charge of the public use is a trustee in charge of a public trust, "the agent in the execution of this public trust," and that he cannot lawfully burden this trust, or the property devoted to and held for the purposes of that trust, by imposing obligations upon himself, or burdens upon the property, which destroy or impair the public use or the public interest therein. And so he cannot convey it away absolutely to private use, or contract for a preference to one consumer to the detriment of others in the public use. Any contract purporting to give such preference in the public use, or to transfer a part of the dedicated public supply to private use, is subject to revision by competent public authority, to the end that the public service shall not be unjustly discriminatory, or unreasonable, and that the private use shall not interfere with the public use, and such contracts may, by such authority, be reformed accordingly, to make them conform to the public interest. Turtle Creek Borough v. Pennsylvania W. Co., 243 Pa. 408, 90 Atl. 194; Bellevue Borough v. Ohio V. W. Co., 245 Pa. 117, 91 Atl. 236. See, also, Fresno, etc., Co. v. Park, supra; Stanislaus W. Co. v. Bachman, supra. In the case first cited it is said that the power to fix rates and regulate public service of water devoted to public use "carries with it jurisdiction to determine the reasonableness of charges, irrespective of prior contracts; to that extent such contracts may be reformed." But until such public authority has intervened and modified such prior contract, it will be recognized as valid, and enforced in the courts, as declared in our decisions above cited. The power to revise and reform contracts of public service water companies, in the interest of the public, applies as well to a contract creating, or attempting to create, an easement in the water held for public use as to any other disposition thereof.

[5] In this state this power of revision and regulation is now, and was when this controversy arose, lodged in the Railroad Commission by the Public Utilities Act of 1911. Stats. 1911, Sp. Sess. p. 18; Const., art. 12, § 23. The act provides, however, that it shall not operate to release or waive any right of action of any person for any right "which may have arisen or accrued or may hereafter arise or accrue under any law of this state." Section 74. It follows that, although the parties may apply to the Commission for relief, they may also resort to ordinary actions or proceedings in the courts for the enforcement of rights arising under contracts allowed by the Commission to remain in force relating to the service of water. The result is that the plaintiffs are possessed of an easement or servitude upon the water system of the defendant Spring Valley Water Company, by virtue of which they are entitled to share in the water flowing in the main, to the extent required for the uses mentioned in the contract, that they had been in the enjoyment thereof for 25 years at the time the defendant first disputed their right, and that they still have the right to such use without charge.

A question may arise in the further prosecution of the case whether the plaintiffs are now entitled to more water than would have been necessary to supply the narrow gauge road owned and operated by the plaintiffs in 1888, when the contract was made, if it had not been changed to standard gauge, and whether they are entitled to water for the line crossing at Newark which was afterwards constructed. We cannot determine these questions upon this appeal. The facts necessary for that purpose are not found.

[6, 7] In the oral argument respondents' counsel cited a number of cases, to the effect that a contract, whereby one party agrees to supply a commodity to the other, as required, at a fixed price, whether paid in advance or payable on delivery, and is silent as to its duration, may be terminated by either party after a reasonable time and upon reasonable notice. McCullough, etc., v. Philadelphia Co., 223 Pa. 336, 72 Atl. 633; Turtle Cr. Bor. v. Pennsylvania W. Co., supra; Bellevue Borough v. Ohio Co., supra; Echols v. New Orleans, etc., Co., 52 Miss. 614. The principle is well established and is applicable in all cases where the contract is properly classified as an agreement to buy and sell personal property. It does not apply to a case like the present, where, as we have seen, the contract creates an easement or servitude in real property and the supposed buying and selling of the water consists merely in the continued enjoyment of the easement. In the McCullough Case above cited the facts were similar to the case at bar, except that in return for the right to lay and maintain a pipe line for carrying natural gas, the other party was to have gas for fuel in its factory at certain fixed rates, but was silent as to the time it was to continue in force. The court in that case evidently considered the agreement to furnish gas as an agreement for the sale of personal property, and its decision was based wholly on cases of that character. It was not treated on the theory that the right to receive gas was an easement in the gas company's system. In the other Pennsylvania cases cited the contracts were made by a public service company with a municipality to furnish water to consumers at fixed rates. In that state, at that time, the courts had jurisdiction to regulate the water service and fix rates. The cases were decided partly upon the theory that the service of water by such companies was a matter of public concern; that the contracts were subject to revision in the public interest by competent public authority and were not enforceable against that interest. It was also said that, being indefinite as to time, the contracts were terminable by either party on reasonable notice. The personal property cases were referred to in support of this principle, and the case was obviously decided upon the hypothesis that they involved the sale and delivery of personal property, and not the mere enjoyment of an easement. In none of the cases was the right to receive the thing to be furnished understood to be a vested estate in realty of the nature of an easement. As we have said, the agreement is subject to revision in the public interest by the Railroad Commission. But the courts can only declare and enforce the rights as they exist. Until some order to the contrary is made by the Commission, the plaintiffs are entitled to the use of the water as provided in the agreement without payment of anything other than the original consideration.

The judgment and order are reversed.

BORDWELL v. WILLIAMS, County Clerk.
(L. A. 4892.)

1. ELECTIONS §146—RIGHT TO SEEK OFFICE.

The right to seek election to any office is open to all persons possessing the constitutional or statutory qualifications, but a citizen is under no obligation to seek an election to any office, and may be a candidate or refuse to be such at his option.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Dec. Dig. §146.]

2. ELECTIONS §126(1) — PRIMARY ELECTIONS — RIGHT OF CANDIDATE TO WITHDRAW — STATUTE.

Though all necessary steps have been taken to enable one to become a candidate for nomination for the office of United States Senator under the Direct Primary Law (St. 1913, p. 1379), and within the 35 days before election allowed by section 5, subd. 4, he has filed with the secretary of state his affidavit stating that, if nominated, he would accept and not withdraw, and would qualify if nominated and elected, and his name has been certified to county clerks, with directions to print it on the primary ballot as a candidate, and his name has been published as required by section 10, and put on sample ballots, he may withdraw as a candidate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. §118; Dec. Dig. §126(1).]

3. MANDAMUS §74(3)—PRIMARY ELECTIONS—WITHDRAWAL OF CANDIDATE—MANDAMUS TO COUNTY CLERK—STATUTE.

Under the Direct Primary Law, section 10 of which requires the county clerk to publish the names appearing upon the list certified to him by the secretary of state, section 12, providing that the names of all candidates for whom nomination papers have been filed shall be printed on the ballot, and section 27, authorizing an application to the Supreme Court in case of error, omission, or wrongful act in placing any name on an official primary election ballot or in printing such ballot, and authorizing the court to order the officer to correct the error, the county clerk acts ministerially in publishing the names certified to him, and, where a candidate withdraws after the secretary of state has made his certificate, the court, by mandamus, may compel the county clerk to omit such candidate's name from the ballot to be used in a forthcoming primary election.

Angellotti, C. J., and Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Mandamus proceeding by Walter Bordwell against W. B. Williams, County Clerk of Orange County. Peremptory writ issued.

Samuel M. Shortridge and Catlin, Catlin & Friedman, all of San Francisco, Frank P. Doherty and C. E. Spencer, both of Los Angeles, and W. S. Woodworth, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. L. A. West, of Santa Ana, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is a proceeding in mandamus to compel the county clerk of Orange county to omit from the ballots to be prepared by him for use in the forthcoming primary election the name of the petitioner, Walter Bordwell, as a candidate for the Republican nomination for the office of United States Senator. The election is to be held on August 29, 1916. An alternative writ has issued, and the respondent has made return thereto. The material facts are not in controversy.

Pursuant to the provisions of the Direct Primary Law (Stats. 1913, p. 1379), a committee of five electors proposed the name of the petitioner as a candidate at the said primary election for the Republican nomination for the office of United States Senator. They duly appointed verification deputies in the several counties, and nomination papers signed by the requisite number of qualified electors were filed in the county of Los Angeles and other counties. The signatures were examined and the registrars or county clerks of the various counties duly certified to the secretary of state a sufficient number of qualified electors to entitle the petitioner to have his name placed upon the primary ballot. Within the time allowed by the statute—i. e., not less than 35 days before the election (section 5, subd. 4)—Mr. Bordwell filed with the secretary of state his affidavit stating, in addition to the other matters required, that if nominated he would accept such nomination and not withdraw, and that he would qualify as such officer if nominated and elected. The secretary of state thereupon certified the name of the petitioner to the respondent and to the county clerks and registrars in the several counties, directing said officers to print on the primary ballot the name of the petitioner as a candidate for the Republican nomination for the office of United States Senator.

After receiving such certificate, the respondent published, as required by section 10 of the act, the names and addresses of all persons, including the petitioner, for whom nomination papers had been filed in the office of the secretary of state. He also caused to be prepared sample ballots including, among other names, that of petitioner, and has directed the printing of official ballots in like form. On the 9th day of August, 1916, petitioner notified the secretary of state, the respondent herein, and all county clerks and registrars of voters that he had withdrawn as a candidate for said nomination, and directed each of said officials not to print or publish his name upon any primary ballot to be used in said election on August 29th. The respondent refuses to have the name of the petitioner removed from the ballot, and the purpose of this proceeding is to compel such removal.

[1] The right to seek election to any office is open to all persons possessing the constitutional or statutory qualifications. A citizen is, however, under no obligation to seek election to an office. He may be a candidate, or refuse to be such, at his option, and, in the absence of statutory provision to the contrary, the mere fact that he has once announced his candidacy for an office does not prevent him from withdrawing as a candidate whenever he sees fit so to do.

[2] Does our statute change this rule? In other words, does the fact that Mr. Bordwell, and the committee acting on his behalf, had taken the necessary steps to enable him to become a candidate at the August primary election, constitute a bar to his withdrawing his candidacy for such nomination prior to the election? The act contains nothing which in direct terms bears upon the question of withdrawal at this stage. Before any elector may have his name placed upon the ballot as a candidate, he must sign an affidavit stating that, if nominated, he will accept such nomination and not withdraw. But this provision, obviously, has application only to the condition existing after the primary election, at which, if at all, he will be "nominated." We need not here inquire whether the provision for this affidavit carries with it an implied prohibition against withdrawal by a candidate who has been successful in obtaining a party nomination at the primary. The Court of Appeals of Kentucky has held, under a statute very similar to ours, that a withdrawal may be made after the election. Elswick v. Ratliff, 166 Ky. 149, 179 S. W. 11. The contrary view has been expressed by the Supreme Court of Nevada. State v. Hamilton, 33 Nev. 418, 111 Pac. 1026. But, without regard to this question, it is perfectly clear that the statute does not, either in terms or impliedly, prohibit a withdrawal before the election. On the contrary, the fact that the statute in terms requires an affidavit that the candidate will not withdraw if nominated gives persuasive indication that a withdrawal before nomination (i. e., before the primary election) was contemplated by the framers of the act as authorized. And such is the holding in a late Nevada case (State v. Brodigan, 37 Nev. 458, 142 Pac. 520), in which the earlier decision in State v. Hamilton is distinguished upon this very ground.

[3] If, then, the petitioner has the right to withdraw his candidacy for the nomination, the right should be made effectual and operative, unless some insuperable obstacle intervenes. We find no such obstacle in the statute. Much stress is laid upon the fact that under section 10 of the act the county clerk or registrar is required to publish the names which appear upon the certified list transmitted to him by the secretary of state, and that this list is to contain the names "of each person for whom nomination papers have been filed in the office of such secretary of state." So, too, section 12, defining the form of ballots, provides "that the names of all candidates for the respective offices for whom nomination papers have been duly filed shall be printed thereon." Undoubtedly the county clerk acts ministerially, and the information upon which he so acts is that received by him from the secretary of state. But it does not follow that the certificate of the secretary of state must finally conclude every one with respect to the form and contents of the ballot. Section 27 of the act authorizes an application to this court, to a District Court of Appeal, or to a superior court, whenever it shall be made to appear "that an error or omission has occurred or is about to occur in the placing of any name on an official primary election ballot, that any error has been or is about to be committed in printing such ballot, or that any wrongful act has been or is about to be done by any * * * county clerk, registrar of voters * * * or other person charged with any duty concerning the primary election," and authorizes the court to order the officer or person charged with such error, wrong, or neglect to correct the error, desist from the wrongful act, or perform the duty. This is broad language, and we think it was designed to vest in the courts a broad control over all officers performing duties in connection with the primary elections. With respect to the names of the candidates to be placed upon the ballots, the remedy is not, under this section, limited to an application to compel the secretary of state to issue the proper certificate. The power of that officer to transmit certified lists of candidates expires 30 days before the primary election. After that date all duties connected with the preparation of the ballots are confided to the county clerks or registrars of voters. It cannot have been contemplated that an error or impropriety in a proposed ballot should be beyond correction after the secretary of state had once issued his certificate and the time within which he could issue a corrected certificate had expired. If he should, on the last day allowed by law, issue a certificate which omitted the name of a candidate whose name should be upon the ballot, the only possible remedy would be by application to a court for an order requiring the county clerk or registrar of voters to make the necessary correction. Just such an application is, we think, contemplated and authorized by section 27 of the act, and we think the situation is the same where, by reason of circumstances arising after the secretary of state has made his certificate, the correct form of ballot is not that indicated by his certificate.

This interpretation of the statute is in accord with the fundamental purpose of all election laws; i. e., to enable the voters to exercise a free, orderly, and intelligent choice. We can conceive of no good reason why a ballot should contain the name of a person who is not in fact a candidate for nomination, even though he may once have taken the steps which entitle him to become such candidate. The presence of his name (like that of a candidate who has died) could operate only to deprive uninformed electors of their votes, to the injury of one or more of the actual candidates, and to the possible perversion of the true popular will. We are not prepared to hold that the law requires this result. To give to the certificate of the secretary of state the conclusive effect contended for by the respondent would be to elevate form above substance. We believe, on the contrary, that the statute contemplates a submission to the electors of a choice between persons who are candidates in fact, and that where, from any cause, the ballots do not present that choice, the courts are authorized, under section 27 of the act, to direct the officials having control of the preparation of the ballots to prepare them in proper form.

It need hardly be said that an application of this kind must be made sufficiently early to enable the officials to have the necessary alterations put into effect. In the present case it appears that the time to intervene before the date of the election will be sufficient for the respondent to obey the writ which is to issue. We assume that the officials of other counties will take action in harmony with the views here expressed. If, as suggested at the hearing, it will be impossible in some instances to alter the sample ballots, the spirit of the present ruling can be carried out, as far as possible, by changing the form of the official ballots to be furnished to the voters.

A peremptory writ will issue as prayed.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; MELVIN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

SHAW, J., because of temporary absence, has not participated.

HENSHAW, J. I concur in everything that is said in the prevailing opinion. It certainly will not be questioned that an elector has the inherent right, under our system of government, of offering himself as a candidate for office, and, after having offered himself, to withdraw his name and retire from the political contest at any time that he sees fit. The sole limitation upon this unquestioned right is the limitation which may be fixed upon it by law. The only limitation which our law has seen fit to impose is that inferentially contained in the requirement of a candidate to make an affidavit that, "if nominated," he will continue his candidacy for and seek election to the office. The Legislature having seen fit thus to restrict the right of withdrawal after nomination, and having placed no restriction upon the right of withdrawal before nomination, under every canon of construction that right of withdrawal before nomination still rests with every candidate for office. Such was the unanimous view of the Supreme Court of Nevada in the case cited in the prevailing opinion. Therefore no right to withdraw his name as a candidate from the primary ballot is expressly or impliedly given to any candidate, because it is not necessary that it should be expressly or impliedly given. The right is his, unless it is taken away by positive law, and there is no positive law so doing. Nor is it necessary that there should be any specific mode prescribed by which any withdrawal can be effected. It is a reflection upon our jurisprudence to say that its general remedies are not adequate, as they were found to be by the Supreme Court of Nevada under a statute in all particulars identical with our own.

But, conceding the right of withdrawal to exist, the dissentient view is that the Legislature designed that this right should have no effect, because the law also says that county clerks shall print the "names of all candidates for the respective offices for whom nomination papers have been duly filed." Such a construction is but the veriest sticking in the bark. To attribute such a meaning to the Legislature is deliberately and unnecessarily to charge it with the design of deluding and deceiving the electors of the state. For under that construction it is not denied that it means that the name of a candidate who has died may not, even though the fact be timely and officially brought to the notice of the county clerks, be omitted from the ballot to be printed; that if the sole candidate of a political party has been convicted of a felony, and thus disqualified from holding office the Legislature designed in both such and all like cases that the name of the dead man and that the name of the felon should remain upon the ballot, notwithstanding that, if they received a majority of the votes, neither could take office, and the result would be, either that a man whom the people by their votes had not selected would fill the office, or that the state must be subjected to the added and unnecessary expense of another election. I am unwilling myself to charge the Legislature in its enactment of the primary law with any such stupidity or evil design. Nor is it necessary that this should be done, whenever, as here, notification of withdrawal, of death, or of legal disqualification to hold the office, is under timely notice officially made known to the county clerk.

The provisions of the primary law calling upon the county clerks to print upon the primary ballot the names that have been certified to them by the secretary of state by every reasonable intendment mean only that those names shall be printed unless changes shall have occurred within the contemplation of the law, such changes as in fact are contemplated and provisions for which are made by section 27 of the act quoted in the prevailing opinion, and the forced construction which unnecessarily is sought to be given to this, I repeat, convicts the Legislature, without any express language to that effect, of a design to make the primary election ridiculous, by compelling, to the deception of the voters, the retention of the name of a man who is dead or has been sent to the state prison.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. I dissent. Desirable as may appear to be the result reached by the court in this proceeding, I am unable to concur therein in view of my understanding of the meaning of the provisions of the direct primary act.

In proposing to place the name of Mr. Bordwell on the primary ballot as a candidate for the Republican nomination for United States Senator, notwithstanding his attempted withdrawal as a candidate after having regularly qualified as such, and after his name had been regularly certified by the secretary of state to the various county clerks and registrars as a candidate, the county clerk of Orange county is, in my opinion, simply proposing to follow the plain mandate of the primary act. If this be the situation, of course, we have no authority to order him to do otherwise.

The clerk is simply proposing to print on the primary ballot, as candidates for the Republican nomination for United States Senator, the names of all persons "for whom nomination papers (including the affidavit of the candidate himself stating that he desires to be a candidate) have been duly filed" (subdivision 4, § 12, Primary Act), as such names have been correctly certified to him by the secretary of state (section 10, Primary Act), and all this the primary act expressly requires him to do.

No right to withdraw his name as a candidate from the primary ballot is expressly or impliedly given any such person by any provision of the Primary Act, no mode by which any withdrawal can be effected is even suggested by any provision of the act, and I cannot read the act otherwise than as clearly contemplating that there can be no such withdrawal, and that the certificate of the secretary of state, when made in full accord with the law, is absolutely conclusive on county clerks and registrars as to the names which shall be placed on the primary ballot.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. MOORE
et al. (Civ. 1975.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 6, 1916.)

1. QUIETING TITLE — 52 — JUDGMENT—DESCRIPTION—VALIDITY.

In an action to quiet title against a city, where it was admitted in the pleadings that the precise tract of land in dispute was included within lot 8 as shown on the recorded map, a judgment adjudicating the fee to be in the plaintiff therein and that the defendant city had no interest in the land, following the description of the land designated in the complaint as "lot 8 of the additional subdivision of the Hamilton tract, as per map thereof recorded in Book 28, at page 96, Miscellaneous Records of Los Angeles county," when by reference to the map it appeared that the northerly, easterly, and southerly boundary lines were distinctly marked by continuous black lines, but that the westerly side of the lot showed two dotted lines extending between the prolongation of the northerly and southerly lines inclosing a wedge-shaped parcel varying from about 50 feet at one end to about 30 or 35 feet at the other, was not so ambiguous as to be void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 99, 102, 103; Dec. Dig. 52.]

2. JUDGMENT — 743(2) — ESTOPPEL—TITLE TO LAND.

Such judgment, from which no appeal was taken, estopped the city in its condemnation proceeding from claiming as against the successor of the plaintiff in the former action that it was the owner of the parcel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1253, 1276, 1284; Dec. Dig. 743(2).]

3. JUDGMENT — 956(2) — ESTOPPEL — EVIDENCE—PLEADINGS AND ISSUES.

Under a plea of former adjudication of title to a parcel of land involved in a city's condemnation proceeding, the pleadings and findings in an action by defendant's predecessor to quiet title against the city were admissible to illustrate the issues presented in the former suit.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Condemnation proceeding by the City of Los Angeles against Roscoe E. Moore, O. B. Carter, and others. Judgment determining title to one lot to be in defendant Carter, motion for new trial denied, and the City appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., and C. D. Pillsbury and Myron Westover, Deputy City Attys., all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Carter, Kirby & Henderson, Charles Lantz, and Davis, Lantz & Wood, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. [1, 2] This action was brought by the city of Los Angeles to condemn two certain strips of land lying on either side of Avenue 20 for the purpose of widening that thoroughfare. The only question to be considered on this appeal concerns the matter of the ownership of one parcel of land affected by the condemnation. The city of Los Angeles, the plaintiff, claimed that it was the owner of this parcel; the trial court, however, determined that the title was in respondent Carter. Carter by his answer made to the complaint pleaded a former adjudication as to this precise parcel of land had in an action in which his predecessor in interest was the plaintiff and the city of Los.

Angeles a defendant. Carter maintained, in which contention he was sustained by the trial judge, that by the judgment in the action last referred to the municipality was estopped from again litigating the question of title. In the action the judgment in which Carter pleaded in bar, and which we will hereafter refer to as the Fox Case, the plaintiff there sought to quiet his title to a lot which he designated as lot 8 of the additional subdivision of the Hamilton tract, as per map thereof recorded in Book 28, at page 96, Miscellaneous Records of Los Angeles county. The judgment followed the description of the land as contained in the complaint. By reference to the map mentioned, it is found that, while the northerly, easterly, and southerly boundary lines are distinctly marked by continuous black lines, the westerly side of the lot, instead of there being a boundary line marked in like manner as on the other sides, shows two dotted lines extending between the prolongation of the northerly and southerly boundary lines of the lot, and which dotted lines inclose a wedge-shaped parcel varying from about 50 feet at one end to about 30 or 35 feet at the other. It is this wedge-shaped piece of ground that the city claimed in this action to be the owner of. Precisely stated, the city's claim is that the judgment rendered in the Fox case, by referring to the map of the Hamilton tract for a description of the property affected, did not accurately describe any certain property, and that, because of such claimed ambiguity, the judgment could not be aided by any extraneous evidence, and could not be pleaded as a bar in estoppel of the right of the city to here again assert title. The city objected to evidence offered by Carter of the judgment roll in the Fox case, and also to the stenographic reporter's record of the testimony of a surveyor who was called upon to identify the small parcel in dispute in the Fox case. The judgment in the Fox case was not so ambiguous as to be void. It referred to the map of the tract as recorded, which map did, it is true, leave clouded in some uncertainty the exact location of the southerly boundary line of lot 8. Nevertheless, as between Fox and the city of Los Angeles, it was admitted in the pleadings in that case that the precise tract of land which is involved here was in dispute, and that it was included within lot 8 as shown on the recorded map. The city in the Fox case affirmatively alleged that the wedge-shaped tract of land was a part of lot 8, and the court found in that case that the plaintiff, Fox, was the owner of all of lot 8, and that the city was not the owner of that portion of it to which title was especially alleged as being in the city. The Fox suit brought directly in issue the matter of title to the small parcel of land, and the city, admitting in that action that the parcel was contained within lot 8, should be estopped from afterwards asserting that the judgment in the Fox case adjudicating the fee title to be in Fox, and that the city had no interest in the land, did not settle that question. There was no appeal taken in the Fox case and no effort made, so far as appears, to have that judgment revised in any way.

[3] We think that the pleadings and findings in the Fox case were proper to be introduced in evidence in this action in order to illustrate the issues presented in that prior suit. Graves v. Hebborn, 125 Cal. 400, 58 Pac. 12. On the question of estoppel, the case of People v. Holladay, 93 Cal. 241, 29 Pac. 54, 27 Am. St. Rep. 186, is in point.

The appeal taken herein was both from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Condemnation proceeding by the City of Los Angeles against Roscoe E. Moore, John Griffin Johnston, O. B. Carter, and others, with cross-complaint by Johnston against the City of Los Angeles and Carter. Judgment against cross-complainant Johnston, and for cross-defendant Carter, motion for new trial denied, and cross-complainant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Charles Lantz and Davis, Lantz & Wood, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., Myron Westover, Deputy City Atty., and Carter, Kirby & Henderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. This is an appeal taken by John Griffin Johnston, against whom judgment was entered and an order made denying his motion for a new trial. The appeal calls into question the correctness of the decision of the trial judge wherein it was determined that said appellant had no interest in an irregular plot of ground aligning Avenue 20 in the city of Los Angeles, which the city by condemnation seeks to take for the purpose of widening that thoroughfare. The trial judge determined title to be in defendant O. B. Carter. That determination on the separate appeal of the city of Los Angeles taken to this court, was affirmed in an opinion filed this day (Civil No. 1975, 159 Pac. 872).

[1] The land in question aligns a portion of the northwesterly boundary of lands patented to the city of Los Angeles. By deed made in 1863, the city of Los Angeles conveyed to John S. Griffin and J. C. Welsh a large tract of land embracing more than 2,000 acres. It was stipulated at the trial that the title to all of this land and the land in dispute was vested in the city of Los Angeles immediately prior to the making of the deed mentioned. Welsh subsequently conveyed to Griffin, and Griffin later to one Hamilton, who subdivided the land so obtained into "Hamilton's subdivision" and "Hamilton's additional subdivision." Appellant, Johnston, as the devisee under the will of John S. Griffin, claimed that the plot of land in dispute was included in the deed to Griffin and Welsh from the city, and was not included in the deed made by Griffin to Hamilton; hence that it was distributed to him under the will in the estate of Griffin. Under the stipulation made, in effect, that the title was in the city unless divested by the Griffin-Welsh deed, appellant at the trial assumed the burden of establishing that the land was located within the boundaries of the large tract conveyed to Griffin and Welsh. In order to establish the northwesterly boundaries of the plot so conveyed, it was necessary to locate the original patent boundary of the city. This boundary, as surveyed and described in the patent, starting from the northwest city patent corner, pursued a meandering course southwesterly to a point made by the junction of the Los Angeles river with the Arroyo Seco. From this point, called station 35, the line proceeded in a northwesterly meandering course, following the bed of the Los Angeles river. Station 36, being the one immediately northwest of the point station 35, was described as being at the edge of the water of the river. The river for some distance in that locality is confined on the west by a chain of hills composed in the main of a shale or rock formation. In the Griffin-Welsh deed the southerly corner of the land described was located at a monument marked by a mound of stones, the location of which the testimony showed was well known to old residents, and its location was by the testimony accurately fixed at the trial. The testimony of the surveyors who attempted to trace the lines of the Griffin-Welsh land showed that the monument mentioned at the southerly corner of the property was disregarded. The testimony also showed that, had the location of this monument been taken as a starting point and the line run northerly, the land in dispute would have been thrown without the parcel conveyed to Griffin and Welsh. The inaccuracy of the lines of these surveyors was also illustrated in the testimony by showing that, assuming the points taken by them to correctly locate stations on the northwesterly city patent line, by turning the angle at the point station 35 at the south and starting northwesterly according to the angle and call of the patent description, station 36 would not have been located in the edge of the stream of the Los Angeles river, but would have been thrown on the hillside to an elevation of 73 feet above the present river bed. The testimony showed very conclusively that the bank of the river on the west was of rocky formation, and therefore could have been affected but little in the course of years by the current of the water. These inaccuracies appearing in the surveys of the engineers who gave testimony for appellant, the trial judge held that the burden of showing that the title of the city had been divested by the Griffin-Welsh deed had not been sustained. In this conclusion we agree.

[2] It is said that defendant Carter cannot raise the question that the land was not so included in the Griffin-Welsh deed, because he affirmed in his answer that the land was so included. It is true that in one of the defenses set out Carter did make that allegation, but he expressly abandoned and disclaimed that contention at the trial, and hence we think that allegation cannot be viewed as an admission of the fact contended for. The maps made by the city covering the lands of Griffin subdivision show recognition of the "Sepulveda corner"; that being the point marked by the mound of stones hereinbefore referred to at the south line of the Griffin tract. Defendant Carter introduced in evidence, as declarations against interest, sworn statements made to the city assessor by John S. Griffin for eight different years, the first being for 1883, and the last for 1898, which statements purported to set forth all of the land owned by Griffin in the city of Los Angeles, and none of these statements described any of the land in dispute. It was not error to allow in evidence the decree in an action to quiet title brought by one Fox against the city of Los Angeles, which was introduced by Carter. That action is described in the opinion treating of the appeal of the city as against Carter. It was competent evidence against the city, and, if not relevant to the issues as between Johnston and Carter, could have no prejudicial effect, in view of the conclusion as indicated that Johnston did not sustain the burden of proof that the land in dispute was within the plot described in the Griffin-Welsh deed.

[3] Finally it is claimed on the part of appellant, Johnston, that a determination in favor of the title of Carter should only be made upon a condition for the repayment to Johnston of the sum of $284.85 which amount, prior to the trial in the action, had been assessed against the property to cover municipal sewer improvements. The payment of the claim arose in this way: There was a judgment in the superior court in a separate matter against Johnston and others amounting to the sum of $1,053.10, which Carter became the owner of by purchase. Carter caused an execution to be issued upon this judgment and a levy and sale made against any interest which Johnston might have in the land in dispute. At this sale Carter caused such interest to be struck off to the nominal party who was acting for him, for the sum of $500, which was credited upon the judgment. The sewer assessments becoming payable, Carter caused these to be paid and notified the sheriff that, if Johnston made redemption under the execution sale, these sewer assessments should be included in the redemption charge. A mortgagee of Johnston redeemed, paying the $500, and also the $284.85 required for sewer improvements. It is the latter amount that Johnston claims the court should have required by its judgment to be repaid to him. We think this contention is without merit. If Johnston, as is here determined, had no interest in the property, he was not, nor was his mortgagee, required to redeem, and if they had refused to do so the result would have been that Johnston would have had a credit of $500 on the judgment entered against him. Having chosen to redeem, speculating upon it being determined that he had some interest in the property which had been made the subject of the execution sale, he, in our view, was a voluntary actor, and a court of equity in such an action as this would not lend him any aid in the direction of recovery for the sewer assessments paid. This was not a case where Carter, as the moving party, sought to have cleared away a cloud caused by a sale or assessment against his property; the title in him, as it is now determined, was clear of any such lien, real or apparent.

Our conclusion is that the evidence fully sustains the judgment as made by the trial court; that no errors appear which warrant a new trial being granted to appellant.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PETERS v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR SAN BERNARDINO COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2122.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR — 429 — NOTICE — WAIVER OF DEFECTS.

Parties who accept and act upon notices with regard to appeal and proceedings preliminary thereto cannot on the appeal raise any question as to sufficiency of the service.

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE — 159(6) — APPEAL — BOND — JUSTIFICATION OF SURETIES — NOTICE.

When it is demanded that sureties on an appeal bond justify, under Code Civ. Proc. § 978a, requiring justification on notice within five days after such demand, it is no excuse for total failure of notice that traffic is halted by a storm, no notice having been mailed, and there being nothing to show that the notice could not have been given in some manner.

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE — 159(6) — APPEAL — BOND — JUSTIFICATION OF SURETIES — NOTICE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 978a, justification of sureties on appeal bond without notice to the adverse party is ineffective for any purpose, and the appeal must be considered as if no bond had ever been given.

Petition by S. H. Peters for a writ of certiorari to the Superior Court for San Bernardino County and J. W. Curtis, Judge, to review order denying plaintiff's motion to dismiss defendant's appeal from a judgment for plaintiff in the justice's court. Order annulled.

W. T. Craig, H. R. Archbald, and A. Henderson Stockton, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner. A. S. Maloney, of San Bernardino, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Certiorari to review proceedings had on a motion made to dismiss an appeal taken to the superior court of the county of San Bernardino from the justice's court of Colton township. In the justice's court action this petitioner was the plaintiff, and secured judgment against A. Crowell and H. C. Crowell. The defendants in that action appealed. The motion made by the petitioner in the superior court was to dismiss the appeal taken by the Crowells because the sureties on the undertaking on appeal had failed to justify upon notice to the plaintiff after exception had been taken to their sufficiency. The superior court denied the motion. We have before us the record of the proceedings and evidence heard by the superior court on which the motion was determined. It appears by the uncontradicted evidence that after the appeal was taken, and on the 10th day of January, 1916, the attorneys for the plaintiff in the justice's court action, whose offices were in the city of Los Angeles, received through the mails a copy of the notice of appeal and a copy of the bond given on appeal, with request that they acknowledge service on the notice of appeal and return the same to the justice. The attorneys for the plaintiff thereupon wrote to the attorney for the defendants-appellants, whose office was in the city of San Bernardino, acknowledging receipt of the notice of appeal and bond, and informing said attorney that they had accepted service of the notice of appeal, and returned the same to the justice of the peace, at the same time inclosing a notice of exception to the sureties on the undertaking. This letter, it was admitted, was received by the attorney addressed on January 12th. The notice of exception to sureties was filed with the justice on January 14th. In another letter received in San Bernardino on January 12th the plaintiff's attorneys stated to the opposing counsel:

"Kindly give me as much notice as possible of the date of justification of sureties."

To this letter a reply was made to the effect that the hearing of the justification of sureties would be taken up some time later in the month. On the 14th of January the San Bernardino counsel received from the plaintiff's counsel a letter in which he was advised that the plaintiff would insist upon the sureties justifying strictly in accordance with law: that is, within five days from the date of the exception.

No notice of any justification was given, but on the 18th of January the sureties appeared before the justice and justified. In excuse for not having given a notice to the plaintiff as to the time when the sureties would appear for justification, counsel for the defendants and for the respondent here set out in his affidavit made to the superior court:

"That from the 14th day of January, 1916, to the 19th day of January, 1916, a great amount of rain fell, causing floods and stopping traffic on all railroads, so that affiant was unable to mail notice of date of justification of sureties to the plaintiff and his attorneys; that affiant sought to communicate by telephone with Los Angeles, where plaintiff and plaintiff's attorneys reside, but was unable to do so on account of the severity of the storm and rainfall; that the said sureties justified before J. B. Hanna, justice of the peace of Colton township, on the 18th day of January, 1916; said sureties residing in the city of San Bernardino, were compelled to go to Colton on a switch engine on said day, being the only manner in which they could reach Colton on account of the severity of the rainfall."

[1] It therefore appears that the justification of the sureties was made wholly without any notice being given to the opposite party. So far as the service of the various notices is to be considered, we think that the parties are not entitled to raise any question as to the sufficiency of such service now, as they at the time adopted that service as sufficient and proceeded to act upon it.

[2] If circumstances existed which would excuse the appealing parties for holding the justification after the time prescribed by law, such facts are not disclosed, for it appears that no notice was attempted to be given at all; that the sureties did not justify upon notice either within or after the expiration of five days from the date of receipt of the notice of exception. The statement that traffic was delayed by reason of storms, and telephone connection with Los Angeles (where the opposing counsel resided) cut off, would not excuse the appellants from at least depositing in the mails a notice of the date when the sureties would justify; and, further, it does not appear but that by some other means of communication, telegraph or messenger, such notice might have been given and in time.

[3] The justification of the sureties taking place without notice, of course it must be considered the same as though no justification at all was had. As we have pointed out, there was no attempt at all made to have the sureties justify upon notice at any time after the exception was taken to their sufficiency; in other words, plaintiff was never afforded an opportunity to be present, as he was entitled to, at the time the sureties appeared for justification.

The undertaking on appeal, upon failure of the sureties to justify upon notice to the adverse party, became ineffectual for any purpose, and the appeal must necessarily be considered as though no undertaking had been given. Such is the express provision of section 978a, Code of Civil Procedure.

The order of the superior court denying petitioner's motion to dismiss the appeal in the justice's court action herein in the certified record referred to is annulled; petitioner to have his costs.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by S. W. Winsor against the Silica Brick Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. L. Shinn and C. L. Shinn, both of Sacramento, for appellant. Charles O. Busick and O. G. Hopkins, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. This action was brought by the plaintiff for the recovery of damages for the breach of a contract between him and the defendant. A trial by jury was had, verdict for plaintiff in the sum of $7,300 returned, and judgment entered in accordance therewith. The defendant moved for a new trial. The court made an order denying the motion, and this appeal is from said order.

The contract, for the alleged breach of which the plaintiff seeks damages through this action, was made and entered into by and between the plaintiff and the defendant on the 26th day of July, 1910. It is set out in full in the complaint. It recites and covenants that the plaintiff, party of the first part, has agreed to assign, and has assigned, to the party of the second part, the defendant, all his right, title, etc., in and to certain leases and contracts for the removal of earth and clay materials to be used in the manufacture of brick and other articles, "and has agreed to give his entire time and attention to the business of the party of the second part for a period of five years"; that in consideration therefor the defendant has given said plaintiff 30,000 shares of its capital stock, and agreed to employ the plaintiff for the term of five years at a monthly salary of $200 as a minimum, "and an additional amount equal to five per cent. of the net profits of the party of the second part over and above the first twenty-eight thousand dollars of net profits each year." The plaintiff was not only to give his exclusive time and attention to the manufacture of brick and "such other articles as the defendant may elect," and in the performance of such service was to work at such place or places, as the defendant might direct, putting in such service the best of his ability and knowledge in brick manufacture, but he was also to deliver to the defendant "all formulæ known and used by him for the manufacture of such articles as the party of the second part may desire to manufacture, and that said formulæ shall be entered upon the books of the party of the second part and shall become the property of the party of the second part during said five years." Besides some other provisions of the contract which it is not necessary specifically to refer to here, it is further agreed by the plaintiff that "during said five years he will not engage in any other business in the state of California, nor advise or assist in any manner any person or corporation that manufactures or sells articles similar to any articles manufactured by the party of the second part."

The complaint is in two counts—the one for damages for the alleged violation of the terms of the contract by the wrongful dismissal of the plaintiff by the defendant from its service, and the other for damages for the alleged failure of the defendant to pay to the plaintiff the 5 per cent. on the net profits of the corporation over and above the first $28,000 of the net profits of the concern, which profits, it is alleged, amounted in the aggregate, for the year ending with the discharge of the defendant, to the sum of $8,000, the total amount for which judgment is asked being the sum of $17,200. It may here be stated that no evidence was offered or received in support of the averments of the second count, and the same may therefore be dismissed without further notice.

The complaint avers that, upon the making of the contract, the plaintiff entered upon the performance of the terms thereof so far as it related to him, and "began the discharge of his duties thereunder, and thereafter continued such performance and to discharge said duties" until on or about the 20th day of September, 1911, when said defendant, without the consent and against the will of the plaintiff, "refused to perform said contract any longer or further in whole or in part, to any extent, or at all, and still so refuses; that this plaintiff was then and there, and has ever since been and still is, ready and willing to perform said contract fully and in all respects on his part, and ever since said 20th day of September, 1911, he has been prevented from performing said contract in any respect or at all, by reason of the aforesaid refusal and continued refusal of the defendant."

The defendant filed an answer and a cross-complaint. In the former, in addition to making specific denials of the averments of the complaint, after admitting, however, the making of the contract referred to, it set up a special defense, alleging that, after the plaintiff entered upon the discharge of his duties under said contract, it was ascertained by the defendant that the plaintiff was surreptitiously receiving commissions from persons upon sales by such persons of machinery and other supplies to the defendant for its use in its business, and that the plaintiff had not accounted to the defendant for the commissions so received; that thereupon negotiations were had between the plaintiff and the defendant looking to the cancellation of said contract, which negotiations led to an agreement between the parties on or about the 18th day of September, 1911, canceling and annulling said contract in consideration of the payment by the defendant to the plaintiff of the sum of $125, the same to be in full satisfaction of all claims against said defendant; that of the sum so agreed to be paid the plaintiff, the defendant paid him the sum of $88.90.

The cross-complaint charges that, solely by and through willful and fraudulent misrepresentations relative to the value of the leases transferred to the corporation and to the ability and experience of the plaintiff as a manufacturer of brick and other articles made out of clay, the defendant was induced to enter into the contract which is the basis of this action. As there is no evidence in the record bearing upon the charges so made, further consideration thereof is not necessary.

Although, as stated, the case was tried by a jury, the court nevertheless made specific findings against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff upon all the vital matters presented by the pleadings. These findings, in view of the submission of the issues of fact to a jury, were manifestly unnecessary.

[1] We think the complaint fails to make out a case for damages for a breach of the contract upon the part of the defendant. It will be noted that in paragraph 4 of that pleading it is alleged that the defendant refused "to perform the contract any longer or further or in whole or in part or to any extent," and still so refuses, and that the plaintiff has been prevented from performing the contract in any respect or at all by reason of the "aforesaid refusal and continued refusal of said defendant." This is the only averment in the complaint which it may be claimed charges that the plaintiff was discharged, and it is clear that it falls far short of being a direct allegation that the plaintiff was discharged from the employment of the defendant. It is not inconceivable or even improbable that an employer might, for reasons sufficient to himself, be of the opinion that it would be better for him or his business to refuse to allow an employé, under a contract with him (the employer) for personal services, to continue his labors, and still expect and intend to remain faithful to his obligation to pay such employé his compensation, as called for by the contract, as it became due. The most that can be said of the complaint is that, since the 20th day of September, 1911, the defendant had prevented the plaintiff from performing any work. This is not an averment that, at that time, or at any other time, the defendant discharged the plaintiff and refused any longer to be bound by its contract. It might, perhaps, be an averment that the corporation had refused to pay the plaintiff his monthly salary, but for this violation of the contract he would have an action for the salary due, and nothing else. He quite clearly cannot maintain an action for compensation unearned without a direct averment of discharge from employment.

The point thus considered, although necessarily raised by the demurrer, is not discussed or touched upon by counsel for the appellant in their briefs; and, while we believe it to be sufficient to warrant a reversal of the judgment, we shall, for the reason that respondent was given no opportunity to answer or discuss the point, and for the further reason that, in our opinion, the judgment cannot justly be upheld upon a consideration of the record, even upon the assumption that the complaint does state a cause of action for a breach of the contract, further consider the record and the points to which the counsel for both sides solely address their attention and the discussion in their respective briefs.

Two points are made by the defendant against the legal stability of the verdict, viz.: (1) That the alleged discharge of the plaintiff from the service of the corporation, having been the act of the secretary of said corporation, and such act not appearing to have been authorized by the corporation itself, was the exercise of a power not within the scope of the authority of the secretary. It is hence argued that the attempted discharge was none at all either in law or in fact. (2) That the evidence does not support the implied finding of the jury that the secretary discharged the defendant.

[2] We are of the opinion that the last-stated point must be sustained, and it will not be necessary, therefore, to consider the point first above stated.

The plaintiff's version of the transaction which, he claims, resulted in his dismissal from the service of the corporation, is, in substance, as follows: That, on the 17th day of September—about 14 months after he entered upon the performance of his part of the contract pleaded in the complaint—he received the following letter, signed by J. P. Dargitz, secretary of the corporation, said letter being dated at Sacramento, September 16, 1911:

"By request of the board of directors you will please report at this office before returning to the plant."

In obedience to the request so made, the plaintiff called at the office of the corporation, in the Oschner building, Sacramento, and there met Dargitz. What occurred between the plaintiff and Dargitz at that interview may best be told in the former's own language as a witness:

"I saw Mr. Dargitz. I came in and addressed him as I usually did, 'How do you do?' and I was in very much need of some money, I never had been paid up while I worked with them. I told him I had to have some money, my creditors were pressing me, I could not get any more credit, and he shook his head, he said, 'We have no money.' He took out a bank book; showed me a check book with a little red line on it; he claimed they had overdrawn their account in a Sacramento bank where they had deposited, where they had done their business, the Sacramento Valley Trust Company, I believe. He got up and motioned me to go out in the anteroom, and I followed him out there. He closed the door, he says, 'Winsor,' he says, 'I am very sorry, but we have no money any more, and we will have to let you go.' And I says, 'I am very sorry; I got to get my money; don't I get any money here?' He says, 'We have not got it, but I can give—I will give you some money if you will release that contract.' I said, 'Let's see your money.' He said, 'Well, I will have to get it from Mr. Pierce; excuse me a moment.' He opened the door, went into the room, came out with a typewritten sheet, and said, 'If you will sign that, I will get the money from Mr. Pierce.' I read the document over, and it was an agreement that I was to relinquish all claims and release the Silica Brick Company for the sum of $125. I told Mr. Dargitz that I could not sign it. He said, 'I can get that amount through the courtesy of Mr. Pierce.' I said, 'I will think it over,' and walked out of the office and never went back. I never had any conversation with him concerning the cancellation or surrender of the contract at any time after that or before."

A few days thereafter, the plaintiff received from Dargitz the following letter, which was dated at Sacramento, September 20, 1911:

"As per your agreement with me, Monday, the 18th, I am now ready to hand you check and settle contract. The company hereby releases you from any further services in its behalf. This will enable you to seek employment elsewhere."

The plaintiff further testified that at one time he was a member of the defendant's board of directors; that he had received from the corporation 30,000 shares of its capital stock; that the plant was "shut down" for a while during the course of his directorship, but resumed operations thereafter; that again it stopped operations, and at this time he was no longer a director; that when it "shut down" on the last occasion it seemed to him "that the plant was not going to reopen again." He testified:

"I have been willing and ready at all times since the execution of this contract to comply with the terms of the contract."

The plaintiff himself was the only witness who gave testimony in his own behalf, and the foregoing constitutes a fair résumé of the only testimony offered and received upon the question of his alleged discharge by the defendant.

As explanatory of the language of the letter last above presented herein, Dargitz testified that, in the conversation referred to by the plaintiff in his testimony, the important part of which is given above, the plaintiff said to the witness that:

He "was very anxious to know what was going to be done out there" (referring to the plant); that he (plaintiff) "had been laboring under uncertainties so long that he wanted to have some definite idea what was going to be done, and he wanted me to tell him what condition the company was in, and whether the thing was going ahead. I told him that it was very doubtful, that the company never had been financed, and was not financed then, and heavily indebted. He said that he had an opportunity to get a good position with N. Clark & Sons in Alameda, and if this thing was not going to go pretty quick, he wanted to take advantage of that position, and that he would like to quit if this was still uncertain. I replied that my candid and confidential advice to him would be to accept that position, as this was still very uncertain; and he wanted to know if the company would release him, and I said I thought they would."

The testimony so given by Dargitz was not in any manner or degree contradicted by the plaintiff, although he was recalled to the witness stand in rebuttal after Dargitz gave said testimony.

It is very apparent that the letter addressed by Dargitz to the plaintiff under date of September 20, 1911, is not so phrased as to constitute it a clear and an unequivocal act of dismissal. Upon its face it is capable of the construction that by it the defendant did not intend peremptorily to discharge the plaintiff, but intended it to mean simply this: That the company was willing to release the plaintiff from his obligations under the contract, and so afford him an opportunity to secure employment elsewhere, it being left to the plaintiff to elect whether he would or would not accept the release. This, we say, is a meaning which may reasonably be attached to the letter when construed according to its face or without reference to matters extrinsic thereto. But, when construed by the light of the testimony of Dargitz, and even that of the plaintiff himself, it becomes absolutely certain that the meaning and intent of the letter is as it is so given. The latter testified, it will be remembered, that, after Dargitz proposed to him that the company would pay him the sum of $125 in consideration of the cancellation of the contract, he finally replied, "I will think it over," and thereupon he left the company's office and did not return. This reply, together with the fact, to which the plaintiff himself testified, that the plant was closed down, and "seemed that it was not going to reopen again," was reasonably sufficient to justify Dargitz in at least believing that the proposition so made was not, or would not be, wholly unsatisfactory to the plaintiff, and that one of the objects which the latter was then seeking to accomplish was to secure release from the obligations of the contract.

If, however, there still remains some reason for doubting what the true intention of the company was in addressing said letter to the plaintiff, then a consideration of the testimony of Dargitz (and there is no substantial reason why in this connection that portion of his testimony explaining the language and the purpose of the letter should not be considered, since it was not contradicted), will well-nigh conclusively show that the letter was not intended as a peremptory dismissal of the plaintiff from the service of the company, but merely to release him from the burdens of the contract so that he might be given free and full opportunity to seek and accept other employment. Dargitz testified, as we have shown, that, in the conversation with the plaintiff on the 18th of September, or three or four days prior to the receipt of the letter in question by the plaintiff, the latter declared that he then had an opportunity to obtain employment with a firm in Alameda, and asked Dargitz if he (the latter) thought the company would release him (plaintiff) from the contract, and that Dargitz replied that he thought it would. Thus it is very clear that Dargitz had reason to say to the plaintiff that he was released from his contract with the company without being actuated by any motive or intention of discharging the plaintiff and so abandoning the contract. That Dargitz, when writing the letter, had in his mind the previous conversation with the plaintiff, regarding the question whether the company would be willing to release the latter from the obligations of the contract, is plainly evidenced by the suggestion in said letter, "This will enable you to seek employment elsewhere."

In considering Dargitz's testimony for the purpose of ascertaining the intent and scope of the letter, we have not been unmindful of the rule that it must be assumed, as a general proposition, that the evidence introduced by the vanquished party in opposition to that upon which the verdict has been founded was, for sufficient reasons, repudiated or disregarded by the jury. In this instance, however, there are several considerations which will justify an appellate court in taking into account, in passing upon the question whether the jury were warranted in reaching the verdict returned, the testimony of the party by whom the issue has been lost. First among these is the fact, as before suggested, that the testimony of Dargitz or the verity thereof was not directly or expressly contradicted by the plaintiff. The second is that the testimony of Dargitz has every appearance of being probable, since it explains why he uses in the letter language indicating that the company was willing to release the plaintiff from and not itself abandon the contract or peremptorily discharge the plaintiff, regardless of its obligation to give him employment for the full term of five years at the stipulated salary. As seen, Dargitz, in explaining why he addressed the letter to the plaintiff in the language in which it was phrased, testified that the latter in effect stated to him in the conversation previously had between them that he could secure employment with N. Clark & Sons of Alameda, if the company would release him from any further obligation of proceeding with the performance of the contract on his part. The fact that Dargitz, in his testimony, named the firm by which the plaintiff declared to him that he had an opportunity to be employed is significant, inasmuch as the plaintiff, having been recalled to the witness stand after the defendant had rested its case, had absolutely nothing to say about N. Clark & Sons, not denying that he referred to said firm in his conversation with Dargitz, a denial which undoubtedly he would not have neglected to make had the fact been a mere figment of the latter's mind or without foundation. But, whatever might have been the intent and purpose of the letter, it must be readily apparent upon a reading of the letter that it was so vague and uncertain in that regard as not to have justified the plaintiff, without making further investigation to ascertain its real import, in treating it as an unconditional and peremptory dismissal.

[3] While the complaint alleges that the plaintiff was willing and ready to perform the contract in all respects, but that he was prevented from so doing by the acts and conduct of the defendant, there is absolutely no testimony in the record that he presented himself to the defendant and offered to perform his part of the contract after the receipt of the letter of September 20, 1911. On the contrary, he himself testified that he never had any conversation with Dargitz, "concerning the cancellation or surrender of the contract at any time" after the conversation, which was had just previously to the receipt of said letter. Nor is there any testimony, other than whatever in that direction may be extracted from the letter itself, that the defendant prevented the plaintiff from proceeding with the execution of the terms of the contract on his part. It is true that he testified, as he pleaded, that he was ready and willing at all times to carry out his part of the agreement, but we think that he ought to have shown that he unequivocally manifested to the defendant such readiness and willingness. In other words, we think that, since the letter announcing his release from the contract did not involve a clear and an unequivocal act of dismissal, he should have shown that by some affirmative act on his part he manifested to the company that he did not acquiesce in the proposition contained in the letter, and did not desire to be released from the contract. This he could have done by presenting himself to the defendant as ready and willing to proceed with the performance of the contract. Olmstead v. Bach, 78 Md. 132, 27 Atl. 501, 22 L. R. A. 74, 44 Am. St. Rep. 273, 275. Of course, if, after so presenting himself and offering to go on with his work, the plaintiff had been prevented by the defendant from proceeding, with an intention in the latter not to pay him the stipulated salary, he then would have been entitled to bring his action for a breach of the contract, as it would be a useless and futile act to continue so to present himself and offer to proceed with the performance of the contract after the defendant had positively refused to permit him to do so. De Camp v. Hewitt, 11 Rob. (La.) 290, 43 Am. Dec. 204. Or, if the act of the defendant had constituted a clear, unequivocal, and unconditional and peremptory discharge of the plaintiff, then, perhaps, the latter need not have presented himself and offered to continue with the performance of the contract; such dismissal being itself a sufficient prevention of the performance of the contract by the defendant.

Our conclusion is, however, that, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, the plaintiff did not do all that was required of him to entitle him to institute and maintain an action for his compensation under the terms of the contract for the whole of the unexpired term thereof. Indeed, assuming that the complaint states a cause of action, we believe that the plaintiff has failed to sustain the allegations thereof, inasmuch as there is no substantial evidence, either express or constructive, or, to state it in the strict language of the law of evidence, either direct or inferential, to support the averment that the defendant prevented the plaintiff from proceeding with the performance of the contract on his part.

It is hardly necessary to suggest that, in the consideration of the points upon which we feel impelled to reverse the case, we have assumed without deciding that the secretary of the corporation, Dargitz, was duly vested with authority to discharge the plaintiff.

The order appealed from is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Suit by the S. E. Slade Lumber Company against Oscoe E. Derby and wife. From judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Oliver Ellsworth, of San Francisco, and Snook & Church, of Oakland, for appellants. Corbet & Selby, of San Francisco, and Fitzgerald & Abbott, of Oakland, for respondents.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. The plaintiff, as a judgment creditor of the defendant Oscoe E. Derby, brought this suit in equity to have declared void a transfer of 99 shares of the capital stock of the Derby Estate Company (a corporation), made by said Oscoe E. Derby to his wife, the defendant Mary L. Derby. As grounds for the relief asked the plaintiff alleged that said transfer was made without consideration, at a time when the defendant Oscoe was indebted to the plaintiff in a large amount, and to others; that the gift of the shares of stock in said corporation was made by said defendant Oscoe to his wife for the purpose of and with the intent to hinder and defraud his creditors, and particularly this plaintiff, in contemplation of insolvency and while the said defendant was insolvent. The findings of the trial court were in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, and a decree was given and made declaring said transfer to be void as to the plaintiff creditor, and said 99 shares of the capital stock of the Derby Estate Company subject to the payment of the plaintiff's judgment. The appeal is from the judgment, and also from an order denying a motion for a new trial. For brevity the defendant Oscoe E. Derby will be referred to as the defendant.

The principal point relied upon by appellants for a reversal is the claim made that the findings of the court are not supported by the evidence. The record is quite large, and it is impossible, in an opinion of reasonable length, to review all the testimony. The following salient facts may be stated in narrative form and give a general impression of the situation: In the year 1883 one E. M. Derby, the father of the defendant, died. After the settlement of his estate in the probate court and in the year 1890 his heirs formed the corporation Derby Estate Company, to take over and manage all the property of the estate of E. M. Derby except his interest in the lumber business. To it was transferred all the estate property, with the above exception, and the stock of the corporation, 600 shares, was issued as follows: 300 shares to Nancy M. Derby, widow of the deceased; 100 shares to the defendant, a son of the deceased; 100 shares to Augustus B. Derby, a son of deceased; 95 shares to Lizzie D. Harmon, a daughter of deceased; and 5 shares to her husband, A. K. P. Harmon.

At the time of his death E. M. Derby was engaged in the lumber business with one G. H. Payne, and the business was conducted after his death by his family and said Payne, until December 13, 1891, at which time the E. M. Derby & Co. corporation was formed, and all the property and assets connected with the lumber business transferred to it. The 600 shares capital stock of the last-named corporation were issued to the following persons: 200 shares to O. E. Derby; 201 shares to A. B. Derby; 197 shares to George H. Payne; one share to Nancy M. Derby; and one share to Lizzie D. Harmon—the stock having a par value of $100 per share, and the capital stock being $60,000. George H. Payne died at some date prior to January, 1909.

After the creation of the E. M. Derby & Co. corporation, it conducted a large lumber business in Alameda county. In the course of its business it bought much lumber from the plaintiff and from E. J. Dodge Company, a corporation. The purchases from the plaintiff from January 25, 1907, to January 13, 1909, amounted to $96,196.02, and during the same period payments were made from time to time which left a balance due the plaintiff on the last-named date of about $72,000, and after that date lumber was sold by the plaintiff to said corporation amounting to $10,689.09. The defendant was legally liable as a stockholder for the payment of one-third of this indebtedness. He testified that he was aware of his stockholder's liability. The witness George T. Klink, an accountant appointed by the court to investigate the condition of E. M. Derby & Co.'s affairs, presented an itemized statement which showed that the corporation in its business transactions had been losing, recently, large sums of money. His report showed that during the year 1908 there was an actual loss of at least as much as $22,000, and in addition to this there was written off the books, uncollectable notes, $10,914.79, and $14,000 of accounts deemed worthless. These notes and accounts were the accumulations of several years. The result of this witness' investigations was that, on January 13, 1909, the E. M. Derby & Co. corporation had assets of the total value of $187,781.76 and liabilities amounting to $177,598.76, leaving a book excess of assets of only about $11,000. Counsel, in trying to show on the one side that the corporation was solvent and on the other that it was insolvent, have presented other figures which it would be necessary to consider if we were at this point endeavoring to show solvency or insolvency. But as, for present purposes, we are only presenting figures to show that the corporation had a large indebtedness as compared with its assets, the above figures are sufficient for the purpose.

On January 13, 1909, the defendant made a gift to his wife, the other defendant, of his 99 shares of the corporate stock of the Derby Estate Company, being the shares of stock involved in this litigation. The evidence shows it had a value of about $25,000. Prior to that time, and on the 16th day of November, 1908, the defendant gave to plaintiff a written option by which he offered to transfer to plaintiff all his stock in the E. M. Derby & Co. corporation in consideration that plaintiff would assume all of his liabilities entailed by the stock; "the idea of the above proposition being that myself and brother will be willing to release all claims to our holdings in E. M. Derby & Co. if you will assume all liabilities thereof." On May 24, 1909, the defendant transferred all his stock in the E. M. Derby & Co. to Miss G. V. Rose, a stenographer in the office of his attorney. This transfer was made without consideration—a gift.

January 15, 1909, the defendant deeded to his mother real estate worth $8,000, and she, on the same day, conveyed it to the Derby Estate Company. By these two deeds and the previous transfer of defendant's stock in the Derby Estate Company to his wife she got the full benefit of the transfer of the real estate.

August 11, 1909, E. M. Derby & Co. transferred all its real and personal property to J. F. Carlston and Oliver Ellsworth in trust for its creditors. September 8, 1909, all the real estate of E. M. Derby & Co. and of the defendant was attached on claims held by Central Bank and Rogers, amounting to $55,000, and sold under execution. The defendant, in addition to his stockholder's liability in E. M. Derby & Co., had indorsed notes for said company amounting to $55,000, and was individually liable thereon. He also owed his sister, Mrs. Harmon, $12,000, secured by mortgage on certain real estate. He also owed one-third of an indebtedness of the E. M. Derby Co. to E. J. Dodge Co. of $10,770.40; his proportion thereof being $3,569.12. After the transfer of all of the assets of the E. M. Derby & Co. to J. F. Carlston and Oliver Ellsworth, trustees in trust for the creditors of the corporation made, as above stated, on August 11, 1909, the plaintiff received from said trustees different sums of money which were credited on the indebtedness of E. M. Derby & Co. to it. These payments, together with other money secured between January 13, 1909, and August 11, 1909, reduced the indebtedness of E. M. Derby & Co. to the plaintiff to $36,187.21. On April 13, 1910, the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant to recover, upon his stockholder's liability, his proportion of the above indebtedness, and on July 29, 1910, secured a judgment therein against the defendant for the sum of $12,358.40. On May 10, 1910, the plaintiff, having obtained an assignment to it of the claim of E. J. Dodge Co. against E. M. Derby & Co., brought an action against the defendant to recover judgment against him for his proportion thereof as a stockholder and on July 29, 1910, recovered a judgment against him for $3,671.09. Upon these two judgments last mentioned the plaintiff brings this suit as a judgment creditor to set aside the transfer of the 99 shares of stock of E. M. Derby Estate Company by defendant to his wife. The figures hereinbefore given may not in all cases be wholly accurate, but they are sufficiently accurate for present purposes.

The foregoing statement does not contain a recital of all the facts proved tending to support plaintiff's case. In fairness to the defendant, it should be stated that on the trial he gave more or less plausible reasons and explanations for the various transfers of property made by him, but the trial judge was at liberty not to accept them at their face value, and evidently did not.

[1] We think this bare recital of the history of events, with the inferences that may legitimately and properly be drawn therefrom, show that the court had ample justification for its finding that the gift of the 99 shares of stock was made with intent to hinder and delay the creditors of defendant in collecting their debts. In fact, it is difficult to see what other conclusion could properly be reached.

The defendant owned one-third of the stock of a corporation engaged in the active business of buying and selling lumber. It was losing money rapidly, the year before the stock was transferred to his wife having lost $20,000, or one-third of the amount for which it was capitalized. The defendant was fully aware of the condition of the company. It was, as counsel express it, a "sinking ship," and defendant fully realized and appreciated the situation—so much so that, in November, 1908, he offered, in connection with his brother, to transfer to the plaintiff all his stock in the corporation if plaintiff would assume all of his liabilities entailed by the stock. One witness testified that, in addition to the transfer of all his stock to get released from his stockholder's liability, the defendant and his brother also offered to transfer to plaintiff their personal real estate holdings, valued at $38,000. This was denied by defendant, but, for aught we know, the court may have believed the witness. This conduct shows exactly what the defendant believed to be the condition of the company, and gives an insight, and a clear one, into his state of mind and desires. Not having made the suggested deal with the plaintiff, in January, 1909, he gave to his wife the stock in dispute. Next he deeded to his mother certain real estate without consideration, and next made a stenographer in the office of his attorney a present of all of his stock in E. M. Derby & Co.; and all these things were being done when he was largely indebted as herein indicated. But one inference can be properly drawn from this conduct.

[2] We deem it unnecessary to go into a close mathematical calculation to figure out on a close margin whether the defendant at the time of the transfer might have had a small excess of assets above his liabilities. A solvent person may transfer property with intent to hinder his creditors, as well as one who is insolvent.

"It is obvious, therefore, that the question upon which the case must turn is whether the conveyance is in fraud of the rights of the plaintiff as a creditor. This, under our statute, is a question of fact (Civ. Code, § 3442); that is to say, a question of intent." Knox v. Blanckenburg, 28 Cal. App. 301, 152 Pac. 60.

It is not often that direct proof of fraud can be obtained. People do not in such cases proclaim their intent. It can only be referred in most cases from all the attending facts, circumstances, and conditions and by ascribing to the conduct of people those motives which would ordinarily be the motives of others doing like things under like circumstances.

[3] Appellant assigns as error the admission in evidence of judgment, writs, and execution in the suit brought by plaintiff to obtain the judgment, the foundation of the suit. To enable the plaintiff to maintain this suit, it was necessary for him to show that he was a judgment creditor, and that he had exhausted his legal remedies to obtain satisfaction of his judgment. Some other objections are raised as to the admission of testimony, but, as most of them had a bearing upon the question of insolvency, they need not be further considered. In this class of cases a wide latitude is permissible.

"In litigations of the class under consideration, great latitude should undoubtedly be allowed in regard to the admission of circumstantial evidence for the purpose of proving participation in manifest fraud. Objections to testimony as irrelevant are not favored in such cases, since the force of circumstances depends so much upon their number and connection. The evidence should be permitted to take a wide range, as in most cases fraud is predicated on circumstances, and not upon direct proof." Bush & Mallett Co. v. Helbing, 134 Cal. 676, 66 Pac. 967.

We are of the opinion that the finding of the court that said 99 shares of stock were transferred by the defendant to his wife in fraud of the rights of his creditors, and especially of the plaintiff, is sustained by the evidence.

Finding no reversible error, the judgment and order are affirmed.

Under Const. art. 11, § 9, providing that the compensation of any county or town officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office, a township justice of the peace is an "officer," and where he assumed his office in January, 1915, he was not entitled to the greater compensation provided by the act effective August 8, 1915 (St. 1915, p. 1029).

Petition by John B. Cox for writ of mandate against William C. Jerome, as Auditor of the County of Orange, State of California. Prayer for peremptory writ denied.

JAMES, J. Petition for writ of mandate to require respondent, as auditor of the county of Orange, to issue to petitioner certain warrants upon the treasury of the county, in payment of money which it is alleged is due to petitioner for official services performed as justice of the peace of Santa Ana township. An answer was filed raising issues of law only, and the matter has been submitted for decision.

At the time petitioner assumed office in January, 1915, the law provided that justices of the peace should receive from the county for services rendered in criminal cases the sum of $75 per month. On the 8th day of August, 1915, an enactment of the Legislature (St. 1915, p. 1032) became of effect which provided that in counties of the fourteenth class and in townships having a population of 15,000 or over, the justices of the peace should receive for services rendered in criminal cases the sum of $100 per month. The township in which petitioner was acting was found by the census taken to contain over 15,000 inhabitants, and his claim was thereafter made for compensation at the increased rate. The vital question presented is as to whether, under the constitutional prohibition against increase of compensation during the term of office of certain officials, petitioner shall have the benefit of the larger amount for his services in criminal cases. Section 9 of article 11 of the Constitution provides as follows:

"The compensation of any county, city, town, or municipal officer shall not be increased after his election or during his term of office. * * *

It is argued that a township justice of the peace is neither a county, city, town, nor municipal officer, and that therefore there is no constitutional restraint placed upon the Legislature to increase the compensation of such justice at any time. The Legislature is required, under the direction of section 4 of article 11 of the Constitution, to establish a system of county governments which shall be uniform throughout the state. It is in that section also provided that the Legislature may provide for township organization. But no township organization, within the meaning of the section referred to, has been established. While the Legislature has from time to time, by various general laws and statutes known as county government acts, provided for a uniform government of the counties and subdivisions therein, it has been held that the townships mentioned in such acts have no governmental machinery or officers so distinct from the county as to identify such townships as being possessed of functions designed to be possessed by "township organization," referred to in section 4 of article 11, above cited. In Ex parte Wall, 48 Cal. 279, 17 Am. Rep. 425, it was held that the Legislature did not, when they divided the county into townships, create "town governments." It was there said:

"The townships have neither been given personality nor any other of the attributes of a corporation; no official has been named empowered to call the inhabitants or voters together for the purposes of consultation and joint action; no act has been passed providing for any presiding officer, or regulating the mode of conducting business, or of declaring the result of the action of the inhabitants or voters when assembled. * * *

It would then appear that in the classification of township justices of the peace these officials either must be referred to as officers of the county, or become some species of state officers. Under the Constitution as it is now written justices of the peace are not specifically mentioned as belonging to the judicial department of the state; such judicial power is declared to consist of the Senate, the Supreme Court, district courts of appeal, superior courts, "and such inferior courts as the Legislature may establish in any incorporated city or town, township, county, or city and county." In the case of People v. Cobb, 133 Cal. 74, 65 Pac. 325, the question as to whether a city justice of the peace was a city or a county officer was discussed, and while not given precise definition in the decision, the court there said:

"It may be admitted that city justices of the peace do not come, or at least do not altogether come, within the category of county or township officers; but it is equally clear that they do not come altogether within that of city officers. They cannot, therefore, strictly speaking, be said to be either county officers or city officers, for that would imply that they were exclusively such; but without much impropriety they may be said to be either. * * * More accurately speaking, they, as well as county justices, form part of the judicial system of the state. * * * It does not follow, however, from the peculiar nature of their offices, that justices of the peace or other judicial officers do not constitute part of county or city governments."

This decision also affirms the propriety of including provisions affecting justices of the peace in the county government acts. In reason at least there would seem to be no sound basis for declaring that township justices of the peace were not intended to be affected by the provisions of section 9, art. 11, of the Constitution in the matter of increasing their compensation during their terms of office. The Legislature has not seen fit to provide for separate township government. The court intimates in the Cobb Case, supra, that a city justice of the peace possesses in some measure qualities of a county officer. In cases in which the question as to the right to increase the compensation of justices or constables was involved, and there have been several, it has never been denied that the provisions of section 9 of article 11 affect these officers, and the Supreme Court has so assumed, without any suggestion that the subject was open for debate. We refer to Smith v. Mathews, 155 Cal. 752, 103 Pac. 199, and Crockett v. Mathews, 157 Cal. 153, 106 Pac. 575.

We are not disposed to discuss other questions presented by counsel for respondent in opposition to the prayer of the petition. Our conclusion is that petitioner, as justice of the peace of Santa Ana township, is one of the officers mentioned in the constitutional provision cited, which forbids an increase in the compensation paid to him during his term of office.

The prayer for a peremptory writ is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by I. W. Gleason and wife against C. J. Proud. Judgment for defendant, motion for new trial denied, and plaintiff's appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

Harold A. Gilman, Tanner, Taft & Odell, and Tanner, Odell, Odell & Taft, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Victor T. Watkins, Thorpe & Hanna, Joseph Musgrove, and Charles W. Lyon, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action to enforce an alleged right of rescission of a contract and exchange of property between plaintiffs and defendant. The plaintiffs appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The alleged misrepresentations relate to bonds of the Bisbee Light & Power Company, an Arizona corporation, which were transferred by defendant to plaintiff I. W. Gleason as the principal part of the consideration given by Proud for the property conveyed to him by Gleason. The transaction took place in September and October, 1908. Respondent, Proud, had acquired these bonds a few weeks before that time by transfer from A. W. McPherson and W. F. Nordholt in consideration of real property conveyed to them by Proud. In that transaction one H. A. Landwehr had acted as an agent for Proud, and in that way had acquired some knowledge concerning the Bisbee bonds and Proud's ownership thereof.

In the original complaint filed in this action it was alleged that the defendant made certain representations of fact upon which the plaintiffs relied, and that such representations were false; also that the defendant concealed certain material facts which, if they had been known to plaintiffs, would have caused the plaintiffs to refuse to enter into the contract. At the trial the evidence wholly failed to establish any intentional misrepresentations or concealments of fact made by the defendant or his agent. Without abandoning their claim that the representations complained of were known by the defendant and his agents to be false, the plaintiffs at the trial further amended their complaint by alleging that the defendant was not, nor were his agents, warranted in making said assertions or statements by the information they possessed when the same were made, although they may have believed them to be true. Presumably this amendment was made to bring the case within the terms of the definition of actual fraud contained in section 1572 of the Civil Code; whereby actual fraud consists of certain acts and circumstances, one of which is "the positive assertion, in a manner not warranted by the information of the person making it, of that which is not true, though he believes it to be true."

The plaintiffs do not base their action upon any representations made personally by the defendant. Their claim is that Landwehr was Proud's agent, and that Landwehr made or caused to be made the representations upon which they relied. On this appeal it is contended that the court erred in sustaining objections to questions asked of the witness Landwehr designed to show the fact of his agency by proving declarations made by him as to the person for whom he was acting; also that the court erred in holding that there was not sufficient evidence to show that Landwehr was the agent of Proud, and in refusing to permit evidence to be introduced relating to the untruthfulness of the representations which he made or caused to be made.

In view of our conclusion upon another phase of the case, hereafter to be stated, it will not be necessary to discuss these alleged errors; and for the purposes of the argument we shall assume, without deciding, that Landwehr was the agent of Proud, and that the facts which the plaintiffs sought to prove to be untrue were, in fact, untrue. For if Landwehr, acting on behalf of the defendant, did not make the representations complained of, or did not cause the plaintiffs to rely upon any representations as coming from him or vouched for by him, then plaintiffs cannot maintain this action. There is no substantial conflict in the evidence in this case. The defendant was content to submit the case upon the testimony of the plaintiffs and their witnesses.

When respondent was negotiating the exchange by which he acquired the Bisbee bonds, the parties with whom he was transacting that business furnished him two letters purporting to state facts concerning the Bisbee bonds and their value. These letters were dated August 27, 1908, were addressed to H. A. Landwehr, one of them was signed by A. W. McPherson, and the other by Bank of Santa Monica, per H. J. Englebrecht, cashier. In the course of the negotiations leading to the transactions involved in the present action, Landwehr delivered these letters to Mr. Gleason, and Mr. Gleason, besides reading those letters, had personal interviews with Mr. Englebrecht, and also with Mr. Nordholt. These letters contained all of the information that Landwehr or the defendant Proud had concerning the bonds, and it is upon the falsity of the statement of facts therein contained that the plaintiffs rely. To ascertain the circumstances under which these letters were received by Gleason, we will take his own testimony:

"At the time when Mr. Landwehr gave those letters, he said that they were the letters that had been delivered to him in connection with this deal between Mr. Proud and McPherson and Nordholt, describing the bonds in that deal. He asked me to go down and have a talk with Mr. Englebrecht. * * * These letters were written to Mr. Landwehr in connection with that deal, less than a month before. The letters themselves show that that was the purpose."

Again he testified, referring to Landwehr, as follows:

"I don't think he said anything about knowing anything about the bonds himself. I don't remember that he said that this was the information he had on it; he said this was the information he did have. I don't think he said that was all the information he had. He did not profess to know anything about it himself; as a matter of fact, he did not tell me to investigate for myself. He told me to investigate these men."

Again he said:

"Mr. Proud made no representations except through his agents, the persons that I have spoken of, Mr. Landwehr, and the other parties that made the representations that induced me to make a trade of my property. The letters and the statements of McPherson and Nordholt induced me to part with my property to Mr. Proud. If it had not been for those letters, I would never have parted with the property."

And again:

"He did not profess to know anything superior to the evidence that he had put up to me. That was far superior to anything he might have. I did not consider any opinion that he might have. He had an opinion. He said he thought that it was all right. He did not say that he based his information upon anything other than the representations that he had from these men who wrote the letters. I believe he gave me all the information he had."

It will be noted that Landwehr did not make any positive assertions with respect to the facts contained in those letters, and did not even vouch for the writers of the letters. He advised appellants to investigate the men who wrote the letters, and appellants acted upon that advice. Being acquainted with Mr. Bittinger, an officer in the First National Bank of Los Angeles, appellant I. W. Gleason inquired of Mr. Bittinger, asking if he knew Mr. Englebrecht and if he could rely upon a letter of that kind; to which Mr. Bittinger replied that he did know Englebrecht and he was a good fellow, and Bittinger did not think he would write a letter of that kind, unless he knew the facts contained in it to be true. It was after receiving that assurance that appellant went to see Mr. Englebrecht, and in conversation with him obtained further statements favorable to the bonds.

[1, 2] We entirely agree with counsel for appellants in their contention that a contracting party is entitled to rely on the express statement of an existing fact, the truth of which is known to the opposite party and unknown to him, as the basis of a mutual agreement, and that he is under no obligation to investigate and verify the statements to the truth of which the other party to the contract, with full means of knowledge, has deliberately pledged his faith. Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 395, 92 Pac. 1011. But the facts of this case are not such as to make those principles applicable here. There is a total absence of express statement or positive assertion of the alleged untrue facts by Landwehr. There is a further total absence of relationship between respondent and the writers of those letters, or of any voucher for the reliability of those persons either by the respondent or his agent, such as would be necessary before making the respondent responsible for their statements.

Without regard to other questions discussed in the briefs, it thus clearly appears upon the record that plaintiffs are not entitled to recover.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by David Myers and wife against Wesley Williams. From the judgment and order denying motion for new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

G. W. Wickliffe, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Thorpe & Widney, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. The suit was one whereby it was sought to forfeit defendant's rights under a contract for the sale of real property and to recover possession of said realty. The agreement dated September 25, 1911, fixed the price of the land at $2,800. There was to be a payment of $20 at the date of the agreement and $20 on the first of each month beginning November 1, 1911, for one year, after which, beginning November 1, 1912, the monthly payments were to be $25 each. The contract provided for the payment of interest, which was first to be taken from the monthly installments, the residue to be applied upon the principal. There was also a provision that if the vendee failed to pay any installment when due, the vendors should be released from all obligation to convey, and the purchaser's rights should be forfeited. Time was made of the essence of the contract. The monthly payments were made for more than a year, but no installment was paid on time. In each instance the vendors accepted tender of the money after it became due. The installment of $25 due January 1, 1913, was not paid until February 10, 1913. From this payment at the request of Williams, who was so bound under the agreement, the taxes were paid, leaving a balance to be applied on the purchase price. On March 19, 1913, the vendee paid $7.30 and on the 24th of the same month $7. These payments were accepted. On April 1, 1913, another installment became due and on the following day Williams tendered $40, which plaintiffs refused to accept. They immediately employed an attorney, and on April 9th instituted this suit, which was successful in the superior court.

Appellant presents three reasons, each of which he says will justify a reversal of the judgment. He says that: (1) The complaint does not contain averments of facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; that (2) plaintiffs, by the acceptance of many installments after they became due and by the crediting of defendant with sums less than the indebtedness under the terms of the agreement, had waived the right of forfeiture; and that (3) after said alleged forfeiture plaintiffs did not give defendant a definite and specific notice of their intention strictly to enforce the terms of the contract, and defendant therefore was not in default when the action was commenced.

[1] Appellant's objection to the complaint is that it failed to allege that plaintiffs had given defendant a proper and timely notice of their intention to exact a forfeiture. That pleading set forth the substance of the contract and also pleaded it in hæc verba. It then alleged the payment of $20 on the first day of each month from November 1, 1911, to October 1, 1912, and the sum of $25 on the 1st days, respectively, of November and December, 1912. In other words, from the complaint it appears that the terms of the agreement of sale were regularly and timely followed until the end of the year 1912. There are further allegations that $3.88 of the principal and $13.48 of interest were paid on January 1, 1913, $7.30 by way of interest on March 19th and $7 also as interest on March 24th. It is averred that at divers times since the 1st day of February, 1913, and prior to the commencement of the action, plaintiffs had demanded payment of the moneys due under the contract, but that defendant had refused to comply with such demands. The complaint contains the further averment that on or about the 2d day of April, 1913, plaintiffs notified defendant that they intended to exercise their option to declare the contract at an end, etc. As a pleading the complaint does aver that defendant was given proper and timely notice, and it is not vulnerable to the objection urged against it by him.

Mrs. Myers, the only witness who testified on behalf of plaintiffs, said that the January payment in 1913 was not made until February 10th, when Mr. Williams paid $25, obtaining a receipt for that amount. Out of this, by agreement, the taxes were paid, and Mr. Williams was given credit in the copy of the contract for $3.80 principal and $13.48 interest, leaving a balance due on the principal for January of $7.64. She also testified that on March 19th Mr. Williams paid $7.30, and $7 was paid on March 24th. She said that on April 2, 1913, Mrs. Williams, the wife of defendant, offered to pay some money on the contract. "I refused to accept any money," said the witness, "and told her the matter would be placed in the hands of our attorney."

Mr. Williams testified that his wife took $40 to the home of the plaintiffs. Later on the same day he went to the office of the attorney for the plaintiffs and offered to pay $40, which the attorney refused to accept. "I went there to make the payment," he testified, "because the Myerses told me they had put the matter in his hands." The witness offered to pay, at the time of the hearing in court, all moneys due on the contract up to that date.

[2] It thus appears, says appellant, that not until the refusal of the plaintiffs to accept the amount tendered in April was there anything which might be construed by defendant as notice to him that the vendors would insist upon strict compliance with the terms of the contract. Undoubtedly it is the rule that where the entire course of business between the parties to a contract of sale has amounted to a waiver on the part of the vendors of that clause of the agreement making time of the essence thereof, they may not declare a forfeiture without proper notice and demand. Boone v. Templeman, 158 Cal. 290-299, 110 Pac. 947, 139 Am. St. Rep. 126; Stevinson v. Joy, 164 Cal. 279, 128 Pac. 751.

[3] There can be no doubt of the existence of the rule, and possibly the facts would have supported its application in favor of defendant, but the difficulty which confronts him is that no claim of waiver of the right of forfeiture was made by the answer. In that pleading the only denial with reference to the allegations of payments in the complaint is the statement that they were not all of the moneys offered. The answer contains no word of allegation that the payments were not duly made and on time up to the end of the year 1912. It is averred that the sum of $25 was paid on account of interest on February 10, 1913, and that a tender of $40 was made to and refused by plaintiffs on April 1, 1913, and the pleader set forth the conclusion that he was not in default in the payments on said contract on the 2d of April, 1913, or at the time of the commencement of this action. Unless we are to hold, therefore, that the mere fact of receiving the three payments after January 1st necessarily amounted to a waiver of the provision as to time of future payments and a waiver, too, of which defendant may take advantage without pleading it, defendant may not prevail on the record before us. If a waiver does not appear from the complaint, it is a matter of defense. None is deducible from that pleading. As we have seen, no allegation of waiver of that part of the agreement making time of the essence of the contract is set forth in the answer, and, in the absence of any such claim, the forfeiture must be held to have taken place. Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Skookum Oil Co. v. Thomas, 162 Cal. 539, 123 Pac. 363. The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Injunction by William J. Temple against George B. Gordon. From an order dissolving restraining order and denying motion for preliminary injunction, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph F. Westall, of Los Angeles (Henry T. Hazard, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. Jones & Weller, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order dissolving a restraining order and denying plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction. The application for the order was heard upon the complaint, and affidavits produced on both sides.

For about two years prior to defendant's acts of which the plaintiff complains plaintiff was engaged in manufacturing and selling a certain kind of bread, to which he gave the name of "Faultless" bread. In June, 1913, he caused to be registered as belonging to him the trade-mark and trade-name "Faultless" as applied to that product, and obtained a certificate thereof from the secretary of state of the state of California. In selling his bread thereafter he was accustomed to have each loaf wrapped in a certain kind of paper upon which was printed:

FAULTLESS
MADE BY
OCCIDENTAL BAKERY
Brdy. 4770 Los Angeles A-5020.

These words and figures were printed in dark blue ink in a certain distinctive form. He advertised extensively his product under said trade-name, and built up a valuable business in the sale of the described bread. The plaintiff charged that thereafter the defendant, with intent to deceive and defraud the public and to injure and defraud the plaintiff, caused to be put up in similar packages a kind of bread sold by him, copying the general design, color of ink, etc., and caused the bread to be sold in a nearly similar wrapper to that of the plaintiff, on which he placed the following printed matter:

PEERLESS QUALITY PURITY
MADE BY
GORDON BREAD CO.
South 4797 Los Angeles.

Samples of these wrappers are attached as exhibits to the complaint, and are found in the transcript on appeal. The affidavits which accompanied the complaint were made by drivers of bread wagons for the plaintiff, and contain statements of fact tending to show a similarity in appearance of the articles as placed on the market by the defendant to those sold by the plaintiff; tending also to show that some persons were deceived thereby, and that the bread sold by the defendant was inferior in weight and quality, but that nevertheless it was competing successfully with plaintiff's bread in the various establishments where bread was sold in the city of Los Angeles, and that plaintiff's business was being injured thereby. In response to the order to show cause the defendant presented to the court affidavits of himself and of several drivers of his delivery wagons and of several grocers who had been selling bread purchased from the plaintiff as well as from the defendant. The defendant denied many of the important allegations of the complaint. Among other things, the defendant stated in his affidavit, and the accompanying affidavits stated, matters tending to show that it was not true that by reason of close similarity of the names "Faultless" and "Peerless" or of the wrappers and packages as sold by the defendant the public could be or was misled or imposed upon; that the defendant had been engaged in the manufacture and selling of bread in the city of Los Angeles for at least five years prior to the commencement of this action; that the wrappers used by him did not, nor did he intend by them to, imitate the plaintiff's trade-mark or label.

[1, 2] On the hearing of this motion it was not necessary for the court, in order to warrant a denial of the order asked for by plaintiff, to pass upon the merits of the case. The court may have concluded that the essential facts were so clearly in dispute, and the right of plaintiff to any relief so much in doubt under the showing made, that it would decline to grant any injunction at all until a trial on the merits.

"The granting of a preliminary injunction is not a matter of right, but the application is addressed to the sound discretion of the court, which is to be exercised according to the circumstances of the particular case; * * * and its action upon such application will not be reviewed in the appellate court unless it shall clearly appear that there was an abuse of its discretion." Santa Cruz Association v. Grant, 104 Cal. 306, 37 Pac. 1034.

[3, 4] The plaintiff's case does not appear to be based upon any claim of exclusive right by reason of a trade-mark, since the trade-mark as registered by him relates only to the name or quality of the thing sold. Civ. Code § 991. The claims asserted by him are based upon—

"the principle that in the interest of fair commercial dealing courts of equity, where one has been first in the field doing business under a given name, will protect that person to the extent of making competitors use reasonable precautions to prevent deceit and fraud upon the public and upon the business first in the field." Dunston v. Los Angeles Van, etc., Co., 165 Cal. 89, 94, 131 Pac. 115, 117.

The relief rests upon the deceit or fraud which the later comer into the business field is practicing upon the earlier comer and upon the public. In view of the nature of the relief demanded, and in view of the conflicting evidence which came before the superior court under the order to show cause, we are unable to say that the plaintiff's right to a temporary injunction was conclusively established, or that the court abused its discretion in denying the motion.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

4. OFFICERS $\Leftrightarrow$ 61—RECALL—POWERS OF LEGISLATURE.

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES $\Leftrightarrow$ 227—IRRIGATION DISTRICTS—OFFICERS—RECALL—POWERS OF LEGISLATURE.

Acts Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 135, providing for recall of officers of irrigation districts, is constitutional and a valid exercise of legislative power.

Application for writ of mandate by G. W. Wigley against the South San Joaquin Irrigation District and others, to which defendants demurred. Demurrer overruled, and writ awarded.

Clary & Louttit, of Stockton, for petitioner.
L. L. Dennitt, for respondents.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. This is an application for a writ of mandate to the board of directors of the South San Joaquin Irrigation District, commanding it to call an election for the recall of one of its members.

The application for the writ shows that the recall petition presented to said board conformed in all respects to the provisions of an act of the Legislature as found in the statutes of the extra session of 1911 at page 135. This act provides:

"The holder of any elective office of any irrigation district may be removed or recalled at any time by the electors."

[1] Counsel for the board of directors take the position that the Legislature, in passing the above act and extending the recall to officers of an irrigation district, acted in violation of certain provisions of the state Constitution and exceeded its powers. This conclusion is attempted to be sustained by a reference to section 18, art. 4, of the Constitution, and to section 1, art. 23. Section 18 provides for the removal of certain officers, such as Governor, judges, etc., by impeachment, and concludes with this sentence:

"All other civil officers shall be tried for misdemeanor in office in such manner as the Legislature may provide"

—and section 1, art. 23, provides for the recall of certain specified officers, viz., for the recall of elective officers of counties, cities and counties, and cities and towns of the state, but does not, in express terms, provide for the recall of district officers. Considering these two sections of the Constitution, counsel's position may be stated as follows: Since the Constitution does not provide for the recall of district officers, but does provide that they may be removed from office after a trial and conviction of misdemeanor in office, it follows that the latter provision is exclusive, and the Legislature has no power to pass any act for their removal other than an act to provide for their removal for cause. The argument challenges the power of the state Legislature to pass the act of 1911. It must be considered, however, that, in the absence of section 1, art. 23, of the state Constitution, the Legislature would have plenary power to pass laws providing for the recall of public officers. This results from the nature and form of our state government. As was said, in Sheehan v. Scott, 145 Cal. 684, 79 Pac. 350:

"The express declaration in section 1, art. 4, of the Constitution of this state, that 'The legislative power of the state shall be vested in a Senate and Assembly,' includes all the legislative power of the state whose exercise is not expressly prohibited to the Legislature, or conferred upon some other body. In the face of this declaration there can be no implication of the absence or nonexistence of such power, but whoever would claim that the power does not exist in any particular case, or has been improperly exercised, must point out the provision of the Constitution which has taken it away or forbidden its exercise. 'The Constitution of this state is not to be considered as a grant of power, but rather as a restriction upon the powers of the Legislature, and it is competent for the Legislature to exercise all powers not forbidden by the Constitution of the state, or delegated to the general government, or prohibited by the Constitution of the United States.' People v. Coleman, 4 Cal. 46 [60 Am. Dec. 581]."

[2] Prior to the enactment of section 1, art. 23, of the Constitution, it was conceded, if not directly decided, that the Legislature had the power to pass acts for the recall of public officers. Thus, in Conn. v. City Council, 17 Cal. App. 717, 121 Pac. 719, the record in that case disclosed that the charter of the city of Richmond was adopted at a time when there were no recall provisions in the state Constitution. The charter expressly provided for the recall of all elective city officers. It was held in that case that the charter provision as to recall of the elective officers of the city was valid and within the power of the people of the city to make, and within the power of the Legislature to approve. The charter, when approved by the Legislature, became a law of the state in the same sense that the act of 1911 is a law of the state. We have here, then, a decision holding that the Legislature did not need any constitutional grant to give it power to pass an act for the recall of public officers.

2. In the same case it was said:

"Manifestly the tenure of office, and the method of removing an elected city official, are purely municipal affairs, which in no sense conflict with the constitutional provisions relating to the tenure of office or the removal by impeachment of state officers. Similar recall provisions, as applied to administrative officers, have been upheld and declared not to be in conflict with either state or federal Constitution in other jurisdictions, where the points of attack were identical with the arguments advanced here."

In Good v. Common Council, 5 Cal. App. 269, 90 Pac. 46, it is said:

"A case of 'removal for just cause' in this sense implies some misconduct upon the part of the officer, or imputes to him some violation of the law. Under such circumstances it is necessary that the charges against him shall be based upon some refusal to obey or intention to violate the law prescribing his duties. There are often such penalties attached to proceedings for the removal of officers 'for cause shown' that they are, and should be, carefully guarded from abuse (Croly v. Sacramento, 119 Cal. 234, 51 Pac. 323); but as to the right to the office as against the people, it is a well-recognized rule that the agency may be terminated at any time by the sovereign power without reason given (Matter of Carter, 141 Cal. 319, 74 Pac. 997)."

[3] We conclude that section 18, art. 4, providing that officers may be tried for misdemeanors in office in such manner as the Legislature may prescribe, does not deprive the Legislature of power to provide for the recall of public officers by the electorate.

[4] 3. As section 1, art. 23, of the Constitution is not, nor was it intended to be, a grant of power to the Legislature, so it will not be held to take from the Legislature the power it already had to pass acts for the removal of public officers, unless such intent clearly appears and is the reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the language used. It contains no language prohibiting the Legislature from passing such acts. "There can be no implication of the * * * nonexistence of such power, but whoever would claim that the power does not exist in any particular case * * * must point out the provision of the Constitution which has taken it away or forbidden its exercise." Sheehan v. Scott, 145 Cal. 686, 79 Pac. 351.

[5] Our conclusion is that the act of 1911 is not in conflict with any constitutional provision, and is a valid exercise of legislative power. The demurrer to the petition for a writ of mandate is overruled. Let a writ of mandate issue directed to the board of trustees of the South San Joaquin Irrigation District, commanding it to call the election asked for in the recall petition on file with it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thos. C. Denny, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Coast Dried Fruits Company against Charles and George Sheriffs, doing business as the Sheriffs Bros. Company. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Butts and Rolfe L. Thompson, both of Santa Rosa, for appellant. T. J. Geary and W. Finlaw Geary, both of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment rendered and entered against it and in favor of the defendants.

The action is for the recovery of the sum of $1,887.12, alleged to be the balance due from the defendants to the plaintiff on a contract of sale made and entered into between the parties on the 29th day of September, 1913, whereby, it is alleged, the plaintiff sold and delivered to the defendants 132,878 pounds of dried prunes, at the agreed price of $100 per ton for the first 10 tons thereof and $120 per ton for the balance thereof.

The undisputed facts are: That one H. W. Eberling was, in the year 1913, and for several years prior thereto, the lessee of the prune orchard known as the "Leak ranch," situated on Mark West creek, in Sonoma county. He also, in the year 1913, was the lessee of another prune orchard, in said county, known as the Gibbons ranch. On the 1st day of May, 1913, the said Eberling entered into a written contract with the California Fruit Canners' Association, whereby he agreed to sell and deliver to said association from 40 to 50 tons of dried prunes, grown on the Leak and Gibbons ranches, at "3 cent. base," said prunes to be delivered on board of cars at a station called Fulton, in Sonoma county. The consummation of said contract of sale was made dependent upon the happening of certain conditions pertaining to quality of fruit as dried. Upon the execution of said contract, the California Fruit Canners' Association paid said Eberling the sum of $500, in two different checks made payable to Eberling, one for $200 and the other for $300. Thereafter, and before the prunes or any portion thereof were delivered, the cannery association paid Eberling the additional sum of $200, making a total payment of $700. On the 15th day of August, 1913, the following contract was mutually entered into by Eberling Bros. and the defendants:

"In consideration of the sum of one dollar by each to the other paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, Eberling Bros. has this day sold, and Sheriffs Brothers Company of Healdsburg, Cal., have this day bought my crop of dried French and sugar prunes grown on what is known as Leak and Givins ranches Est 100 tons more or less

10 tons @ $100.00 per ton
Balance @ $120.00 "

"It is hereby expressly agreed that said fruit shall be delivered in first class order, all of which is to be of choice merchantable quality, thoroughly cured and well dried.

"Any wet or rain damaged stock is to be weighed back, or taken at a reduced price as may be agreed upon.

"To be delivered at on board cars Mark West.

"Terms—Cash on delivery.

"Seller: Eberling Bros.

"Sheriffs Brothers Company,

"By Chas. Sheriffs."

These further facts are also undisputed: That, subject to the conditions of the foregoing contract, viz. that the prunes so bargained for should "be delivered in first class order, all of which are to be of choice, merchantable quality, thoroughly cured and well dried," etc., the defendants bought the crop of prunes on the ranches in said contract named, estimated at 100 tons, at the rate of $100 per ton for the first 10 tons and $120 per ton for the remainder, the fruit to be delivered on board the cars at the railroad station at Mark West, in Sonoma county; that all the prunes, except the two cars in dispute here, were so delivered to the defendants and received by them at Healdsburg, in said county; that all the prunes were, prior to the commencement of this action, paid for except the last two cars, which are involved in this action, and which amounted in money to the sum herein sued for; that, when the said last two cars reached Healdsburg, the place of consignment, the California Cannery Association seized and took possession of them in an action brought by it in claim and delivery, said association claiming to be the owner of said prunes by virtue of its contract with H. W. Eberling; above mentioned herein; that H. W. Eberling had, prior to the seizure by the cannery association of the two cars of prunes as above indicated, delivered to the said association 9 or 10 tons of prunes, which amounted to more in money than the sum of $700, which was advanced to said Eberling by the cannery association.

The appellant expressly admits these facts: That H. W. Eberling was the lessee of the Leak and Gibbons ranches, and owned half the prune crops grown thereon; that H. W. Eberling entered into the contract, above referred to, with the cannery association for the sale of the prunes in controversy in this action; that, after the making of the contract between the cannery association and H. W. Eberling, and before the making of the contract between Eberling Bros. and the defendants, the plaintiff was incorporated. The disputed fact in the case and upon which the decision of the controversy is made to hinge is whether the fruit in question was sold to the plaintiff by Eberling prior to the making of the contract with the defendants.

The plaintiff contends that the determination of the ultimate issue presented here is whether the contract between Eberling and the cannery association is merely executory or constituted a sale. "If it was a sale," proceeds the plaintiff, "then the title passed to the cannery company, and Eberling could not thereafter convey the fruit to the Pacific Coast Dried Fruit Company. And if the cannery fruit was shipped to Sheriffs Bros. at Healdsburg, the cannery company had a right to replevin it." On the other hand, continues the plaintiff, "if said contract was executory and Eberling had until the 15th day of October, 1913, in which to fulfill it, and he did not fulfill his contract by that time, the California Cannery Association had an action for damages against H. W. Eberling, but it had no title to the fruit, and the sale of the fruit to the Pacific Coast Dried Fruit Company was valid, as was the sale to Sheriffs Bros." Counsel for the appellant then proceeded to show that the contract referred to was executory, and that therefore the canners' association did not and could not acquire title to the fruit until the same was delivered to and accepted by it.

[1] The case, however, was tried and decided upon the sole theory that the defendants never entered into any contract with the plaintiff whereby the latter agreed or promised to sell and deliver to them any prunes; that said plaintiff, as a matter of fact, never did sell and deliver to the defendants any prunes, and that said plaintiff is not the real party in interest in this action (section 367, Code Civ. Proc.); that it cannot therefore maintain this action, and is not entitled to any judgment of any kind or character against the defendants. Upon this theory of the case, it is manifestly unimportant whether the contract between Eberling and the canners' association constituted a sale or a mere agreement to sell.

The court made no other findings than the following:

"(1) That the plaintiff did not, on or about September 29, 1913, or on any other date or at any time, sell or deliver to the defendants, * * * at Healdsburg * * * or any other place * * * any quantity of prunes; (2) that the defendants * * * did not at any time or place agree or promise to pay to the plaintiff any price for any prunes, and that defendants * * * did not at any time or place enter into any contract with the plaintiff for the purchase from plaintiff of any quantity of dried prunes; (3) that the defendants * * * have not paid to the plaintiff the sum of $5,885.56, or any sum of money whatever, on account of any dried prunes received by the defendants * * * from the plaintiff; (4) that there is nothing due from the defendants * * * to the plaintiff on any account."

Thus it will be observed that, as stated, the whole theory of the case as it was tried by the defendants and decided by the court was that the plaintiff was not the real party in interest, and the sole question here is, therefore, whether the above findings derive sufficient support from the evidence.

We cannot say that the decision was not justified.

The contract upon which this action is founded was, as is above shown, between Eberling Bros. and Sheriffs Bros. The prunes referred to in said contract were those produced or to be produced on the Leak and Gibbons ranches of which H. W. Eberling, who conducted the negotiations culminating in the contract, was the lessee. In that contract, it is expressly provided that the Sheriffs Bros. were to receive, for the prices therein specified, "my crop of dried French and sugar prunes grown on what is known as the Leach (Leak) and Givins (Gibbons) ranches."

Charles Sheriffs testified that, in the course of his negotiations with H. W. Eberling for the purchase of said prunes, no word was ever uttered or suggestion made or intimated that the Pacific Coast Dried Fruit Company had any interest, direct or remote, in said prunes or the contract into which he was about to enter with Eberling Bros. for the purchase of the same. Indeed, he testified that, having heard prior to the time he began negotiations for the purchase of the prunes that the Eberlings had formed a company called the "Pacific Dried Fruit Company," he asked H. W. Eberling, just before the contract was executed, why he did not sell his crop of prunes to his own company (referring to plaintiff), and that Eberling replied that he did not desire to take that course, that the fruit belonged to him (Eberling), and that "he wanted to sell it on the outside for the best price he could get for it." The witness further testified that, when making payments for prunes delivered to him under said contract, he invariably did so by drawing his checks in the name and favor of H. W. Eberling, the latter having requested him to make his checks out in that manner.

On the other hand, the plaintiff presented some testimony which raised an apparent conflict in the evidence upon the question whether it at any time became the owner of the prunes in question, or whether said prunes were transferred to it by Eberling before the making of the contract to which the defendants are parties. H. W. Eberling testified that he transferred his 1913 crop of prunes to the plaintiff prior to the making of the contract between Eberling Bros. and Sheriffs Bros. The consideration for the transfer, he said, was the issuance to him by the plaintiff of 300 shares of its stock. He never received any cash from the plaintiff for the transfer. The minutes of a meeting of the board of directors of the plaintiff, held July 21, 1913, were introduced in evidence, and disclosed that, upon motion of Director C. W. Eberling, "the property of Harry W. Eberling, known as Eberling Bros., viz.: 100 tons of prunes, valued at $10,000.00, with the packing house, cannery and other equipment, and cash to the value of $6,000.00, together with his good will, accepted by the company and that the secretary be instructed to issue 336 shares of the company's stock in respect thereof." The foregoing action, the minutes further show, was subsequently ratified by Directors H. W. Eberling, C. W. Eberling, and J. T. Lyons, and acknowledgment of receipt of stock issued by the plaintiff, to whom it does not appear, was also noted in said minutes. There were also introduced what purported to be the minutes of a meeting of the board of directors, held on August 7, 1913, which tended to show that the corporation, by said board, had invested H. W. Eberling with authority "to sell the whole or any part of the prunes that be put into this corporation as one of his assets and which are grown on his ranch at Fulton, Sonoma county, and to receive payment therefor. And, moreover, he is hereby authorized to use such moneys as he may receive in payment therefor in such a way as may seem fit and to the best interests of said corporation in the discharge of its obligations."

The foregoing is, substantially, about all the testimony the object of which was to show ownership of the prunes in the plaintiff.

As stated, there is apparently a conflict in the evidence upon the question of the ownership of the prunes involved in this action. Whether, however, in reality, there was a conflict was a question for the determination of the trial court. If that court concluded, as with perfect propriety we may assume that it did, that the testimony introduced by the plaintiff upon that question was wholly unbelievable and so entirely discredited and disregarded it, then there was no actual conflict, for the situation in that case would be the same as if the plaintiff had introduced no proof whatsoever upon the subject.

[2] That it is within the legal province or discretion of the trial court to reject in toto the testimony of any witness is a proposition so obvious under our system and so often confirmed by the courts, that its statement is all that should be necessary to certify its soundness. In the very nature of the case this should be the rule. It was announced in the earliest history of the jurisprudence of the state and has never been varied from. In Blankman v. Vallejo, 15 Cal. 639, 646, the very learned Mr. Justice Baldwin, with the sanction of the court, said:

"We do not understand that the credulity of a court must necessarily correspond with the vigor and positiveness with which a witness swears. A court may reject the most positive testimony, though the witness be not discredited by direct testimony impeaching him or contradicting his statements. The inherent improbability of a statement may deny to it all claims to belief."

See, also, County of Sonoma v. Stofen, 125 Cal. 32, 35, 57 Pac. 681; People v. Milner, 122 Cal. 171, 179, 180, 54 Pac. 833; Clark v. Tulare Dredging Co., 14 Cal. App. 414, 432, 433, 112 Pac. 564.

It is unnecessary to say, of course, that neither a trial court nor a jury may arbitrarily reject the testimony of a witness. There must be a sufficient legal reason for its rejection or discretion is abused. But, unless the action of a trial court or jury in repudiating testimony given before it appears to be inherently erroneous or upon its face as involving an arbitrary disregard of such testimony, an appeal court must assume and, indeed, presume, that upon sufficient reasons the testimony was deemed to be wanting in verity, and therefore without probative or evidentiary force or value.

[3] While it does not rest upon this court to search for and develop the specific reason or reasons by which the trial court was led into the rejection of the testimony presented by the plaintiff, we may, nevertheless, properly call attention to some considerations disclosed by the record which, upon their face at least, might well lead to the conviction that the testimony so brought into the case was entitled to no weight or possessed no persuasive force. In the first place, it is to be observed, in this connection, that the prunes in question were shipped to Sheriffs Bros. by and in the name of "Eberling Bros.," and that, when the fruit was seized by the canners' association under the writ of replevin, H. W. Eberling alone fought the case, apparently for and in behalf of himself, and, according to his own admissions on the witness stand, at no time after the fruit was so taken possession of did he say or represent or pretend, in that action or otherwise, that the prunes were the property of the plaintiff, until about the time of the commencement of this action. In the second place, it is to be noted that the contract with the canners' association was made prior to the incorporation of the plaintiff and prior to the execution of the contract between Eberling Bros. and the defendants. It will further be noted that the latter contract called for better prices and profits for and on the prunes than H. W. Eberling agreed to sell the prunes at and would have obtained under the contract with the canners' association. Thus it is manifest that it would have been greatly to the financial advantage of H. W. Eberling to have delivered the prunes in question to the Sheriffs Bros. under the latter's contract than to have delivered them to the canners' association under its contract. And it by no means involves a far-fetched proposition to venture, upon the record as it appears here, that the reason which inspired Eberling to attempt to make it appear that the plaintiff and not he was the real party to the contract with the defendants was this: That, if it could be shown that the fruit was delivered by the plaintiff to the defendants, under the latter's contract, when said fruit was placed in the cars for shipment at Mark West, the seizure of the prunes by the canners' association, which confessedly had had no dealings with the plaintiff, would involve a matter which concerned no other person than the Sheriffs—that is to say, the fruit having been delivered to them by the plaintiff according to their contract, the title thereto had vested in the defendants before the seizure, and that it was therefore the latter's duty, and no concern of the plaintiff, which was under no obligation of any kind or character to the canners' association, to see that the association restored the fruit to their possession. However that may be, the considerations to which we have above referred, we repeat, are, at least upon their face, sufficient justly to generate distrust in the asseverations of H. W. Eberling that the prunes in question were the property of the plaintiff and in the good faith of the purported transfer of the fruit to said plaintiff by H. W. Eberling, as the minutes of its board of directors introduced in evidence in this case purport to attest. And if, upon those considerations, the trial court felt constrained to discredit the testimony presented by the plaintiff upon the question of ownership, and so disregarded entirely said testimony, we cannot say that the court, in so doing, was not justified or abused its discretion in that respect.

[4] Thus we have reviewed the record as it is presented to us, and, while thus we have been led to the conclusion that the findings of the court that the defendants never at any time had any transaction whatever with the plaintiff, and are not indebted to the plaintiff in any sum on account of the prunes in question, are amply supported, and that said findings support the judgment, it must be conceded that the sole defense relied upon by the defendants, as indicated, and the theory upon which the cause was decided, which theory necessarily followed from the nature of said defense, are extremely technical; for H. W. Eberling was, according to the testimony, practically the corporation plaintiff itself. He organized it and owned all the capital stock thereof, with the exception of a few shares issued for the working purposes of the corporation, and the money, property, and assets transferred to it by him—indeed, the whole of its assets—had constituted his own individual property. If he had made out a clear case of indebtedness to him or the corporation for the prunes in question, we might, under the circumstances thus pointed out, be justified in reversing the judgment. As shown, however, technically plaintiff was not the owner of the prunes in question according to the court's findings, which are fortified by sufficient evidence, and is therefore not the real party in interest in this action; but more than this, it is very clear from the record that apparently the court could have further found, as certainly it should have found, if the face value of the testimony presented by the defendants may be accepted as the correct test of its probative force, and thus have disposed of the case upon its merits against the plaintiff, that H. W. Eberling did agree in writing to sell the prunes in dispute to the canners' association prior to the incorporation of the plaintiff, and prior to the making of the contract with the defendants; that while the prunes were still on a "siding" at the Mark West railway station, H. W. Eberling assured an agent of the canners' association that they were there to be consigned to that association in pursuance of the terms of its contract with "Eberling Bros."; that the assurance so made to the said agent was false and designed to mislead the canners' association as to the disposition which Eberling really intended to make of the prunes; that, as a matter of fact, he at all times intended to ship them to Sheriffs Bros., to whom he had agreed to sell them at prices in advance of those specified in the contract with the association; that he did consign them to the defendants; that the canners' association, having learned of the duplicity, brought suit to obtain possession of the prunes, did, in fact, secure possession of and retained them, and presumably paid Eberling the prices for them stipulated in its contract; that, as a consequence of the act of the association in taking possession of the prunes, the defendants did not then, nor did they ever, get actual possession of the fruit; that H. W. Eberling treated the action by the association as of his and not as of the concern of the defendants, and, accordingly, himself fought the case for and on behalf of himself; that, on the 17th day of December, 1913, almost three months after the association brought its claim and delivery action for the purpose of obtaining possession of the prunes, H. W. Eberling, upon being paid by the defendants the sum of $327.57, executed and delivered to them a receipt therefor, acknowledging payment "in full for all fruits delivered by Eberling Bros."; that, at the time of the delivery of said receipt, Eberling said nothing about an indebtedness due him from the defendants on account of the prunes in question, and that he made no claim against the defendants on that account until long after the delivery of said receipt. In view of all these facts, we think it is very clear that justice demands that the judgment, though resting on a technical defense, should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

BAILEY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR KERN COUNTY et al. (Civ. 2073.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨460(2)—EFFECT OF APPEAL—STAY—NECESSITY OF BOND.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 943, as to stay of execution pending appeal, where sheriff appealed from order requiring delivery of goods to plaintiff, without giving bond, and without delivering the goods to a custodian for the purpose, appointed by the court, execution was not stayed, and it was necessary that he comply with the order.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨460(2)—EFFECT OF APPEAL—STAY—NECESSITY OF BOND.

Perfection of appeal, alternative or under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 939–941, as to judgments appealable, procedure, and bonds on appeal, does not stay execution if the judgment is one, under section 942, as to money judgments, section 943 as to judgments for delivery of documents or personalty, section 944 as to judgments for execution of a conveyance, or section 945 as to judgments affecting real property, unless bond is filed.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨485(1)—EFFECT OF APPEAL—STAY—NECESSITY OF BOND.

Petitioner secured judgment, and defendant appealed, giving stay bond. Pending appeal, petitioner secured an order, directing the sheriff to deliver goods to him. The sheriff appealed by alternative method without bond, and failed to deliver goods. Held, on petitioner's application for writ of mandate to require delivery, that the defendant's appeal was immaterial, and, the order against the sheriff not being stayed, it was his duty to make delivery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2264, 2265, 2267; Dec. Dig. ⇨485(1).]

Original application for writ of mandate by Matthew Bailey against the Superior Court of State of California in and for Kern County and another. Peremptory writ awarded.

E. L. Foster, Geo. E. Whitaker, and Chas. A. Barnhart, all of Bakersfield, and Sullivan & Sullivan, Theo. J. Roche, and Leon E. Morris, all of San Francisco (Robert M. Clarke, of Los Angeles, for counsel), for petitioner. Wiley & Lambert and C. E. Arnold, all of Bakersfield, for respondents.

SHAW, J. It appears that the petitioner, Matthew Bailey, as plaintiff, filed a petition in the superior court of Kern county, wherein Thomas A. Baker was made respondent, praying judgment that a writ of mandate be issued directed to Baker as sheriff of Kern county, requiring him to deliver to petitioner certain personal property and documents in the petition fully described. Upon trial of said proceeding, judgment was rendered for the plaintiff, in accordance with which a peremptory writ of mandate was issued, commanding Baker as such sheriff to immediately take into his possession the personal property and documents described therein and deliver the same to Matthew Bailey, the petitioner for said writ; that Baker refused to comply with the writ upon the ground that he had appealed from the judgment. Thereupon petitioner presented to the court an affidavit setting forth the fact of Baker's refusal to comply with the order of court, and upon which he prayed that a citation be issued by respondent, requiring Baker to appear and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt of court in so refusing to obey the writ of mandate. The court refused to issue such citation, whereupon petitioner has applied to this court for a writ of mandate to be directed to the respondent herein, requiring it to issue the citation to Baker as prayed for. In response to the alternative writ of mandate granted by this court directed to the respondent, requiring it to show cause why it should not issue the citation prayed for by petitioner in the proceeding against Baker, respondent has made return, assigning as grounds for its refusal: First, the fact that Baker, adopting the alternative method of appeal as provided in sections 941a, 941b, and 941c, Code of Civil Procedure, has perfected an appeal from the judgment wherein said writ of mandate was issued; and, second, that the defendant in a certain action for claim and delivery of the personal property and documents involved, brought by defendant against the Security Trust Company, and wherein judgment was rendered in favor of Bailey, has appealed therefrom, giving a stay bond as provided in section 943, Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] It is conceded that Baker in perfecting his appeal gave no undertaking or bond whatsoever, and the sole question presented is whether or not the order made, requiring Baker to take into his possession and deliver to petitioner the personal property and documents involved, is stayed by the mere fact of perfecting an appeal from the judgment therein without giving the stay bond provided for in section 943, Code of Civil Procedure. This section provides:

"If the judgment or order appealed from direct the * * * delivery of documents or personal property, the execution of the judgment or order cannot be stayed by appeal, unless the things required to be * * * delivered be placed in the custody of such officer or receiver as the court may appoint, or unless an undertaking be entered into on the part of the appellant, with at least two sureties, and in such amount as the court, or a judge thereof, may direct, to the effect that the appellant will obey the order of the appellate court upon the appeal."

The order requiring Baker as such sheriff to deliver the documents and personal property to petitioner brings it clearly within the provisions of the section quoted. No bond or undertaking was given, and hence the enforcement of the order was not stayed by the taking of an appeal therefrom.

[2] The perfecting of the appeal, whether taken pursuant to the alternative method in which no undertaking on appeal is required, or taken pursuant to sections 939, 940 and 941, Code of Civil Procedure, the last of which sections provides that an undertaking in the sum of $300 shall be filed, does not operate as a stay of execution where the judgment or order is one designated in sections 942 and 945, inclusive, Code of Civil Procedure. Thus, where an appeal from a judgment or order directing the payment of money is perfected under either method, it does not effect a stay of execution unless a written undertaking be executed on the part of the appellant in double the amount named in the judgment; and so, where an appeal is taken from an order or judgment directing the delivery of personal property or documents, then, as provided in said section 943, an undertaking must be given in order to stay the enforcement thereof. See Ex parte Clancy, 90 Cal. 553, 27 Pac. 411; Doudell v. Shoo, 159 Cal. 448, 114 Pac. 579; United States Fidelity, etc., Co. v. More, 155 Cal. 415, 101 Pac. 302. In support of its contention respondent relies upon the cases of Palache v. Hunt, 64 Cal. 473, 2 Pac. 245, and Ballagh v. Superior Court, 25 Cal. App. 149, 142 Pac. 1123. In those cases, however, respondent was not required to deliver personal property or documents, and therefore the facts were not such as to bring the cases within the provisions of section 943, nor of any other provision of the Code requiring a stay bond to be given.

[3] Neither is the fact that the Security Trust Company has given a stay bond for a judgment rendered against it, a matter for consideration in this proceeding. The judgment here is against Baker, and until reversed or set aside, since no stay bond was given, it is clearly his duty to comply with the order; and whether or not the order is one with which he can comply can only be determined by the court upon the showing made by him in response to a citation to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt for failure so to do.

In the absence of any stay bond given, plaintiff is entitled to the processes of the court to enforce the order made, which, until reversed or stay bond given, stands as a valid judgment to be enforced by the processes of the court to which petitioner is entitled for the purpose of having a judicial determination of the question as to whether Baker can perform the acts as ordered. Assuming the property to be held by another, there is nothing to show that such other would not, on demand, deliver it to Baker as sheriff, or that he has made any effort to obtain possession of it. At all events, no legal reason whatever is presented here showing why Baker should not comply with the order, from which it follows that the trial court, respondent here, should issue the citation, and upon a hearing determine whether he be in contempt for disobedience of the order.

The alternative writ heretofore issued, directing respondent to issue the citation as prayed for by petitioner, is made peremptory.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. LOS ANGELES
PAC. CO. et al. (Civ. 1832.)

1. EMINENT DOMAIN ⇨68—POWERS OF CITY—LAND ALREADY IN PUBLIC USE.

St. 1909, p. 1066, makes the ordinance of a city directing condemnation of lands for parks conclusive evidence of public necessity. Code Civ. Proc. § 1241, subd. 2, provides that before property can be taken it must appear that the taking is necessary to public use, and that, when the city has determined that public necessity requires the acquisition, the ordinance shall be conclusive on that point. Section 1240, subd. 4, provides that property already in public use may be taken for another public purpose in common, if the uses are consistent. Section 1247a empowers the court to determine the conditions on which property already in public use may be taken for another public use in common. Held that, while section 1241 authorizes the city to determine finally that public necessity requires condemnation, such general rule is modified by section 1240, subd. 4, so that the court need not accept as final the decision of the city to take the fee, but may declare the terms on which the land may be taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 168–170; Dec. Dig. ⇨68.]

2. EMINENT DOMAIN ⇨47(6) — POWERS OF CITY—LAND ALREADY IN PUBLIC USE.

Los Angeles Charter (St. 1911, p. 2113) § 119b, providing that all park lands shall remain inviolate as park land, and no part shall be used for any other purpose, does not prevent condemnation of right to use land in common under Code Civ. Proc. § 1240, subd. 4, when land condemned is already burdened with a public use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 109, 110, 116–120; Dec. Dig. ⇨47(6).]

3. EMINENT DOMAIN ⇨20(1)—“PUBLIC USE.”

Land used for pole line for transmission of power to a public railway is used for a public use, although indirectly.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 59, 60, 62–65; Dec. Dig. ⇨20(1).]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Public Use.]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN ⇨10(1) — RAILROADS — ELECTRIC LINE.

Since by Civ. Code, § 465a, all steam roads are authorized to use electric motive power, electric railroads, in their principal essentials have the same legal status as steam roads, including the power of eminent domain.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 35, 37, 39–48; Dec. Dig. ⇨10(1).]

5. EMINENT DOMAIN ⇨20(1)—“PUBLIC USE”—RAILWAYS—ACQUISITION OF WHOLE WAY.

Where an electric railway acquired land for construction of subway, the use of that acquired was no less public because it had not acquired the entire amount needed, or had not actually begun construction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 59, 60, 62–65; Dec. Dig. ⇨20(1).]

6. EMINENT DOMAIN ⇨169 — PUBLIC USE — RAILWAYS—ACQUISITION OF WHOLE WAY.

It is sufficient that a railroad company in charge of a public use, in the due prosecution of its enterprise, has lawfully obtained for that use property necessary therefor, with a reasonable prospect that the work will be carried to completion, and the prior ownership of a franchise relating to street crossings is not essential to the right to condemn, or to hold for the proposed use, other portions of the right of way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 461; Dec. Dig. ⇨169.]

7. EMINENT DOMAIN ⇨196—LAND ALREADY IN PUBLIC USE—BURDEN OF PROOF.

A railway company claiming land as in public use has the burden of proving that the use is public, but the party seeking to condemn it for its sole use then has the burden of proving that the proposed new use is inconsistent with the existing use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 529–534; Dec. Dig. ⇨196.]

8. EMINENT DOMAIN ⇐198(1) — QUESTIONS FOR COURT.

In condemnation proceedings it is for the court to determine as a question of fact whether the land is already devoted to a public use, if so alleged, and whether the existing and the proposed use are inconsistent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 525; Dec. Dig. ⇐198(1).]

9. EMINENT DOMAIN ⇐124—COMPENSATION—AMOUNTS INCLUDED.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1249, providing that for the purpose of assessing compensation and damages, if such issue is tried within one year after commencement of the action, the right shall be deemed to have accrued on issuance of summons, and the value at that date shall be taken, and that damages shall draw interest from the date of the order of possession, the party whose land is condemned is not entitled to an allowance for taxes accruing between commencement of the action and decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 332-344; Dec. Dig. ⇐124.]

10. EMINENT DOMAIN ⇐85—PROPERTY ALREADY IN PUBLIC USE—COMPENSATION.

Where an electric railroad entered upon lands without objection by the owners, and erected and maintained a pole line for transmission of power, the easement it acquired was a substantial property right, and on condemnation for park purposes the landowners could not have the entire compensation, but the railroad should share therein.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the City of Los Angeles against the Los Angeles Pacific Company, Martha J. Aylesworth, and others. Interlocutory judgment for plaintiff, and order denying new trial, and the Company and others appeal. Reversed.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and A. W. Ashburn, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., Charles S. Burnell, Asst. City Atty., and Lewis E. Whitehead, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Appeal from interlocutory judgment of condemnation, and from an order denying motion for new trial. This action was brought for the condemnation of a large tract of land within the city of Los Angeles for the purpose of a projected public park commonly known as "Silver Lake Park." The action was brought after and pursuant to proceedings by the city council of the city of Los Angeles, which said proceedings were had in accordance with the provisions of the "Park and Playground Act of 1909" (found at page 1060 et seq., Stats. of 1909). Included with the land sought to be condemned were certain parcels belonging to appellants herein and designated as parcels 43, 46, 86, 87, 92, 93, and 94; also a certain other parcel of land claimed by the defendant railway company as belonging to it by virtue of dedication to public use and occupied by it for pole line purposes, which parcel is not separately described in the complaint, but is described in the answer and amendment to answer of appellants, and was at the trial of this action designated, for convenience, as parcel 46½. Parcels numbers 86, 87, 92, 93, and 94 stand of record in the name of the Los Angeles Pacific Land Company, but that company holds the same as trustee for the Pacific Electric Railway Company, the land company having been formed as a matter of convenience in holding lands for the railway company, and all of the money for the purchase of said lands having been advanced by the railway company, which owns all of the stock of the land company. The Los Angeles Pacific Company is merely the predecessor of the Pacific Electric Railway Company, and has been absorbed into the latter company by a consolidation under section 473, Civil Code. Parcels 43, 46, and 46½ are, and at the time of the commencement of this action, on January 18, 1913, were, being used for the purposes of a high-tension electric power transmission line extending from defendant's Olive substation on Sunset boulevard, across the proposed parkway in a general southwesterly direction. This pole line carries 15,000 volts of electricity which form the chief supply of energy for the operation of defendant's cars over its western division, which includes all of Hollywood, Beverly, Sawtelle, Santa Monica, and several other west coast beaches. Parcels 87, 93, and 94 were prior to the commencement of this action acquired for the purpose of constructing and operating an electric railroad subway from defendant's Hill street station, Los Angeles, to its Vineyard station at the westerly city limits. The subway has not been actually constructed, and the court found that these parcels of land, which form but part of a long strip of land, acquired and held as a right of way for electric railroad subway purposes, had not been devoted to public use. Parcels 86 and 92, it is admitted, have never been devoted to public use, and with respect to those parcels no complaint is made by appellants which will require separate consideration.

The court refused to reserve in its judgment any electric railroad power pole line or subway rights to these defendants or to limit the plaintiff's taking to an estate subject to the existing pole line and subway rights. The lands are by the judgment condemned in fee, and in effect it requires the elimination of the power pole line and subway from the parkway district. The court also denied the defendant any award for the taking of pole line parcel 46½. The court, while it made allowances to defendants for certain taxes and assessments which accrued since the commencement of this action, refused to provide for payment to defendants of other taxes and assessments which may be levied upon the condemned lands before the entry of final judgment and payment of awards.

Among the principal points which appellants urge upon this appeal are the following: (1) That the court erred in refusing to preserve to defendants their existing electric railroad power pole line and subway rights in parcels 43, 46, 46½, 87, 93, and 94; (2) that the court erred in refusing to make allowance for accruing taxes and assessments as requested by defendants; (3) that an award should have been made for the taking of pole line parcel 46½; also that the court failed to find upon important issues of fact, and that certain material findings fail of support in the evidence.

An issue as to consistency between the proposed park use and the existing uses claimed by appellants, and of the right to a reservation of the right of common user, was raised by the answer, which, besides denying the necessity of taking the whole or any part of the land for park purposes, also set forth the existing public uses to which the lands of defendants had been devoted by them, and alleged damages which will accrue to portions not sought to be condemned, unless such reservation of the right of common user be allowed. This issue is not met by the findings, except by finding that "it is necessary that the plaintiff take and condemn for public use" the described land. It is also found, in effect, that the subway parcels are not devoted to public use. There is no specific finding that the taking of an unqualified fee is necessary for the purpose for which the plaintiff is condemning, but the court as a conclusion of law holds "that the plaintiff is entitled to an interlocutory judgment adjudging that * * * said property be condemned in fee to the use of the plaintiff for public park purposes." In the absence of qualification, this must mean an absolute, unconditional fee, ever free from all rights on the part of the defendants to use the premises for either electric railroad power pole line or subway purposes.

Appellants contend, and it is not denied, that the court treated this question as a question of law, and not as one of fact. The court deemed itself bound by the decision of the city council to take the fee of the lands described in the ordinance of intention, because the Legislature, in the court's opinion, had delegated to the city council the determination of the question of what lands should be taken and what estate therein should be taken for park or playground purposes, and assumed that that determination was, under the park act, final, and deprived the court of any power whatever to pass upon these questions, which appellants say are delegated to the court under sections 1240 and 1247a, Code of Civil Procedure. The court treated it as a question of necessity, and determined the case upon a solution of the question of whether the council's decision is conclusive as to the necessity of taking any particular land for a given improvement and the necessity of taking the entire estate in the land.

The "Park and Playground Act of 1909," in section 7 thereof, referring to condemnation of land for park purposes, reads as follows:

"The complaint shall set forth, or state the effect of, the ordinance of intention, and the ordinance ordering the improvement, but need not set up any other proceedings had before the bringing of the action. Said ordinances shall be conclusive evidence, in such action, of the public necessity of the proposed improvement."

As stated in the complaint and found by the court, the city council by its ordinance, adopted by a vote of more than two-thirds of its members, declared that the public interest and convenience required that the described lands be acquired for park purposes, and that for that purpose it is necessary that the plaintiff take and condemn for public use the said lands; and the court, relying upon that ordinance, and without other evidence showing the necessity for the taking, made its findings as we have stated.

Section 5 of the park and playground act provides for a condemnation action to be brought, pursuant to direction therefor by the city council; and section 6 declares that:

"Said action shall in all respects be subject to and governed by such provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure now existing, or that may be hereafter adopted, as may be applicable thereto, except in the particulars otherwise provided for in this act."

The procedure in condemnation is outlined in the title on Eminent Domain, section 1237 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1241, as in force in January, 1913, when this action was commenced, provides that:

"Before property can be taken, it must appear: * * * 2. That the taking is necessary to such use."

By an amendment in force on August 10, 1913 (before this action came on for trial), the following addition was made to subdivision 2 of that section:

"Provided, when the legislative body of a county, city and county, or an incorporated city or town, shall, by resolution or ordinance, adopted by vote of two-thirds of all its members, have found and determined that the public interest and necessity require the acquisition, construction or completion, by such county, city and county, or incorporated city or town, of any proposed public utility, or any public improvement, and that the property described in such resolution or ordinance is necessary therefore, such resolution or ordinance shall be conclusive evidence; (a) of the public necessity of such proposed public utility or public improvement; (b) that such property is necessary therefore, and (c) that such proposed public utility or public improvement is planned or located in the manner which will be most compatible with the greatest public good, and the least private injury: Provided, that said resolution or ordinance shall not be such conclusive evidence in the case of the taking by any county, city and county, or incorporated city or town, of property located outside of the territorial limits thereof."

Section 1240, Code of Civil Procedure (St. 1911, p. 620), as in force in January, 1913, provides that:

"The private property which may be taken under this title includes: * * * 4. Property appropriated to public use; but such property shall not be taken unless for a more necessary public use than that to which it has already been appropriated: Provided, that where any such property has been so appropriated by any individual, firm or private corporation, the use thereof for a public street or highway of a municipal corporation, or the use thereof by a municipal corporation for the same public purpose to which it has been so appropriated, shall be deemed more necessary uses than the public use to which such property has been already appropriated: And provided, further, that where property already appropriated to a public use or purpose, by any person, firm or private corporation, is sought to be taken by a municipal corporation, for another public use or purpose, which is consistent with the continuance of the use of such property or some portion thereof for such existing purpose, to the same extent as such property is then used, or to a less or modified extent, then the right to use such property for such proposed public purpose, in common with such other use or purpose, either as then existing, or to a less or modified extent, may be taken by such municipal corporation, and the court may fix the terms and conditions upon which such property may be so taken, and the manner and extent of the use thereof for each of such public purposes, and may order the removal or relocation of any structures or improvements therein or thereon, so far as may be required by such common use."

By amendment in force August 10, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 547), said subdivision 4 was amended to read as follows:

"Property appropriated to public use; but such property shall not be taken unless for a more necessary public use than that to which it has already been appropriated: Provided, that where any such property has been so appropriated by any individual, firm or private corporation, the use thereof for a public street or highway of a county, city and county, or incorporated city or town or the use thereof by a county, city and county, or incorporated city or town or municipal water district, for the same public purpose to which it has been so appropriated, or for any other public purpose, shall be deemed more necessary uses than the public use to which such property has already been appropriated: And provided, further, that where property already appropriated to a public use or purpose by any person, firm or private corporation, is sought to be taken by a county, city and county, incorporated city or town, or municipal water district, for another public use or purpose, which is consistent with the continuance of the use of such property or some portion thereof for such existing purpose, to the same extent as such property is then used, or to a less or modified extent, then the right to use such property for such proposed public purpose, in common with such other use or purpose, either as then existing, or to a less or modified extent, may be taken by such county, city and county, incorporated city or town, or municipal water district, and the court may fix the terms and conditions upon which such property may be so taken, and the manner and extent of the use thereof for each of such public purposes, and may order the removal or relocation of any structures or improvements therein or thereon, so far as may be required by such common use. But property appropriated to the use of any county, city and county, incorporated city or town or municipal water district, may not be taken by any other county, city and county, incorporated city or town, or municipal water district while such property is so appropriated and used for the public purposes for which it has been so appropriated."

Section 1247a, Code of Civil Procedure, reads as follows:

"The court shall also have power to regulate and determine the place and manner of removing or relocating structures or improvements, or of enjoying the common use mentioned in the fourth subdivision of section 1240."

[1] No one here denies that the power to finally determine the necessity of taking specified property for a public use may be delegated to a city council. The questions now at issue are to be settled by reading the park and playground act together with the Code provisions applicable to the case, and thereby ascertaining the legislative will. The statutes contemplate the taking of private property for public use. They also contemplate that property already devoted to a public use may be taken for a more necessary public use. They further contemplate that, where it is proposed to take for public use property already devoted to a public use, and where the proposed new use is also consistent with the existing public use, the two rights shall be exercised in common, under the terms and conditions appropriate to the case. To meet this particular situation, section 1240 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in subdivision 4 thereof, authorizes the court in its decree of condemnation, to "fix the terms and conditions upon which such property may be so taken, and the manner and extent of the use thereof for each of such public purposes." In the comparative construction of statutes, they are to be harmonized as fully as may be, so as to give them complete and reasonable effect. An apt means to this end is obtained by permitting a statute applicable to a particular class of facts to operate as a modification of statutes of broad and general scope. So here we may assume that the general rule as found in section 1241 of the Code of Civil Procedure and in the park and playground act authorizes the city council, in an ordinance like that here in question, to finally determine that the public necessity and convenience require that certain described land be condemned for park purposes. But this general rule is modified by subdivision 4 of section 1240, enacted to meet the specifically designated cases where it is proposed to condemn land already subject to an existing public use. In this particular situation, while the court, under the above assumption, will recognize as final the determination of the council that the taking of the land is necessary for the proposed use, it is required also to recognize the existing public use, and to provide for the terms and conditions upon which the existing use may continue, if in fact the two uses are capable of coexisting on the same premises. It is not uncommon to have railroads in parks, and their presence has been so regulated that they aided in making the parks accessible, without interfering with safe administration of both of those public uses. People v. Park & Ocean R. R. Co., 76 Cal. 156, 18 Pac. 141. Respondent's counsel argue that these principles can have no application in this case, because the use for which the city seeks to take the property is not, and under the law cannot be, consistent with the existing use of the property. They say that the use of the property either for the purpose of maintaining a pole line thereover or a subway thereunder is not, and as a matter of law cannot be, consistent with its use for park purposes, since the organic law governing the city of Los Angeles prohibits the use of park lands for any other purpose whatsoever. The property sought to be condemned in this action is sought to be taken for the purpose of a public park, and for no other purpose, and the charter of the city of Los Angeles provides:

"All lands and real property located in the city of Los Angeles which have been heretofore, or which may be hereafter, set apart or dedicated for the use of the public as a public park or parks, shall forever remain to the use of the public as such park or parks, inviolate, and no part of said lands or real property shall ever be used or occupied for any other purpose." Charter of the City of Los Angeles, § 119b, Stats. of 1911, p. 2113.

[2] Under this provision it is contended that the city has no power to permit the use of any part of a public park for the maintenance of a power line or of a railroad, either above, on, or below the surface of the ground; that the use of park lands for such purposes would be unlawful, and the city would not have the power to condemn land for park purposes subject to a use prohibited by the charter; therefore, they say, it follows that the use which the city intends to make of the land sought to be taken is not, and under the law cannot be, consistent with the continuance in use of such land for pole line purposes, or for the projected subway, and neither the court, the city council, nor any other tribunal would have the power to find or declare that the use of the land for park purposes was consistent with its use for any other purpose, and for these reasons that the court was not only not required to pass upon the question of consistency, but was without any power whatsoever to do so.

In response to the above contention we may observe, by the way, that the ordinance upon which respondent relies does except from condemnation certain railroad rights of way located within the limits of the proposed park, and those exceptions are carried into the judgment of condemnation. It is also worthy of note that the pole line and the right of way for a subway pertain to a railroad which extends beyond the city limits and is under state control. If respondent's theory of the case is to be accepted, it will follow that a state or interstate railway, having established rights of way, tracks, and depots within the city, may be excluded from the city by virtue of a city ordinance ordering that the lands thus occupied shall be taken and included within a city park, and the courts must obey such legislative mandate by condemning the property, without the right to make any inquiry as to the consistency of the public uses, or to prescribe conditions under which the several uses may coexist. Under the statutes to which we have referred, we do not perceive that any such extraordinary limitations have been drawn around the judicial power as vested in the courts. And giving to the above-quoted section of the city charter its full effect in any case to which, within the limits of the state Constitution, it may be applied, it means no more than that, when land has been acquired by the city for park uses, such land shall not thereafter be appropriated to other uses.

[3] Respondent's counsel insist that the use of the land occupied by appellants for pole line purposes is not a public use, because the power is furnished only to the railway company, and not to the general public. They rely upon authorities which they claim in support of the proposition that a power pole line furnishing electric power to operate the cars of a railway company is not a part of the railroad or a necessary adjunct thereto, in aid of which such company would be entitled to exercise the power of eminent domain. Conspicuous among the decisions to which they refer is Re Condemnation of Land by Rhode Island Suburban Railway Co., 22 R. I. 455, 48 Atl. 590. The action was one wherein the railway company sought to condemn a lot for a power house, to generate electricity for its lines of road for coal pockets for the storage of coal, and for a conduit to carry water from the river to the engine. The Supreme Court of Rhode Island set aside the judgment in favor of petitioner and ordered a new trial. The court conceded that it is not always necessary that the public use be direct and obvious.

"There is a class of cases where the public does not use the land itself, and yet the public necessity is so direct and obvious as to imply a public use. Such, for example, are cases of taking land for engine houses, car houses, and repair shops on steam railroads. These buildings must necessarily be contiguous to the railroad; and, while the public may not use the buildings as such, yet they are of such a character that without them the public could not adequately use the railroad itself. They are, in fact, a part of the railroad. In some cases land for the storage of wood and coal for steam railroads has been held to be taken for a public use. In all these cases, however, a particular location is made necessary because of the requirements of a steam railroad."

The court was of the opinion that these considerations do not apply to an electric railroad, since in the latter case there is a wide area of location and consequent freedom of choice, as contrasted with the imperative necessity which is usually found on steam railroads for a particular location.

"Neither is it of interest to the public whether the cars are run by trolley or by storage batteries. The company is not limited to a particular location for a power house, for coal pockets, or for a water supply."

The foregoing decision was discussed in Rockingham County Light & Power Co. v. Hobbs, 72 N. H. 531, 58 Atl. 46, 66 L. R. A. 581, where that court expressed a different view of the matter, and pointed out the reason why greater freedom of choice of location in the case of an electric road does not interfere with the element of necessity in determining the right of condemnation.

"It is probable that in many cases the establishment and operation of electric railways for the accommodation of the public will depend upon the possibility of generating or collecting electricity at a low cost. A water power, or a port at which coal may be landed from seagoing vessels directly into the coal pockets of a power house, will render it possible to furnish electric railway facilities for public use at points situated many miles distant from the water power or port that could not otherwise be furnished at all, or at least without much greater cost to the public. In such cases the imperativeness of the necessity attaches to the freedom of choice as to location, rather than to the proximity of a particular location to the railroad line. If land adjoining an electric railway may be taken for a power house—as to which there can be no doubt—no good reason is apparent why land at a distance may not be taken if the public good so requires. Of course, if land located at a distance may be taken for a power house, it must follow that necessary land or rights in land may be taken for constructing and maintaining a line of wires between the power house and the railway."

Without entering into a discussion of the lines of decision illustrated above—there being apparently no California decision directly meeting the specific case—we are of the opinion that the power pole lines in question here are devoted to a public use as part of the railway system operated by the Pacific Electric Railway Company.

[4] In their principal essentials, electric railroads now have the same legal status as steam railroads. Civ. Code, § 465a.

Section 465, Civil Code, says:

"Every railroad corporation has power: * * *

3. To purchase, * * * hold and use all such real estate and other property as may be absolutely necessary for the construction and maintenance of such railroads, and for all stations, depots and other purposes necessary to successfully work and conduct the business of the road. * * *

"4. To lay out its road * * * and to construct and maintain the same, * * * with such appendages and adjuncts as may be necessary for the convenient use of the same. * * *

"7. To purchase lands * * * to be used in the construction and maintenance of its road, and all necessary appendages and adjuncts, or acquire them in the manner provided in title seven, part three, Code of Civil Procedure, for the condemnation of lands. * * *

Since, as we have concluded, parcels 43, 46, and 46½ have been dedicated to public use, it becomes the duty of the court to determine, as a matter of fact, the issue raised as to the consistency or inconsistency of that use with the proposed park use. If the respective uses are not, in fact, wholly inconsistent, then it was the further duty of the court to fix the terms and conditions of condemnation by the city, and the manner and extent of use of the property "for each of such purposes."

[5, 6] The same result would follow as to the so-called subway parcels, if in fact they were devoted to public use as subways of the railroad prior to the commencement of proceedings by the city for the creation of the proposed park. As to each of these parcels, the finding of fact, based upon undisputed evidence, is:

That the land was purchased and is held by the defendant Los Angeles Pacific Land Company "for a special and peculiar purpose and use, to wit, for the purpose of constructing therein, thereunder, and over, and in and along its lands extending from a point in the vicinity of Fourth and Hill streets in the city of Los Angeles, in a general westerly and southerly direction through said parcel to the westerly city limits of the city of Los Angeles and beyond to a point of connection in the railroad of the Pacific Electric Railway Company at or near Vineyard station, a railroad to be operated through a subway; but in this connection the court finds the fact to be that said land was not at the commencement of this action and is not now, and never has been, used for such purposes, and, further, that said defendant has not acquired either the fee to or easements or rights of way under or over, or any other interests in, such entire strip of land between said terminal points as would be necessary in order to enable it to construct and operate such railroad, nor has it acquired any franchise so to do."

Although the title to the parcels in question is held in the name of the land company, the consideration therefor was paid by the railway company, and the land is held for its use for the purpose stated in the findings. The entire expenditures made by the defendant in purchasing the property required by it for the proposed subway exceeded $2,000,000, and there is a great public need for a subway, to relieve the congestion of traffic on the street surfaces of the city. The enterprise, although delayed, has not been, in any sense of the word, abandoned by the railway company. About 90 per cent. of the right of way therefor has been acquired. All of this is shown by uncontradicted evidence. The judgment of the court below, in its relation to the matter of the subway, proceeds upon the theory that, under the facts found, these parcels were not already devoted to public use, but should be treated as private property.

"It is property appropriated to public use, which is * * * protected from condemnation except 'for a more necessary public use'; and as to lands owned by defendant, but which have not been thus appropriated, and are not likely in the future to be needed for the existing public use, the inhibition does not apply." Southern Pac. R. R. Co. v. So. Cal. Ry. Co., 111 Cal. 221, 43 Pac. 602.

In that case it was clear that the strip of land sought to be condemned—although located within the limits of a tract acquired by defendant as part of its right of way—was not in use by the defendant, and would not probably be needed for railroad purposes.

es. The defendant had completed its road upon adjacent land, and had ample room thereon for its business. We are plainly left to infer that, if the execution of its plans had been merely unfinished, and if the orderly completion of the work under those plans had required that defendant use for railroad purposes the land sought to be condemned for the use of the plaintiff, the claimed prior devotion thereof to public use by the defendant would have been sustained. From the findings quoted above, it seems that the court, in determining that the parcels in question have not been appropriated to a public use, placed its principal stress upon the facts that appellants have not yet acquired title to all of the property necessary to complete the strip over which they expect to construct the proposed lines, and have not obtained any franchise allowing the road to be constructed across the streets which intersect the strip. We cannot subscribe to the doctrine that no part of a right of way may be considered as having been devoted to the public use for which it has been acquired, until all of the right of way has been acquired. That rule would place unreasonable and unnecessary obstacles in the way of such enterprises. It is sufficient that a corporation in charge of a public use, in the due prosecution of its enterprise, has lawfully obtained for that use property necessary therefor, with a reasonable prospect that the work will be carried to completion. And the prior ownership of a franchise relating to street crossings is not essential to the right to condemn, or to hold for the proposed use, other portions of the right of way. Tuolumne Water, etc., Co. v. Frederick, 13 Cal. App. 498, 110 Pac. 134.

[7, 8] It is our opinion that the court in its findings should have determined as a matter of fact, both as to the pole line and the subway parcels, whether they had been devoted to a public use, and that upon this issue the burden of proof was upon the defendants. If either of them was devoted to a public use, then the court should have determined as a matter of fact whether that and the proposed use were consistent, and on this issue the burden of proof was upon the plaintiff to show that the uses were not consistent, and that they were not on any reasonably possible terms capable of continuing together on the parcels sought to be condemned. The general principle that the state will not exercise the power of eminent domain any further than the necessity of the public requires is recognized by the provisions of the Code to which we have referred. Therefore, after the defendants in a case like this have shown that their land is devoted to a public use for which the right of condemnation might be exercised in their behalf, they are protected from destructive interference unless the city can establish by sufficient evidence that in fact the use for park purposes cannot coexist with continued use of the property by the defendants.

[9] Appellants claim that the court in making its interlocutory judgment erred in refusing to reserve this action for further orders covering the matter of taxes and assessments accrued subsequent to the commencement of the action and levied by the city of Los Angeles. In accordance with the findings of fact, the court allowed to the defendants certain sums covering the values of the parcels of land to be condemned, of which it was specified that certain portions of the aggregate sums represented taxes and assessments which became liens upon said parcels subsequent to the filing of this action, and which the defendants have paid or owe. The defendants requested that the interlocutory judgment contain a provision reserving the case for further consideration in order that the respective defendants may receive, in addition to the awards therein provided for, the amount of any and all taxes and assessments upon parcels of land owned by them respectively which shall have been levied or accrued or become a lien upon said premises at the time of payment of the awards herein. With this request the court did not comply, and we think that the refusal was justified. In section 1249, Code of Civil Procedure, it is provided that for the purpose of assessing compensation and damages (when, as in this case, the issue is tried within one year after the date of commencement of the action):

"The right thereof shall be deemed to have accrued at the date of the issuance of summons, and its actual value at that date shall be the measure of compensation for all property to be actually taken. * * * If an order be made letting the plaintiff into possession, as provided in section 1254, the compensation and damages awarded shall draw lawful interest from the date of such order. * * *

Section 1254 states the conditions under which, pending an appeal from the judgment, a plaintiff who has paid into court, for the defendant, the required sums, may take possession of and use the property until the final conclusion of the litigation. The property is not taken, so as to interfere with the defendants' ownership of their property, until the compensation is made to, or paid into court for, the owner. These facts draw a line of distinction between the case in hand and the New York decisions relied upon by appellants. In re Mayor, etc., of the City of New York, 40 App. Div. 281, 58 N. Y. Supp. 58; In re Morris Avenue in the City of New York, 118 App. Div. 117, 103 N. Y. Supp. 180. Those cases arose under statutes whereby the actual appropriation of property occurred at a time prior to the ascertainment of the amount of damages to be paid. Manifestly the defendants could not be charged with subsequent taxes against property which they had ceased to own. Therefore the city was not permitted to retain, out of the award made in the condemnation proceedings, the amount of such tax assessments. Section 1249, Code of Civil Procedure, "excludes all consideration of other than the value of the property at the date of the issuance of the summons in the action." City of Los Angeles v. Gager, 10 Cal. App. 378, 102 Pac. 17.

[10] It is next claimed that the court erred in refusing to make an award to defendant Pacific Electric Railway Company for the taking of power pole line parcel 46½. Respondent replies that in fact the term "parcel 46½" was not used to designate any parcel of land sought to be taken, but was a term adopted merely for convenience, to indicate that portion of the pole line which had been built across certain parcels designated by appropriate numbers, and which were all owned by defendants other than these appellants, and awards were made to the owners for the taking thereof. To this appellants reply that the bill of exceptions is stipulated to contain all of the evidence in the case and a full and true copy "of all of the judgment roll, except the pleadings of defendants other than the above-named defendants, which said pleadings of said other defendants do not relate to or in any manner affect the rights of the above named defendants-appellants herein, and have no bearing upon the issues raised by the said defendants-appellants in the superior court"; and appellants say that there is no evidence to the effect that there is or was any other owner of parcel 46½ or any interest therein, except the Pacific Electric Railway Company, who was in occupation of the same under claim of dedication, and who was devoting the same to public use, that the evidence is absolutely all one way on this point, and that therefore the court erred in failing to award to appellants the value of the right of way. While it does appear in the findings and judgment that the court found that this land belonged to other defendants and did award to other defendants sums for the taking thereof, appellants claim that under this bill of exceptions, which contains all of the evidence in the cause, that those findings and those awards were entirely without the support of any evidence. In the answer of defendants they describe the so-called power pole line parcel 46½, allege their ownership thereof and devotion thereof to public use, and further say:

"That said parcels of land constitute a part of a right of way for said transmission power line, as an adjunct to the railroad of the defendant, and if said parcels of land are taken without reserving to these defendants the right to hereafter maintain and operate said high-power transmission line, this defendant and said remaining portion of said lands will be damaged in the sum of $1,000,000; that the defendant Pacific Electric Railway Company now owns, and has for many years heretofore owned and been in possession of, a right of way through" certain lands, describing the same in detail.

Testimony was introduced by the defendants showing the facts with reference to the dedication of the land to public use and the acquirement of title to a perpetual pole line easement by the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Basing their argument upon the facts thus shown, appellants contend that the owner of the land, by permitting the railway company to enter thereon and establish its public use, thereby dedicated the land to public use so that the title to the land, so far as necessary to that public use, passed to the company; that is, a perpetual easement; that the defendant has therefore a title to this power pole line easement by dedication, and not by adverse possession. It has been held in the case of public service corporations that when it appears that, although the entry was originally without right, the owner permitted the corporation to make an entry on his land and complete and construct works for which his land was appropriated, and failed to bring an action until after public interests, by reason of the construction, have intervened, the right of the owner to maintain ejectment is denied, and he is remitted to an action for damages alone. Gurnsey v. Northern California Power Co., 160 Cal. 699, 709, 117 Pac. 906, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 185. It follows, say appellants, that they are entitled to compensation for the taking of this land, although their title was an easement only.

To the foregoing the respondent replies that the answer contains only an allegation of ownership by the defendants of a right of way over the land. Transcript fols. 477-493. Respondent denies that the testimony shows a dedication thereof to public use and the acquiring of title to a perpetual or any pole line easement. This argument seems to be based upon the previous argument that the use of a pole line for the purposes described is not a public use. It is admitted by respondent that the testimony shows the construction of the pole line and its use for transmission of power to the railway company, but respondent says this does not prove that any title to an easement has been acquired. Respondent's Brief, p. 163 et seq.

"Not only did they fail to introduce any testimony to that end, but, even had they done so, the finding of the court that the title to the land embraced in the parcels traversed by this portion of the pole line was in other parties was equivalent to a finding against the contention of these appellants."

We are inclined to the view that Gurnsey v. Northern California Power Co., supra, recognizes that under the circumstances there stated the easement acquired by the corporation became a substantial property right, the value of which would have to be accounted for by any other party seeking to enforce a superior right of eminent domain upon the same premises. The owners of the fee, therefore, are not entitled to all of the compensation to be allowed for the taking of the land, if the right of way is to be included in the condemnation without any reservation of further right of use thereof by the defendants.

It is deemed unnecessary to review in detail the several other claims by appellants that the findings do not cover all of the issues raised by the answer, and that the evidence is insufficient to support certain findings. Assuming that upon another trial the court will apply to the case the principles which we have endeavored to make clear in this decision, it is not to be expected that the findings then made will omit any necessary fact, or leave room for doubt as to their meaning.

The judgment and order are reversed.

SECURITY LIFE INS. CO. OF AMERICA v. BOOMS et al. (Civ. 1462.)

1. TRIAL $\hookrightarrow$ 391—FINDING—ISSUE.

In an action to cancel a policy of life insurance on the ground that when the application was accepted, and when the premium was paid and the policy delivered, the insured was not in good health, alleging that the plaintiff had no knowledge thereof until after her death, and where the evidence as to knowledge was conflicting, the plaintiff was entitled to a finding thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 914; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 391.]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR $\hookrightarrow$ 931(4) — REVIEW — FINDING.

Where appellant was entitled to a finding upon an issue of fact, but the findings were silent thereon, the appellate court must determine the case as if the finding had been in favor of the appellant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3764; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 931(4).]

3. INSURANCE $\hookrightarrow$ 291(1)—REPRESENTATIONS—RISK—HEALTH.

An applicant for life insurance is bound to disclose such changes in his physical condition as occur pending the negotiation as would influence the insurer's judgment as to the advisability of accepting the risk.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 681; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 291(1).]

4. INSURANCE $\hookrightarrow$ 291(1)—REPRESENTATIONS—SICKNESS—PENDING DELIVERY OF POLICY.

Civ. Code, § 2577, declares the completion of a contract of insurance to be the time to which a representation must be presumed to refer. An application for life insurance declared that the policy should not take effect until the premium was paid and the policy delivered. The insured in her application stated that she had not any of the diseases mentioned or any illness other than as specifically stated by her. She was attacked by typhoid fever after making the application and before delivery of the policy. Held that on such delivery, in the absence of insured's knowledge of her sickness, the policy was properly rescinded.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Action by the Security Life Insurance Company of America against Lena M. Scott Booms and others, with cross-complaint by defendant Booms. Judgment that plaintiff take nothing on its complaint and judgment for defendant on the cross-complaint, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

C. R. Allen, of Los Angeles, and B. E. Tarver, of Santa Ana, for appellant. Head & Marks, of Fullerton, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. On or about October 12, 1910, Mary L. Young made application to appellant for an insurance policy upon her life, to be issued in favor of her daughter Lena M. Scott, who is the respondent Lena M. Scott Booms. In that application she agreed that the statements therein made by her were full, complete, and true, and should, in the absence of fraud, be deemed representations and not warranties. It was further agreed therein that the policy should not take effect until acceptance of the application and payment of the first premium. Payment of the first premium was completed and the policy was delivered on the 18th day of November, 1910. The application contained answers to questions asking whether the applicant had theretofore had any of certain named diseases, the list not including typhoid fever. The following question was, "Have you had any illness, disease, or injury other than as stated by you above?" to which a negative answer was returned. In February, 1911, Mrs. Young was afflicted with appendicitis, and after an operation therefor she died. On or about the 3d day of November, 1910, Mrs. Young became ill with typhoid fever. The disease ran its course in about 10 or 12 days, and she was substantially recovered therefrom on the 18th day of November. The evidence does not show that the appendicitis was in any way consequent upon the typhoid fever, and we shall assume that the two diseases were entirely separate and disconnected. After proof of death of Mary L. Young had been made in connection with respondent's claim on the policy, the plaintiff commenced this action to obtain cancellation of the policy, basing its demand upon the allegation that at the time said application for insurance was accepted by the plaintiff, and also at the time when the premium was paid and the policy delivered, Mary L. Young was not in good health, but was then and there seriously ill. It was further alleged that immediately upon being informed of the condition of the said Mary L. Young's health and illness as above stated, which was not until after the death of said Mary L. Young, the plaintiff tendered to the defendant the amount of the premium paid, and demanded return of the policy for cancellation, which demand was refused. By her answer respondent denied said allegations as to illness of Mrs. Young; denied that the plaintiff did not learn of Mrs. Young's illness until on or about the 23d day of November, 1911, but alleged that plaintiff was fully advised of such illness during the time thereof, to wit, between the 3d and 11th days of November, 1910; alleged that such illness existed only between the 3d and 11th days of November, 1910. The defendant filed a cross-complaint, seeking to recover judgment on the policy, to which an answer was filed, setting up the same facts as were alleged in the complaint. Judgment was entered to the effect that the plaintiff recover nothing on its complaint, and also was in favor of the defendant as demanded in her cross-complaint. The court's findings of fact state that Mary L. Young was in good health from the 10th day of October, 1910, until the 3d or 4th day of November, 1910, and that she was in good health on the 18th day of November, 1910; also that the application for insurance was accepted on the 1st day of November, 1910, and that the policy was delivered and the premium paid on the 18th day of that month.

[1, 2] The findings are silent concerning the question as to plaintiff's knowledge of any illness of the assured during said month of November. The evidence shows that no information came to the corporation concerning that illness until after the death of Mrs. Young, unless such information is shown by the disputed evidence that the agent who received and forwarded the application, and who delivered the policy and collected the premium, visited the house of the assured during her said illness early in November, 1910. It was further agreed that the acceptance of the application should be by the company at its executive office in Chicago, Ill., and the policy named certain officers who alone should have power to make or modify the contract or make any promise or representation concerning the same. Assuming only for the purpose of the argument that the company would have been bound by knowledge of said agent concerning the illness in question, it follows that appellant was entitled to a finding upon this issue of fact, and we must determine the remaining question in the case as if the finding had been in favor of the plaintiff; that is, that the plaintiff was without knowledge or notice of Mrs. Young's illness until after the delivery of the policy and after the death of the assured.

[3] "The completion of the contract of insurance is the time to which a representation must be presumed to refer." Civ. Code, § 2577. "It is well settled that the obligation rests upon an applicant for life insurance to disclose such changes in his physical condition as occur pending the negotiation as would influence the judgment of the company as to the advisability of accepting the risk," Thompson v. Travelers Insurance Co., 13 N. D. 444, 101 N. W. 900. The decisions generally are to the same effect. See note in 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 983.

[4] Since, in accordance with the section of the Civil Code quoted above, the representations contained in the application must, in this case, be deemed to refer to the time when the premium was paid and the policy delivered, it follows that the assured at that time represented that she had not had any of the diseases to which she returned a negative answer, and had not had any illness or disease other than as specifically stated by her. To say that these representations may be ignored in the instance of a person who receives a life insurance policy immediately following upon an attack of typhoid fever would be to deny one of the most important rights of the contracting party. The inherent probability that the plaintiff would have hesitated to issue a policy upon the life of Mrs. Young at that particular time raises to very substantial importance its right to have been informed of the facts.

The appeal is from the judgment, and the judgment is reversed.

OCEAN ACCIDENT & GUARANTEE CO. et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 7575.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 8, 1916.)

1. STATUTES $\Leftrightarrow$ 226—CONSTRUCTION—ADOPTION.

Where a foreign statute which has been construed by the courts of the foreign country is adopted, the construction by the foreign courts is also adopted.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT $\Leftrightarrow$ 375(2)—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—CONSTRUCTION.

Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 283) § 12 (a), declares that liability for the compensation provided by the act in lieu of any other liability shall, without regard to negligence, exist against any employer for any personal injury sustained by his employes by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment, and for the death of any such employe if the injury shall proximately cause death in those cases where, at the time of the accident, the employe is performing services growing out of and incidental to his employment, and is acting within the course of his employment. The engineer of a tugboat, who went ashore at a time when the tug was moored away from its usual berth, so that those debarking therefrom had to cross another steamer, in returning to the tug in the early morning crossed the steamer, to discover that the tug had been moved to its usual berth, and in making his way back to the wharf fell into the bay and was drowned. Held, that in such case, though the captain saw the engineer and called to him, he was not acting within the course of his employment at the time, so no recovery might be had under the act, for an employe in going to and returning from his work is not acting within the course of his employment, though his journey takes him over public roads or private ways.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT $\Leftrightarrow$ 375(2)—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—CONSTRUCTION.

In such case, a seaman or other employe is entitled to the benefits of the act while using the instrumentality provided by the master to reach the shore from the ship, or, if injured in attempting to embark or debark, where no particular means is provided.

In Bank. Application by the Ocean Accident & Guarantee Company and others for a writ of review directed against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California, and others, to review an award for the death of William J. Slattery, the engineer of a tugboat. Award annulled.

L. A. Redman and Jewel Alexander, both of San Francisco, for petitioners. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Review to consider an award of the Industrial Accident Commission: William J. Slattery was engineer of the fishing tug Condare, owned by the Borzone Fish Company. Upon an afternoon in January she was moored in her customary berth—a wharf between piers 23 and 25, on the San Francisco waterfront. The weather was stormy, and the captain of the tug considered it expedient to move his vessel from this wharf to a place alongside of the schooner Crescent City. The Crescent City lay next to the steamer Moana, which last vessel was moored to pier 25, a short distance away from the Condare's usual berth. As thus placed, to go ashore from the Condare necessitated debarking from the Condare to the Crescent City, crossing the Crescent City, climbing onto the Moana, crossing her, and from her reaching the wharf. Slattery knew the position of the Condare, and knew also that it was a temporary location, chosen for protection against the stormy weather. After the tug was thus moored, he went ashore for purposes of his own, unconnected with his employment, and spent the night on shore. It was a Saturday night. It was Slattery's duty to return to his vessel before 4 o'clock upon the following morning. Not having so returned, the captain of the tug went to the boarding house where Slattery spent the night and had him called for duty. It was Slattery's duty to have reported on his vessel without any such summons. Slattery did not know that the tug during the night had been shifted back, as in fact it had, to its own berth. He went to pier 25, safely crossed the Moana and the Crescent City, and discovered that his vessel was not there. He then called from the deck of the Crescent City "What are you doing over there?" Capt. Johnson, of the Condare, hearing the call and recognizing Slattery's voice, replied, "I don't know, Bill, come on over here." Slattery answered, "All right," and, seeking to return to the wharf and thence to his vessel, fell into the bay between the Crescent City and the Moana and was drowned.

This fairly epitomizes the facts, though there are certain statements in the findings of the commission which are in the nature of deductions or conclusions from these unquestioned facts which call for animadversion. Thus it is in terms declared that when Slattery hailed his ship and was told by the captain to "Come on over here" Slattery had "reported for duty, and was directed by his superior to proceed to the boat Condare at its changed position." These statements must be treated as conclusions of law, for as findings of fact they are utterly without evidence to sustain them. The unquestioned facts are that it was Slattery's duty to report to his boat without any instruction, and that he was no more on duty when standing upon the deck of the Crescent City than when he was summoned at his hotel, and that the captain's call to him to "Come on over here" (since it was Slattery's duty to go to his ship without any instructions), amounted to no more than telling Slattery the location of the ship. Again it is found that the captain of the Condare "caused Slattery to be called at the hotel where said Slattery was staying, but did not leave word nor advise said Slattery with regard to the position of the boat Condare." The evidence establishes without conflict that the captain caused Slattery to be called because Slattery had failed in the performance of his express duty, which was to report to the ship at a given hour, and the fact that the captain did not tell Slattery—a man knowing the usual berth of the ship and familiar with the San Francisco water front—that the Condare was at its usual berth is a circumstance immaterial to this consideration, since there was not the slightest duty upon the captain's part so to tell him. Eliminating, then, from this consideration such declarations as those above noted, which, if they are to be regarded as findings, are findings absolutely unsupported by the evidence, and if they are to be regarded as conclusions of law are conclusions of law erroneously drawn, we are enabled to approach the one real question in controversy, and we do so with the disposition to give to the terms of the act the utmost liberality of construction of which they are legally capable, to the end of effectuating the beneficent purposes of the act itself.

[1-3] So far as affects this question, the employer's liability or nonliability rests upon the construction to be given to section 12 (a) and subdivision 2 of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Stats. 1913, p. 283. That law is as follows:

Section 12 (a). "Liability for the compensation provided by this act, in lieu of any other liability whatsoever, shall, without regard to negligence, exist against any employer for any personal injury sustained by his employes by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment and for the death of any such employe if the injury shall proximately cause death, in those cases where the following conditions of compensation concur: * * * 2. Where, at the time of the accident, the employe is performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment and is acting within the course of his employment as such."

Admittedly the deceased was an employe of the petitioner. Admittedly he met his death while, in the broadest sense, he was such employe. The question is: At the time he met his death was he "performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment and acting within the course of his employment"? It will be noted that section 12 (a) expresses the conditions generally under which compensation for injury shall be paid. It is to be paid when and only when the injury is a personal injury sustained by the employe "by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment." It will also be noted that subdivision 2, having specific reference to compensation in the event of death, does not broaden the right to this compensation beyond the language just quoted, but, if anything, perhaps restricts it, and certainly makes it more specific by the added declaration that, to entitle the representatives of the deceased to recover in the case of death, the employe must not only be "performing a service growing out of and incidental to his employment," but must also be "acting within the course of his employment as such." Therefore it is quite within the meaning of the statute to say that the controlling language found in section 12 (a) is not modified, but merely paraphrased and made more definite, by the language of subdivision 2. Next it is pertinent to call attention to the fact that this language, injury "by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment," is language taken literally from the Workmen's Compensation Act of England, enacted by Parliament in 1897, section 1 of that act declaring that an employer shall be liable "if in any employment to which this act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman" L. R. Stats. 60-61 Victoria, p. 53. This language, then, had been for many years upon the English statute books before it was adopted and made a part of the Employers Workmen's Compensation Act of this state, and the courts of England had been called upon, as was inevitable, to construe, this phrase many times before our enactment of it. Under familiar principles, when a statute which has received judicial construction by the courts of one state is adopted and re-enacted by another state, it is so adopted and re-enacted in consonance with the construction put upon it by the courts of the first sovereignty. The common sense of this rule of construction is so apparent that it needs in its support nothing more than the obvious suggestion that if the later lawmakers did not design that the construction put upon any given language should obtain, they would modify and change that language to express their different intent.

We may now with profit consider these English adjudications, and, first, those upon which respondent places reliance. In Robertson v. Allan Bros. & Co., 1 B. W. C. C. 172, the steward of a steamship went on shore in the evening under permission, for his own purposes. He returned late in the evening and proceeded to board his ship by means of the cargo skid or stage which stretched from the ship to the quay. It was a breach of discipline to use the skid, but it was frequently used by members of the crew. In stepping from the skid to the deck he slipped or stumbled, fell down the unguarded hatch into the hold, and died from the effect of the injuries which he sustained. It was not disputed that the accident "arose out of his employment." The question debated was whether it was "in the course of his employment." It was held by the Master of Rolls that in view of all the circumstances the accident occurred in the course of the employment. In Moore v. Manchester Liners, Limited, 3 B. W.

C. C. 527, a fireman had gone on shore to procure certain personal necessities. Returning to his ship, he fell off a ladder, which was the only means provided of gaining access from the quay to the ship. The House of Lords held this accident to have befallen the deceased in the course of his employment, Lord Loreburn, L. C., saying:

"In these circumstances it was not, I think, contested that the accident which caused death arose out of the employment; the danger of falling from a ladder which gave the only access from the quay to the ship being, in its nature, incidental to the service of a seaman."

In Keyser v. Burdick & Co., 4 B. W. C. C. 87, a riveter working on a ship at the dock was about to go ashore. Coming on deck, he found that the vessel was being moved to a dry dock, and was already a short distance from the quay. The gangway had been removed. There was no other means of getting ashore than by sliding down a rope, which still held the vessel to the quay. A fellow workman had thus gone ashore in safety. Keyser attempted to follow him. The rope gave way. He was thrown against the quay and injured. The Master of the Rolls said:

"I am satisfied there is no ground for this appeal. The man, when he came on deck, wanted to get ashore, and he found that the vessel was a little away from the quay side, and that the gangway had gone. He saw one of his mates use the rope, and he followed, but he met with an accident. The county court judge found that, in the circumstances, this was a reasonable step to take by the man to get off the ship, when the regular means of exit was closed. We cannot interfere with his findings."

In Kearon v. Kearon, 4 B. W. C. C. 435, a seaman was on shore leave. When he returned his vessel was some five or six feet from the pier, the top of the ship's rail being about three feet lower than the quay. No gangway had been provided, but a ladder was used in getting on board. Not seeing the ladder, he hailed the ship, and, receiving no answer, jumped from the pier to the vessel. His leg struck on the rail, and he was permanently injured. There was no question but that the accident occurred in the course of his employment. The proposition debated was whether or not the seaman had taken a wantonly reckless step in his effort to reach the ship, and it was held that he had not. In the cases of Kitchenham v. Steamship Johannesburg and Leach v. Oakley-Street & Co., 4 B. W. C. C. 91, two seamen on different ships had been ashore for their own purposes. They were both drowned before reaching their ships. In the Leach Case access was obtained to the ship by a ladder extending from the wharf to the ship. As the sailor was mounting this ladder his foot slipped, he fell between the ship and the wharf, and was drowned. Fletcher Moulton, L. J., delivering the judgment, first pointed out that:

"Any accident that occurs during the period of his being on shore is generally, if not necessarily, due to a danger to which he is exposed as a member of the public, and not as one of the crew on the ship, and therefore is one which does not 'arise out of his employment,'" —and the opinion proceeds as follows:

"But if, whether in his hours of leisure or not, it becomes necessary for him, in fulfillment of his employment, to get on board his vessel, an accident occurring in his doing so is normally an accident arising out of his employment, because it is due to a danger incidental to his service in that ship. In the cases before us the accident occurred on the return of the seaman to the ship immediately prior to his actually getting on board. This is the critical moment when the dangers to which he is exposed change from being of the one class to being of the other class, and it will frequently be a difficult task to draw the line between the two. But I do not think it difficult to lay down the general principle by which our decisions ought to be guided. The return to the ship is in the course of his employment, but the risks do not become risks arising out of his employment until he has to do something specifically connected with his employment on the ship. Thus, if the risk is one due to the means of access to the ship, as in Moore v. Manchester Liners, Ltd., the accident is rightly said to arise out of his employment; but if the accident is shown to arise from something not specifically connected with the ship, it cannot be said to arise out of his employment. I do not think that the dividing line is when he actually touches the ship or the special means of access thereto. For instance, if it was shown that when the sailor returned to the ship there was a dense fog, and that in trying to find the gangway, which I will suppose was not lighted, he fell into the water and was drowned. I think the accident would arise out of his employment. But if all that is shown is that it occurred during his return to the ship, but while he was still on the shore, and before he had taken any specific step towards getting on board the vessel, I think that it would not thereby be established that the accident arose out of his employment."

In the Kitchenham Case access to the ship was by a gangway. The evidence showed that the sailor on returning to the ship came upon the wharf and walked toward the gangway. It was not shown that he ever reached the gangway. "A splash was heard a little abaft the inboard end of the gangway." Says the court:

"It is for the applicant to prove that the accident arose out of the employment; and, if the evidence is not sufficient to establish this, the claim fails."

And it was held that the evidence failed to establish a case for compensation. In Jackson v. General Steam Fishing Co., Ltd., 2 B. W. C. C. 56, a workman was employed to watch trawlers as they lay in the harbor. His duties compelled him to be on the quay to which the trawlers were moored. In the course of his watch he left the boats and went to a hotel for refreshment. He was absent a short time, had returned to the quay, and, while descending a fixed ladder attached to the quay to go on board one of the trawlers, he fell into the water and was drowned. He was in the performance of his duty in leaving the quay to go onto the trawler. He used the means provided and at hand, and it was held that he met his accident in the course of his employment. This completes a review of the cases cited and relied upon by respondent. From them we will turn to petitioner's authorities.

In Walters v. Staveley Coal & Iron Co., Ltd., 4 B. W. C. C. 303, a miner was proceeding to his work along a footpath prepared by his employers for their workmen's convenience. He slipped and sustained injury. There was evidence that the employers knew that the footpath was not safe. The question considered by the House of Lords was: Did the accident "arise out of the employment, and did it arise in the course of the employment"? It was held that there was "no evidence which would have justified a finding that the accident arose out of the employment," and it was declared to be immaterial that the employé was injured upon this footpath prepared for his use by his employers, "since the man was merely going to his employment." In Gilmour v. Dorman, Long & Co., Ltd., 4 B. W. C. C. 279, a workman was injured upon vacant land belonging to his employer, over which for many years he had been in the habit of going to and from his work, by walking along a footpath over the land. The Master of the Rolls holding that the accident did not arise out of his employment, declared:

"I cannot regard the case as in any way different from the case where a man slips on the ice on a public road, a quarter of a mile from his employer's works. It has been repeatedly held that a man is not entitled to the protection of the act when on his way from his home to the works."

Dealing specifically with seamen, Leach v. Oakley, Street & Co. has already been discussed. In Biggart v. Steamship Minnesota, 5 B. W. C. C. 69, a seaman had gone ashore on leave, for his own purposes. He returned late at night, and found that his ship had been moved to another part of the dock. He proceeded to make his way to the ship along the dock side, on which were many railway lines. He was injured by a train on the docks 200 yards from his ship. Said the Master of the Rolls:

"This appeal seems more hopeless than any we have had to deal with. * * * The accident took place 200 yards from the ship. That was not an accident 'arising out of.'"

Other cases not dealing specifically with ships and their crews, but having a bearing upon the question of what constitutes an injury "arising out of employment" are Caton v. Summerlee, etc., 39 Scott. L. R. 762, where it was held that a workman who, after finishing his day's work, was injured while walking along a private branch railway leading from the employer's colliery to the main line of a railroad, had not met with an accident arising out of or in the course of his employment. In Leveroni v. Travelers' Insurance Co. (Mass.) 107 N. E. 349, an employé was killed while crossing a railroad track on private property over which it was necessary for him to pass. The court held that the death did not arise out of the employment, and the fact that the deceased was upon private property as a licensee made no difference; that the principle was the same as if he had been killed on a public highway. To like effect is Byrket v. Lake Shore Ry. Co., 29 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 614, affirmed by Ohio Supreme Court, 75 Ohio St. 625, 80 N. E. 1124, where it was held that an injury sustained by a workman while walking on the railroad tracks owned by his employer, while complying with a direction to report for duty, was not an injury arising out of his employment.

With these authorities before us we think the governing principles of all the decisions are not difficult of discernment. The first of these is that there are excluded from the benefits of the act all those accidental injuries which occur while the employé is going to or returning from his work, and it matters not in this respect whether his journey takes him over public roads or private ways. Second, in the case of vessels, a seaman or other employé is entitled to the benefits of the act if injured while using the instrumentality provided in either reaching or departing from his ship, and in case no instrumentality at all is provided, as in Kearon v. Kearon, supra, the injured employé will not be excluded from the benefits of the act if he adopts some perilous means of boarding his ship, as by endeavoring to leap to her deck from the pier. But in the case of an employé seeking to board his vessel, until he has come into such proximity to her as to be using, or immediately about to use, the gang plank, ladder, or other instrumentality "specifically connected with the ship," his accident does not arise out of his employment, this indeed being the precise language of Moulton, L. J., as above quoted in Leach v. Oakley, Street & Co., where he says:

"If the accident is shown to arise from something not specifically connected with the ship, it cannot be said to arise out of his employment."

In the very broadest sense, of course, it is true that an injury which happens to a man who is on his way to his place of employment is an injury "growing out of and incidental to his employment," since a necessary part of the employment is that the employé shall go to and return from his place of labor. But it is to be noted that the right to an award is not founded upon the fact that the injury grows out of and is incidental to his employment. It is founded upon the fact that the service he is rendering at the time of the injury grows out of and is incidental to the employment. Therefore an employé going to and from his place of employment is not rendering any service, and begins to render such service only when, as has been said, arriving at the place of his employment, he proceeds to use some instrumentality provided, by means of which he immediately places himself in a position to perform his tasks.

Such, beyond question, is the reasoning of the cases and the meaning of their adjudications; and, applying this reasoning to the facts in the case at bar, it is too plain to call for lengthy discussion that Slattery, in his progress toward his vessel, had not reached the point where it could be said that he met his death in "performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment."

The award is therefore annulled.

FAHEY v. PANAMA-CALIFORNIA EXPOSITION. (L. A. 4112.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 6, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨278(3)—ACTION FOR INJURY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—APPLIANCES.

In a servant's action for injury by falling from a bridge when a large timber on which he was exerting a leverage was pulled away, evidence held to show that the defendant failed to furnish suitable appliances for the prosecution of the work.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨278(20)—ACTION FOR INJURY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—WARNING.

In such action, evidence held to show that the sudden moving of a timber upon which plaintiff was exerting a leverage, without warning to him, causing him to lose his balance and fall from a bridge, was negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 972; Dec. Dig. ⇨278(20).]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. H. Thomas, Judge.

Action by William Fahey against the Panama-California Exposition. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Eugene Daney, of San Diego, for appellant. Shreve, Reed, Sample & Shreve and Theodore Stensland, all of San Diego, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff was a day-laborer employed by defendant. He was directed to perform certain work on one of the levels of the "Cabrillo Bridge" in Balboa Park in the city of San Diego. That he fell from the bridge while engaged in that employment, and that he was very severely injured is not denied, but appellant takes the position that in any view of the evidence it fails to support the verdict. Respondent insists that the verdict is fully supported, and that the defendant is properly charged with responsibility upon any one of the three following grounds: First, the place in which plaintiff was directed to work was not a reasonably safe place; second, the defendant failed to furnish suitable appliances to plaintiff for the prosecution of the work; and, third, the sudden moving without warning to plaintiff of the timber upon which he was exercising his strength was negligence, on the part of defendant, its servants and agents, sufficient to charge it with responsibility for the injury sustained by plaintiff.

The level upon which Fahey was at work was about 55 feet from the ground. It had been floored during a part of the work, but most of the flooring had been taken away, the plaintiff himself having assisted in the work of removal. There was some testimony that the taking away of the floor was necessary in order that some large pieces of timber 12 by 12 and 16 feet long might be moved along the longitudinal timbers of that level and put in place for the extension of the work. At least one witness testified, however, that this work might have been done just as well and with much greater safety without the removal of the floor. Be that as it may, it appears without conflict that the only floor of that part of the bridge upon which Fahey was called to work was made up of timbers 4 inches wide placed and arranged in parallel pairs, so that the stringers of each pair lay approximately 1 foot apart and the pairs were separated by intervals of about 20 feet. According to Fahey's testimony he was instructed by the engineer to assist in sliding or skidding the 12 by 12 timbers into proper position for attachment to a derrick. Just before the accident he and the engineer were at work moving one of these heavy pieces of wood. A rope was attached to the timber and to a drum or "niggerhead," to which on proper signal power was to be applied. Owing to the position of the timber, it was necessary for the men to move it some distance by hand power and leverage before the pull of the rope from the "niggerhead" could be advantageously applied. Fahey testified that he asked for a "peavy" (a sort of lever commonly used in such work), but was informed that there were none available, and that therefore under instructions from his superior he used as a substitute a 2x6 stick from 4 to 6 feet in length. This he applied as a lever to the 12x12 timber, and was sliding it over when suddenly without warning to him the machinery was started, the huge timber against which he was exerting his strength was pulled away, and as a result he lost his balance and was hurled to the ground.

[1] Appellant's first contention is that the obligation generally resting upon a master to furnish a safe place in which to work does not apply when the danger is only temporary and transitory and arises from the hazard and nature of the work itself and this is known to the servant (citing such authorities as Labatt's Master and Servant, §

269; Bloomfield v. Worster Construction Co., 118 Mo. App. 254, 94 S. W. 304, and Callan v. Bull, 113 Cal. 603-605, 45 Pac. 1017). The contention is made that the very nature of the work of constructing this bridge was such that the defendant might not safeguard its workmen more than it did. The obvious answer to this is that defendant had found it necessary, at an earlier stage of the work, to have a floor laid upon that same level of the bridge for the convenience and safety of its workmen, and that without necessity the temporary flooring was in part removed before the prosecution of the very dangerous task at which Fahey was engaged when he received his injury. But appellant reminds us that Fahey himself assisted in taking up the floor, and consequently accepted all risks ordinarily incident to working upon the stringers. However, it is not material whether the place furnished by defendant was or was not a reasonably safe one. Even if appellant's contention be correct, and even if we grant the position that the evidence fails to establish defendant's negligence in furnishing an unsafe place for its workmen, we are compelled to sustain the judgment of the superior court, because there is evidence to support the contentions that Fahey was put to work without proper instrumentalities for the safe prosecution of his task, and that the sudden, unexpected removal of the large timber precipitated him to the ground.

Appellant meets the second contention of respondent by quoting testimony to the effect that there were plenty of canthooks and peavies provided for work on the bridge, and that Fahey might have procured one very easily. But there was plaintiff's own testimony to the effect that Mr. Barton, the man under whose instructions he was working, had ordered him to use the scantling as a lever. It requires no evidence from experts to convince one of ordinary experience that a man using such a lever would be exerting his strength in a different and more perilous direction than that followed by the wielder of a canthook or peavy. It is not material how many suitable appliances defendant owned if Fahey was ordered to use a scantling by way of a substitute for one of them.

[2] While admitting that the machinery was started and the timber was moved by its power without previous notice to Fahey, appellant's counsel insists that plaintiff could not have been surprised, because, according to Fahey's own testimony, the timber was in motion before and at the time of the accident. A glance at the testimony of the plaintiff, however, reveals the fact that he referred to the motion imparted to the timber by the levers, and not its movement by the pulling of the rope attached to the "nigger-head." He testified in part as follows:

"On this occasion before the timber suddenly moved there was not to my knowledge any signal given. I never seen or heard anybody give a signal. I was signalman at that time, and I should have given a signal; that is, if a signal was necessary. The signal at that time was not necessary because the log I was working on was in motion. Before there was any movement by the power of the engine of that timber I was working on there should have been a signal given by me first. I did not give such signal."

From this testimony it will be seen that, instead of admitting his knowledge that the power of the machinery was being applied, Fahey consistently maintained his position that the sudden removal of the timber on which he was exerting his strength caused the fall which resulted in the injuries for which he sought compensation. That the commonest sort of ordinary care required defendant's servants to give notice before the machinery was set in motion is too obvious for argument. Barton, the engineer, who gave the order to start the machinery, testified that he gave Fahey no warning, although the latter was between him and the man to whom he signaled the instruction to set the machinery in motion. We conclude, therefore, that the judgment and order are supported by proof that defendant failed to supply plaintiff with a suitable appliance for the work at hand, coupled with the negligent starting of the machinery, without warning to Fahey, thus causing him to lose his balance and fall to the ground.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Leonard C. Canfield was convicted of forgery. From an order granting new trial, the People appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Robert M. Clarke, Dep. Atty. Gen., and Tracy C. Becker, Dep. Dist. Atty., of Los Angeles, for the People. Paul W. Schenck, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant, after conviction upon a charge of forgery, moved for a new trial. His motion was granted, and from the order made in that behalf, the people appeal.

Canfield was charged with forging a certain mortgage purporting to have been executed by Justin E. Cook, the owner of the real property described in said mortgage, to secure the payment of a promissory note for $10,000, payable by Cook to one Helmer E. Rabild, who was the mortgagee named in the instrument. The defendant was also charged in a separate count with the forgery of the name of the notary public appearing upon the purported acknowledgment to the mortgage.

The evidence on the part of the prosecution tended to show that defendant, representing himself as Helmer E. Rabild, sold the note and mortgage to Caroline and Flora B. Schertz; that he was paid by check, which he deposited in a bank, drawing from time to time against the account thus established by means of checks signed, "H. E. Rabild." At all times after his arrest the defendant denied that he was Rabild, or that he had forged or negotiated the mortgage and note. The evidence showed that he did admit that he knew Rabild, who, he said, lived in Monrovia, but to whom he was unable to lead an officer, whom he promised to guide to Rabild's home. During this futile trip he was asked by a Mr. Adams if he had executed a certain other mortgage and had acknowledged it before a notary public named Baly. He replied that he had done so, and was then informed that Baly had been in Honolulu at the date of the alleged acknowledgment. At this juncture the officer in charge of the defendant took him aside and said: "Mr. Canfield, you have heard what Mr. Adams asked you. * * * What is the use of keeping us out all day, staying here? It is late now, and we want to all get back"—and said: "Why don't you tell us the truth about it?" He (defendant) said: "All right, I will tell you the truth about it; take me right back into town." It was also in evidence that Canfield told Adams that there was a man named Rabild; that he and Rabild had worked deals together; and that they had participated in a transaction whereby Rabild had procured $4,000 upon a purported sale of realty consummated by means of a forged instrument. It is to be noted, however, that at no time did defendant confess that he forged or negotiated the mortgage set out in the indictment in this case. He denied the allegations contained in said indictment.

In his own behalf defendant introduced evidence by which he sought to establish an alibi. He could not account for every hour of his time—few men can—but the workmen engaged upon a house which defendant was constructing in Los Angeles testified that they were employed on the building nearly all of the time during July, August, and September, and that defendant was there nearly all of the time every day.

It is contended on behalf of the prosecution that the defendant's statement that he had been engaged in the commission of another crime with Rabild was not a confession of guilt of this offense for which he was on trial; that even if it be regarded as such confession, it was given without coercion; that the proof of alleged alibi was so vague as to be of no value; and that the guilt of Canfield was so conclusively established as to render the court's action in granting a new trial an abuse of discretion. It is asserted, therefore, that under section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution it is our duty to set aside the order granting a new trial.

[1] Canfield's statement regarding another crime was not a confession of the offense charged in the indictment before us, but the introduction of testimony regarding a distinct felony was serious error, which must have tended to prevent him from having a fair trial. People v. Stewart, 85 Cal. 174, 24 Pac. 722; People v. Arlington, 123 Cal. 356, 55 Pac. 1003; People v. Elliott, 119 Cal. 593, 51 Pac. 955. There was some evidence that the statement connecting defendant with the vanished Rabild was obtained by promise of immunity, although the greater part of it would indicate that the district attorney and his associates endeavored most carefully to inform the accused regarding his rights. But one witness called by the prosecution testified that, after the defendant's arrest, and in a conversation which occurred before the admission by him that he had committed another offense, the district attorney said to Canfield "that there was no need of denying the matter, that he was satisfied that he was guilty, and that it would be better for him if he would tell the truth—something to that effect."

[2, 3] It was for the judge of the trial court to say what had been the effect of the evidence upon the jury, and whether or not the defendant, in view of all of the facts, had been given a fair trial. If the motion for a new trial had been denied, the prosecution might then well have invoked in favor of the conviction the section of the Constitution which provides that no new trial shall be granted in any criminal case on the ground that improper evidence has been admitted, "unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Section 4½, art. 6, Constitution of California. But this section of the Constitution was not designed to take from the trial court and transfer to the appellate courts the high discretion vested in that tribunal. The judge, who presided at the trial of the cause, who heard the testimony, who observed the jurors and had an opportunity also of testing the truth of the defendant's statements by noticing his demeanor, was in a peculiarly favorable position for determining justly the question whether or not the defendant had been accorded a fair trial. We cannot follow the mental processes of the judge. He may have been profoundly impressed with the influence upon the jury, to Canfield's injury, of the introduction of the evidence tending to prove another offense. Or he may have doubted the identification by the witnesses for the prosecution of Canfield as the man who passed as Rabild in the transactions leading to the sale of the note and mortgage. We can hardly manufacture in fancy an hypothetical situation in which a reviewing court would be justified in questioning the discretion of a trial court who should grant a new trial in a case involving a criminal charge. Surely there is no basis in the case before us for the substitution of the discretion of this court for that of the superior court. We must assume that the learned judge of the trial court acted with a full appreciation of his duties and obligations, with the cited section of the Constitution in mind, and that the conclusion which he reached was not governed by any idle nor any mere technical reasons.

The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

1. NEW TRIAL §163(2) — PRESUMPTION — CHARACTER OF ORDER GRANTING NEW TRIAL.

The trial court's written order, granting defendant's motion for new trial on various grounds, including that of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings, which sets out certain argument, the opinion of the court upon one question of law involved, must be treated as a general one, and it must be assumed that the court, not having expressly limited its order to other definite grounds, may have granted the motion for insufficiency of evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by F. A. Brode and another against S. A. D. Clark. There was judgment for defendant, and from an order granting new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Order affirmed.

P. W. Thomson, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Hammack & Hammack, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. [1,2] This appeal is taken from an order granting to the defendant a new trial. The notice of appeal specifies that the appeal was taken from an order entered on the 11th day of September, 1913. There appears not to have been any formal minute order entered, but the court filed a written order which, after directing that a new trial was granted, set out certain argument, evidently the opinion of the court, upon one question of law involved in the case. The motion for a new trial was made upon various grounds, including that of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings of the court. It appears that there was contradictory evidence as to certain issues presented. Notwithstanding that the written order of court contains a statement of what purports to be the reasons influencing the court in granting the motion, we think the order must be treated as a general one, and that it must be assumed in that case that the court, not having expressly limited its order to other definite grounds, may have granted the motion because of the insufficiency of the evidence. The evidence presenting a conflict as to material matters, this court has no function to review the action of the trial judge.

The ground might also be urged, although we find no suggestion of it here on behalf of respondent, that the notice of appeal does, not on its face, by specifying the 11th day of September, 1913, as the date of the entry of the order granting a new trial, point to the order as shown by the record, which appears to have been filed on October 20, 1913. However, for the reasons first stated, the order should be affirmed.

The order is affirmed.

Action by the Fletcher Collection Agency against Frank A. McDonald and others. Judgment for plaintiff in the justice court, and defendants appealed to the superior court of Los Angeles County, which dismissed plaintiff's motion to dismiss the appeal. On petition for writ of review directed to such order. Order affirmed.

George P. Cook, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Frank A. McDonald, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. On application of the petitioner a writ of review was issued herein, to determine whether the defendant superior court has regularly pursued its authority in refusing to dismiss an appeal from the justice's court, in an action wherein the petitioner was plaintiff and Frank A. McDonald et al. were defendants. The facts are shown by the return filed herein.

After judgment in the justice's court, the defendants in that action filed notice of appeal on questions of law, and filed their undertaking on appeal. On November 17, 1915, the plaintiff filed exceptions to the sureties on the appeal bond. On November 22, 1915, before 1 o'clock p. m., appellants served on the plaintiff a notice—

"that defendants will justify the sureties on the new appeal bond filed by them in the above-entitled case, and you will take further notice that defendants will file a new appeal bond in the above-entitled action on the 22d day of November, 1915, at the hour of 4:30 p. m., in department F of the above-entitled court, at the courthouse in the city of Los Angeles, Cal."

The plaintiff and its attorneys did not appear in the justice's court at the time specified. The justice's docket is silent as to justification by the sureties or as to any appearances by either party before the justice's court at the time specified in the notice of justification of sureties. But the undertaking filed on that day contains the statutory form of affidavit on an undertaking, with a certificate showing that it was subscribed and sworn to before the justice of the peace on that same day, November 22, 1915, and an indorsement was made thereon showing the filing of the undertaking on that day.

The papers on appeal having been duly transmitted to the superior court and filed therein, the plaintiff gave notice of motion to dismiss the appeal upon the grounds:

"(1) That the sureties on the undertaking on appeal heretofore filed by said defendants did not justify in the manner and form required by law and in accordance with the provisions of section 973 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

"(2) That the statement on appeal filed by said defendants does not state any grounds of appeal, as required by section 975 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

[1] The motion was based upon the papers on file and affidavits. The affidavits were for the purpose of showing, and tended to show, that the notice of justification of sureties was not served until the next morning after the time for justification as specified in the notice. Counter affidavits were filed positively affirming that the notice was served between 12 and 1 o'clock on the 22d day of November. For the purpose of determining the questions raised as to its jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, the superior court considered these conflicting affidavits, and determined that the notice was served on the 22d at the hour named in the appellants' affidavits. Therefore, as to that disputed fact, we consider ourselves obliged to adopt the conclusion of the superior court.

[2] On these facts respondents claim that the failure of the party, excepting to the sufficiency of the sureties, to appear at the time and place mentioned in the notice of justification was a waiver of such justification, and that the affidavit of the sureties before the justice, as shown on the undertaking itself, wherein they made oath that they were residents and householders, and respectively worth the sum specified in the undertaking, etc., establishes a prima facie justification, and that nothing further was required under the circumstances here shown. We think that this contention should be sustained. It is directly supported by the decision in Bank of Escondido v. Superior Court, 106 Cal. 43, 39 Pac. 211, and in Budd v. Superior Court, 14 Cal. App. 256, 111 Pac. 628.

[3] The other ground upon which petitioner rests his contention that the superior court exceeded its jurisdiction is that the statement on appeal does not contain the grounds upon which the parties appealing intended to rely, as required by section 975, Code of Civil Procedure. Assuming the statement to be insufficient as specified, it does not result that thereby the court was deprived of its appellate jurisdiction over the case. Rauer's Law & Collection Co. v. Superior Court, 26 Cal. App. 289, 152 Pac. 957.

The order of the superior court, refusing to dismiss the appeal, is affirmed.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨426—PROCEEDINGS TO TRANSFER CAUSE—NOTICE OF APPEAL—SERVICE.

Though an attorney of respondent resides in the same city with the attorney for appellant, Code Civ. Proc. § 1012, authorizing service by mail where the person making the service and the person on whom it is to be made reside or have their offices in different places, does not prevent service by mail on another attorney for respondent residing in another city, equally effective with service on the resident attorney.

5. INSURANCE ⇨712—COMPANIES—BY-LAWS—WHAT LAW GOVERNS.

In the absence of a showing to the contrary, it is presumed that the right of an insurance company located in another state to make by-laws is governed by the laws of that state, with which, as provided in Civ. Code, § 301, they must not be inconsistent.

6. INSURANCE ⇨781—COMPANIES—BY-LAWS—VALIDITY.

Under Code Iowa, § 1789, providing that the beneficiary named in a certificate may be changed at any time at the pleasure of the assured as may be provided for in the articles or by-laws, a by-law requiring consent of the association to a change of beneficiary is invalid.

7. INSURANCE ⇨784(1)—CHANGE OF BENEFICIARY—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the by-laws of an insurance company authorize any member to change the beneficiary by indorsement on the certificate of membership, and require a copy of the indorsement signed by the member to be filed with the association, though the member failed to present a copy of the indorsement, a presentation of the original certificate with the indorsement is equally effective, especially where the company in returning the certificate stated that copies had been made, thus waiving the requirement.

8. INSURANCE ⇨784(1) — CHANGE OF BENEFICIARY—SUFFICIENCY.

Where insured had the right at his pleasure to change the beneficiary, and had done all in his power to change the beneficiary, and notice thereof was brought home to the insurer before his death, there was an effectual change, under the rule that equity regards that as done which ought to have been done.

9. EXECUTION ⇨158(1) — STAY — EFFECT OF ORDER.

An order staying execution for ten days, entered on the day the cause was decided, commenced to run from that date, though judgment was not entered until three days later.

10. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1179—EFFECT OF TRANSFER OF CAUSE—RESTORATION OF MONEY PAID ON JUDGMENT.

The fact that the trial court, after the money deposited in court had been paid over in satisfaction of the judgment, vacated the order on which it was paid, could not vest the District Court of Appeal with jurisdiction to order a restoration of the fund.

11. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐1208(1)—DISPOSITION OF CAUSE—REVERSAL—RESTORATION OF BENEFITS.

A party obtaining through a judgment before reversal any advantage or benefit must restore the amount to the other party after reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Myers, Judge.

Robert L. Hubbard, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Chas. S. Peery, of San Francisco, and William Ellis Lady, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is a contest waged between the widow and minor son of Edward E. Garrett, deceased, each claiming certain money due as insurance upon his life, and which money the insurance company had paid into court to abide the result of the litigation.

[1] The respondent, William Edward Garrett, pursuant to notice thereof, presents a motion to dismiss the appeal. As grounds therefor the notice specifies the following: First, that the appellant has not perfected said appeal in the manner required by law and the rules of the above-entitled court; second, that appellant has not filed in the above-entitled court, within the time allowed by law or otherwise or at all, the requisite papers on appeal from the judgment herein, from which said judgment said appellant has attempted to or has taken an appeal; third, that the pretended stipulation contained on page 82 of appellant's transcript was never signed by nor agreed to by the attorneys for cross-defendant and respondent, William Edward Garrett, or either of them; fourth, for other and further reasons apparent upon the appellant's transcript of record.

Section 1010, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that the notice of a motion must state the grounds upon which it will be made. Section 954, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that:

"If the appellant fails to furnish the requisite papers, the appeal may be dismissed."

Respondent in his notice does not pretend to designate or point out what papers requisite to a consideration of the appeal are omitted from the record, and it is impossible to determine from the notice wherein appellant has failed to perfect her appeal, or wherein she has failed to file the requisite papers on appeal, or what further reasons apparent upon the record respondent refers to as grounds for the motion. The provision of the section last quoted is similar to that contained in section 556, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that a writ of attachment may be discharged when improperly or irregularly issued. It has been held, however, that a notice to discharge a writ of attachment "because the said writ was improperly issued" is insufficient in failing to specify the particular grounds therefor. Says Judge Field, in discussing the sufficiency of a notice of motion in the case of Freeborn v. Glazer, 10 Cal. 337:

The provision that the attachment may be discharged on the ground that the writ was improperly issued "does not obviate the necessity of specifying the particular points of irregularity upon which the motion will be made. It is only a provision that, whenever the writ is improperly issued, that fact will authorize the application for its discharge. It is like a great variety of provisions indicating the general ground or reason upon which parties may proceed, or the action of the court may be based, and which are never held to obviate the necessity of specifying the points of objection upon which the moving party will rely."

To the same effect is Donnelly v. Struven, 63 Cal. 182, and Loucks v. Edmondson, 18 Cal. 203. While these cases involved motions for the discharge of writs of attachment upon the ground that they were improperly and irregularly issued, the principle upon which they were decided is likewise applicable to the provision contained in section 954, to the effect that an appeal may be dismissed if appellant fails to furnish the requisite papers. The notice of motion to dismiss should point out and designate the particular papers claimed by respondent to have been omitted from the record. In our opinion, the notice of the motion is insufficient under section 1010, supra, in that it fails to apprise appellant of the grounds of the motion. It is true that the proposed stipulation as to the correctness of the record was not signed by respondent's attorneys; but, as appears from the record, it was certified by the clerk.

[2-4] Respondent insists that the notice of appeal was not properly served. As appears from the record, respondent's attorney resided in San Francisco, and appellant's attorney in Los Angeles. The notice of appeal was served by mail; and, while the transcript discloses the filing of the notice with the clerk, it does not show service thereof. An affidavit presented, however, covers this omission by showing proper service by mail. Estate of Stratton, 112 Cal. 513, 44 Pac. 1028; Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506, 42 Pac. 986. There is no merit in respondent's contention that Peery, his attorney, had associated with him W. E. Lady, an attorney in Los Angeles, upon whom the service of the notice of appeal should have been made. Lady, as shown by the record, appeared, not as attorney for respondent, who was represented by Charles S. Peery, but as attorney for the Bankers' Life Company, and also in another suit wherein the minor son of deceased was contesting his will. This, however, did not constitute him attorney of record for respondent, and his acts, statements, and conduct, as shown by affidavits filed, were of a character well calculated to raise serious doubt in the mind of appellant as to his position in the case. Under these circumstances, and conceding that he did act with Peery, appellant very properly served the notice of appeal upon the latter as to whom there was no question of his being attorney of record for respondent. Moreover, conceding Mr. Lady, who resided in Los Angeles, to be also an attorney of record for respondent, we find nothing in section 1012, Code of Civil Procedure, prohibiting service by mail upon Mr. Peery. The service was equally effective made upon either attorney.

As appears from the findings made and undisputed facts alleged in the pleadings, the Bankers' Life Company, a corporation having its principal place of business in Des Moines, Iowa, and created under the laws of that state as a life insurance company, did, in June, 1903, issue to Edward E. Garrett two certificates of membership in said Bankers' Life Company, by each of which, upon the death of the assured, it agreed to pay to Emma L. Garrett, the then wife of said Edward E. Garrett and named in said certificates of membership as the beneficiary therein, the sum of $2,000. Some time after the issuance of said certificates of membership, Edward E. Garrett and Emma L. Garrett, his wife, named as beneficiary therein, were divorced. Whereupon the insured, as he concededly had the right to do, changed the beneficiary named in said certificates, substituting for his divorced wife his son, William Edward Garrett, respondent herein. At a later date Edward E. Garrett married Iva L. Garrett, plaintiff herein, and thereafter, on March 10, 1914, he duly executed and indorsed upon each of said certificates of membership the following:

"I, Edward E. Garrett, holder of the within certificates Nos. 130461, 130462, hereby revoke all directions by me heretofore made as to the disposition of the benefit accruing thereunder, and now direct that said benefit shall be paid to Iva L. Garrett, bearing to me the relation of wife."

The certificates so indorsed were duly forwarded to the Bankers' Life Company at Des Moines, Iowa, and received by said company on March 14, 1914, and on March 16, 1914, there was indorsed upon each of said certificates the following, to wit:

"Consented to and acknowledged March 16, 1914. Bankers' Life Company, K. W. B."

On March 15, 1914, after the receipt by said Bankers' Life Company of said certificates of membership, together with the indorsements made thereon by Edward E. Garrett, he died. As found by the court, the law of Iowa touching the right of an assured to change the beneficiary in such certificates is found in section 1789 of the Iowa Code, and is as follows:

"The beneficiary named in the certificate may be changed at any time at the pleasure of the assured, as may be provided for in the articles or by-laws, but no certificate issued for the benefit of a wife or children shall be thus changed so as to become payable to the creditors."

The court also found that by the by-laws of the company it was provided that:

"Any member may with the consent of the association make a change in the beneficiary in his certificate without requiring the consent of such beneficiary. The change proposed shall be indorsed on the certificate of membership, and signed by the member, and shall not be binding until the consent of the association shall be indorsed on the said certificate of membership; a copy of such indorsement signed by the member, and filed with the association."

Further findings are that said Edward E. Garrett did not at any time make or cause to be made a copy of said proposed change of beneficiary, nor file with the Bankers' Life Company a copy of said proposed change which was indorsed upon the certificates, and that the approval of such proposed change by said Bankers' Life Company was made after the death of said Edward E. Garrett and in ignorance of the death of said Edward E. Garrett, and that, pursuant to the order of court, said Bankers' Life Company paid into court the sum of $4,074 for the benefit of the parties entitled thereto, and as a conclusion of law found that said attempted change of beneficiary was not completed, and the beneficiary named in said certificates was not changed from said William Edward Garrett to the said Iva L. Garrett, and that William Edward Garrett was the beneficiary in and entitled to all the proceeds and benefits of the said certificates. Upon these facts the court erroneously, in our opinion, rendered judgment in favor of defendant William Edward Garrett, from which plaintiff appeals.

[5-7] In the absence of anything to the contrary shown, we must presume that the right of the Bankers' Life Company to make by-laws is governed by the laws of Iowa, with which they must not be inconsistent. Section 301, Civ. Code Cal. The Iowa statute, the existence of which is found by the court, provides that the insured may, not "with the consent of the association," as provided in the by-laws, but "at his pleasure," change the beneficiary named in the certificates. To thus restrict the right and make it subject to the consent of the company, without which such change could not be made, would, in effect, nullify and destroy the statutory provision. As we construe the statute, the provision that a change may be made "at the pleasure" of the insured, "as may be provided for in the * * * by-laws," refers to the mode or means adopted by the company for effecting the change, which in this case appears to be by an indorsement upon the certificates expressing the intention of the insured. The rules adopted therefor by the company must be reasonable, and not restrictive of the right given by the statute to the holder of the certificates. That part of the by-law providing that a change in the beneficiary named in the certificate "shall not be binding until the consent of the association shall be indorsed on said certificate," being inconsistent with and restrictive of the right given by the general laws of Iowa, must be disregarded as of no force or effect. Conceding that the provision of the by-laws that "a copy of such indorsement, signed by the member and filed with the association," was not, as found by the court, complied with, nevertheless the original so presented to the association was equally as effective for the purpose to be subserved, which was notice and data for its records, as the copy thereof could have been. Indeed, it appears that the company, on March 16th, in returning the certificates, stated, "Copies have been made for our records," thus waiving the requirement, as it might do. Marsh v. American Legion of Honor, 149 Mass. 517, 21 N. E. 1070, 4 L. R. A. 382; St. Louis Police Relief Ass'n v. Tierney, 116 Mo. App. 447, 91 S. W. 968; Hall v. Allen, 75 Miss. 175, 22 South. 4, 65 Am. St. Rep. 601. To construe the provision otherwise would, in our opinion, be giving weight to the shadow rather than to the substance.

[8] Moreover, equity regards that as done which ought to have been done (1 Pomeroy's Eq. Jurisprudence, § 364), and the insured having the right at his pleasure to change the beneficiary named in the certificates, and having made the indorsement upon the certificates in the manner and form required by the association and forwarded the same to the company, which, as found, received them on March 14th, the day before his death, he had done all in his power to change the beneficiary, and his death following such change, notice of which was brought home to the company prior to his death, was sufficient to and did constitute an effectual change in the beneficiary named. Supreme Conclave, Royal Adelpia, v. Cappella (C. C.) 41 Fed. 1; John Hancock Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. White, 20 R. I. 457, 40 Atl. 5; Luhrs v. Luhrs, 123 N. Y. 367, 25 N. E. 388, 9 L. R. A. 534, 20 Am. St. Rep. 754. In Heydorf v. Conrack, 7 Kan. App. 202, 52 Pac. 700, it is said:

"Where a holder of a certificate in a mutual benefit society desires to change the beneficiary therein, and does all that he is required to do by the laws of the society, and then dies before the change is completed, a court of equity will decree the payment of the money the same as if the desired change had been fully completed in the lifetime of the assured."

See, also, Hirschl v. Clark, 81 Iowa, 200, 47 N. W. 78, 9 L. R. A. 841, and Supreme Lodge v. Price, 27 Cal. App. 607, 150 Pac. 803, to the effect that, where the intended change is brought home to the association during the life of the insured, the beneficiary so designated by him is entitled to recover.

In our opinion, the findings clearly show that the insured in his lifetime changed the beneficiary named in the certificates, substituting for William Edward Garrett his wife, Iva L. Garrett, notice of which fact was brought to the notice of the company prior to his death, in a manner which substantially complied with all legal requirements; that his right to change the beneficiary was not subject to and did not depend upon the consent of the company; that, if it did so depend, the company must be deemed to have assented thereto upon receipt of the certificates upon which such change was indorsed and signed by the insured, and the fact that such consent of the company was not indorsed thereon until after his death was under the circumstances immaterial.

As stated, the Bankers' Life Company paid into court the fund which constituted the subject of the litigation. On December 12, 1915, the court rendered its decision and judgment in the matter, awarding the money involved to William Edward Garrett, and on the same day the court made an order staying execution for a period of ten days. Judgment was entered on December 15, 1915. On December 23, 1915, the following order was made by the court:

"It appearing that the above-mentioned sum of $4,074 is now justly due and payable to said William Edward Garrett, I hereby order that it be paid to him by the treasurer of Los Angeles county, Cal., and the county auditor of said county is hereby ordered to allow this demand upon the treasurer of said county for said sum of $4,074, in favor of said William Edward Garrett in payment thereof, less any moneys paid or due as city and county taxes on said fund. Dated this 23d day of December, 1915. Louis W. Myers, Judge."

Upon this order, made without the knowledge of appellant or her attorney, and other steps duly taken as required in withdrawing money from the county treasury in such cases, the money was paid over to the guardian of said minor. On December 24, 1915, plaintiff and appellant served her notice of appeal herein, followed in due time by the filing of the requisite undertaking. Thereafter, upon the application of the plaintiff to the court, it made an order vacating and setting aside its former order upon the ground that it had been made through inadvertence. No steps, however, were taken by appellant in the trial court to have said fund restored to the county treasury. But she has presented to this court a motion for an order directing the minor, William Edward Garrett, and his guardian, and also Charles S. Peery and W. E. Lady, both individually and as attorneys for William Edward Garrett, to restore and repay into the county treasury of Los Angeles county the sum of $4,074, being the amount of money deposited with the clerk of the superior court by the Bankers' Life Company to abide the result of this action and so withdrawn pursuant to the order of court above set out, and also requiring said parties to show cause why they should not be adjudged guilty of contempt for having applied for said order, and, pursuant thereto, withdrawn said money from the treasury of Los Angeles county.

[9-11] The contention of appellant is that the order staying execution did not begin to run until the entry of judgment on December 15th. This for the reason that prior to such time no execution could have issued. Such, in our opinion, is not the legal effect of the order. As we construe it, the ten-day order staying execution commenced to run from its date, to wit, December 12th, and expired on December 22d. On December 23d, when the order for the withdrawal of the funds and payment thereof to William Edward Garrett was made, no appeal had been taken and the time of the stay of execution had expired; hence the court had authority to make the order upon which the money was withdrawn and applied in payment of an existing judgment as to which at the time no appeal had been perfected. In our opinion, the fact that the court, after the money had been paid over in satisfaction of the judgment, vacated and set aside the order upon which it was paid, could not vest this court with jurisdiction to order the restoration of the fund. The rule in such cases, as we understand it, is:

"That a party obtaining through a judgment, before reversal, any advantage or benefit, must restore [the amount] he got to the other party after the reversal." Reynolds v. Harris, 14 Cal. 680, 76 Am. Dec. 459; section 957, Code Civ. Proc.; Bank v. Bank, 6 Pet. 19, 8 L. Ed. 299.

See, also, Patterson v. Keeney, 165 Cal. 465, 132 Pac. 1043, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 232.

But conceding, without deciding, that the trial court could have ordered the fund restored, no such order was made.

Our conclusion is that the respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal should be denied; that appellant's motion to have the fund restored and to cite the parties to show cause why they should not be adjudged guilty of contempt for applying for the order pursuant to which the fund was paid should likewise be denied; that the judgment appealed from should be reversed, and the trial court instructed to enter judgment upon the findings for the plaintiff and cross-defendant, Iva L. Garrett; all of which is so ordered.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; JAMES, J.

THOMSEN v. THOMSEN. (Civ. 1517.)
(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 31, 1916.)

1. DIVORCE — 252 — PROPERTY RIGHTS — ADJUSTMENT.

Under Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 1, providing that, if divorce be decreed on the ground of extreme cruelty or adultery, the community property shall be assigned to the respective parties in such proportions as the court, from the facts of the case and circumstances, may deem just, it is the duty of the court, where a husband obtained a divorce because of his wife's extreme cruelty, to adjust the property rights of the spouses, and a judgment giving the wife less than half of the community property is not erroneous because she was a hard worker and by her thrift assisted in accumulating it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 713-715; Dec. Dig. —252.]

2. DIVORCE — 286 — REVIEW — PRESUMPTION — PROPERTY OF SPOUSES.

On appeal it will be presumed that the trial court in dividing the property of the spouses on divorce pursuant to Civ. Code, § 146, subd. 1, properly exercised its discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 769, 770; Dec. Dig. —286.]

3. DIVORCE — 252 — DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY — AUTHORITY OF COURT.

Where the court, on a husband's procuring divorce for extreme cruelty, divides the property of the spouses, it may properly take into consideration the fact that at the time of the marriage the husband was the possessor of several thousand dollars worth of property which was used in accumulating the marital property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 713-715; Dec. Dig. —252.]

4. DIVORCE — 252 — DIVISION OF PROPERTY — EVIDENCE.

Where a husband obtained a divorce on account of his wife's extreme cruelty, and the foundation of the community property was the husband's separate property, which after marriage he had used in accumulating the community property, a division which allowed him 58 per cent. of the title to the property held justified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 713-715; Dec. Dig. —252.]

5. DIVORCE — 252 — DIVISION OF PROPERTY — AUTHORITY OF COURT.

The court under its power to divide community estate may assign to one spouse the whole of a tract of land belonging to the estate; all the property belonging to the estate being treated as one asset or fund composed of separate units to be divided.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 713-715; Dec. Dig. —252.]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; Frank H. Smith, Judge.

Action by Thomas Thomsen against Ida Amelia Thomsen. From a decree of divorce and decree adjusting the property rights of the parties, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Light & Crane and Gordon A. Stewart, all of Stockton, for appellant. A. L. Levinsky, of Stockton, for respondent.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. In this action the trial court granted an interlocutory decree of divorce to the plaintiff on the ground of defendant's cruelty, and made a decree adjusting the property rights of the parties. Upon this appeal the defendant claims that in the decree too much of the property was awarded to the plaintiff.

A brief narrative of some facts disclosed by the record will be sufficient to present the point raised. The plaintiff and defendant intermarried in 1876. At the time of this marriage the plaintiff was possessed of some property. By hard work, economy, and thrift their wordly possessions have increased until at the time of the trial they owned real and personal property as follows:

A tract of land containing about 60 acres, valued at.....	$ 5,100.00
Another of about 60 acres valued at	3,780.00
Another of about 40 acres valued at	3,400.00
And other tracts aggregating 403 acres, valued at.....	34,680.00
Stock, crops and farming implements	$48,960.00
Total	$58,960.00
And their indebtedness amounted to about	$2,500.00

By its decree the court awarded to the plaintiff 107 acres of the land, and the balance of the real estate was ordered divided equally between the parties, and also the growing crops and all personal property and money. It was also decreed that all indebtedness should be paid equally by them.

[1, 2] Counsel for appellant seems to be satisfied with this division of the property with the exception that he claims that his client should have been awarded one-half of the 107 acres of land, and that all of it should not have been awarded to the plaintiff.

Subdivision 1 of section 146 of the Civil Code provides:

"If the decree be rendered on the ground of adultery, or extreme cruelty, the community property shall be assigned to the respective parties in such proportions as the court, from all the facts of the case, and the condition of the parties, may deem just."

This Code section confers upon the trial court a wide latitude for the exercise of its judgment and discretion, and in every case it will be presumed that such discretion has been wisely and properly exercised. It has been said that it is the duty of the court to award to the innocent party more than one-half of the community property when the divorce is granted for cruelty. Thus, in Eslinger v. Eslinger, 47 Cal. 64, it is said:

"Section 146 of the Civil Code requires that the community property shall be equally divided between the parties; but the next section makes an exception to the general rule by providing that, if the divorce be granted on the ground of adultery or extreme cruelty, the guilty party shall receive only such portion as the court shall deem just under the facts of the case. The inference is that in the excepted cases the injured party is to receive, as a general rule, more than one-half of the property, and as much more as the court shall deem just. Under the circumstances of this case, we think the court ought to have awarded to the wife three-fourths of the community property."

1. Counsel states that, as the evidence shows the defendant has been a hard-working woman and by her efforts assisted in accumulating the property, she should have been awarded at least one-half of all of it. But this feature of the case is not controlling. Many cases arise wherein all the property has been accumulated entirely by the efforts of the husband, unaided by the wife's labor, and wherein, upon a divorce being granted to the wife upon the ground of the husband's cruelty, she has been awarded much more than one-half of the common property. In such cases one of the circumstances the court must take into consideration and give due weight to is the important fact that one spouse has been cruel to the other, which cruelty has resulted in disrupting the home and marriage ties.

[3, 4] 2. In finding No. XIV the court finds that at the time of the plaintiff's marriage to the defendant he had $500 on deposit in bank; that there was due to him from one Hansen $1,200, which was afterwards collected; that he owned 175 stands of bees, some of which he sold for $250; two wagons and horse, worth $200; 65 acres of land which he subsequently sold for $1,000. (While the findings do not total these findings, it is proper to state that they aggregate $3,150.) The court finds that all of said sums of money and property were used by the plaintiff after the marriage in the purchase of real estate and farming implements, and that by reason of the use of said money and property and by reason of work and labor done and performed by both spouses, all the lands described in the findings were bought.

It is apparent from the record that the court felt that it could not trace with sufficient accuracy any of the plaintiff's antenuptial holdings into any specific piece of property now owned by the plaintiff so as to declare it to be his separate property; yet it did consider the fact that plaintiff had this property at the time of his marriage, and that it and its increase were intermingled in the common holdings, a circumstance to be considered by it in making a fair and equitable division of the property. With this in mind, and without deciding that any specific piece of land was separate property, the court awarded to the plaintiff the 107 acres of land in severalty. We discover no error or abuse of discretion in so holding and acting. Nor was the amount thus awarded to plaintiff in severalty large in comparison with the total value of the estate. In appellant's brief it is stated that the entire property of the parties had a value of about $58,156, and that the 107 acres awarded to the plaintiff were worth $9,560. It thus appears that by the decree the plaintiff was awarded $33,858, and the defendant $24,298; or, reduced to a percentage basis, the plaintiff was awarded about 58 per cent. and the defendant 42 per cent. of the entire holdings. The court has found that the antenuptial holdings of plaintiff were used in acquiring this property and were of the value of $3,150. Allowing interest on this fund for 40 years at 4 per cent., compounded annually (which is certainly low enough), and it would now amount to $15,330.50. With all these facts before it, the court was fully justified in disposing of the property as it did, and appellant has no just grounds of complaint.

[5] 3. Appellant takes the position that the court must divide the community property in some proportion between the spouses, that the Code so provides, and it has no authority to award all of the 107 acres to the plaintiff, as such act was not a division. In adjusting the property rights of the parties the court may consider all the common property as one asset or fund, composed of separate units, and can often more equitably settle and adjust matters by giving all of designated and described pieces of property to one party than by awarding to each an undivided interest in all. We know of no principle of law or practice that would forbid such a course of action. The court is no more bound to award to each spouse an undivided interest in each piece of land than it is to award to each an undivided interest in each cow or horse.

BROWN v. CANTY. (Civ. 1507.)

APPEAL AND ERROR $\hookrightarrow$ 516, 522(1)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS PRESENTED.

Where defendant appealed from the judgment without any bill of exceptions or statement, assignments of error that plaintiff, whose title was quieted, had knowledge of his claim by reason of a lis pendens filed in action against plaintiff's grantor, and that the court refused to compel the grantor and others to intervene, cannot be considered, though exhibits and orders were incorporated in the record; for neither minute orders nor evidence are part of the judgment roll as defined by Code Civ. Proc. § 670, and so there was nothing to support the assignments.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

Action by Rebecca Brown against D. J. Canty. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. A. Williams, of Fresno, for appellant. Burns & Watkins, of Fresno, for respondent.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. Plaintiff brought this action to quiet her title to a quarter section of land in Fresno county. Her complaint alleged facts showing the legal title to the land to be in her. The defendant, for answer, denied plaintiff's title. He then alleged a certain contract entered into between him and certain other parties, viz., J. E. Hughes, T. E. Braly, and W. J. Hotchkiss, the result of which was that Hotchkiss had purchased the land described in the complaint from the state of California, but had the state make its deed to one Bart-hold, in trust for said Hotchkiss and this defendant; that plaintiff had full knowledge of defendant's interest in said land at the time she purchased it from Hotchkiss, to whom Barthold had deeded it. He alleged his interest in the land was an undivided four-tenths, and that, notwithstanding plaintiff had knowledge of his claim and interest, she obtained a deed from said Hotchkiss and said Barthold conveying to her said quarter section of land. Judgment went for the plaintiff, and the defendant appeals from the judgment without any bill of exceptions or statement. The complaint states a cause of action, and the findings support the judgment.

The only points relied upon for a reversal are: (1) That defendant having introduced in evidence a lis pendens filed in an action entitled Canty v. Hotchkiss stating defendant's right therein to this same land (2) this was notice to Mrs. Brown and to the court that defendant claimed an interest in the land, and that the plaintiff knew of his claim when she bought the land from Hotchkiss; and this all being true (3) the court erred in denying defendant's motion to compel Hotchkiss and Barthold to intervene herein in order that the judgment might bind all parties interested in the land; and (4) that no valid judgment could be entered without their presence. But, unfortunately for appellant, the court is unable upon this record to consider any of these suggested matters. Upon this appeal we may only consider such papers and orders as are declared by the Code to constitute a part of the judgment roll. None of the evidence introduced upon the trial by either party is a part of the judgment roll. Therefore we do not know what evidence the plaintiff introduced, we do not know that defendant introduced the lis pendens referred to, nor that he made any proof of the existence of the contract set up in his answer, nor that he made any motion for an order that Hotchkiss and Barthold be compelled to intervene (see section 670, Code Civ. Proc.), nor that the court denied any such motion. It is true there are certain exhibits and orders printed in the transcript, but they have no place therein, not being any part of the judgment roll. This is so thoroughly settled that a citation of authority is unnecessary, but one case will be referred to. In De Pedrorena v. Hotchkiss, 95 Cal. 636, 638, 30 Pac. 787, 788, it is said:

"There are two minute orders printed in the transcript, from one of which it appears that the default was set aside and defendant allowed to answer upon certain stated conditions, and from the other that the answer filed was stricken out, because defendant had failed to comply with the conditions upon which the default was set aside, and he was permitted to answer. The statute does not make these minute orders part of the judgment roll. Code Civ. Proc. § 670. They are therefore improperly in the record—there being no bill of exceptions and we cannot notice the points attempted to be made in regard to them."

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LETOILE. (Cr. 497.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 27, 1916.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — 369(8) — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY — OTHER OFFENSES.

In prosecution for incest with one daughter, another daughter of accused could not testify to his sexual relations with her, as tending to show disposition to commit such a crime, such testimony being of a separate offense, and not corroboration of the other daughter, who by her consent became an accomplice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 822, 823; Dec. Dig. — 369(8).]

2. WITNESSES — 405(2) — CONTRADICTION OF ACCUSED — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIBILITY.

Such testimony was not rendered admissible, where defendant, to show bias, had testified as to trouble with his daughters, by his statement on cross-examination, under his objection, that the only trouble he had with his daughters was over their staying out late at night, that being immaterial, as the daughter testifying was not then a witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1273, 1275; Dec. Dig. — 405(2).]

3. CRIMINAL LAW — 635 — RIGHT TO PUBLIC TRIAL.

Under Const. art. 1, § 13, giving persons accused the right to public trial, the public cannot be wholly excluded, though some may be excluded to prevent crowding and disorder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Jack Letoile was convicted of incest, and from the judgment and order denying motion for new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Guy Eddie, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. Defendant was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment for the crime of incest committed with his eldest daughter. His appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Testimony directly supporting the charge was given by the prosecuting witness, the daughter of the defendant. It was claimed by the defendant that according to her own testimony she had consented to the acts constituting the ground of complaint, and that, she being therefore an accomplice, the conviction cannot be sustained without corroborative evidence tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense. The only corroborative evidence found in the record is contained in the testimony of Mary Letoile, a sister of the prosecuting witness, Lucy Letoile, which testimony was admitted over objections thereto. This witness was called by the prosecution as a witness in rebuttal, and was questioned about trouble between herself and her father at about the time of his arrest. This question was asked by the district attorney:

"About that time and for some time previous thereto, had you had trouble with him with regard to his acts of sexual intimacy with you?"

After an objection had been made and overruled, she answered that question in the affirmative. Evidence was thus placed before the jury not only by the prosecuting witness that the defendant had committed the crime of incest with her, but also by the daughter Mary that defendant had committed a like crime with her. Unless this was corroboration of Lucy's testimony respecting the offense charged in this action, there is no corroboration in the record. The jury may have believed Lucy's testimony as to the defendant's acts, but that those acts were done with her consent, and that she was an accomplice therein; and, in that event, their verdict was necessarily based also upon the testimony of Mary which tended to show the defendant's disposition to commit that kind of a crime by showing that he had committed such a crime with a person other than the one named in the information. The decisions in this state are uniform to the effect that such evidence in prosecutions for crimes of this class is not admissible. People v. Bowen, 49 Cal. 654; People v. Stewart, 85 Cal. 174, 24 Pac. 722; People v. Elliott, 119 Cal. 593, 51 Pac. 955.

[2] It is suggested, however, that the testimony was properly admitted in rebuttal, in that the defendant had opened the door therefor by testifying that he had had trouble with his daughters Lucy and Mary because of their staying out late at night against his wishes, and that that was the only trouble he ever had with his daughters. Examination of the record does not support this view of the defendant's testimony. In order to show animus of the prosecuting witness against him, the defendant testified that he had had trouble with Lucy, and incidentally further testified that he had trouble with both Lucy and Mary, on the subject of their staying out late at night. It was only upon cross-examination and under adverse rulings upon his objections thereto that the defendant stated that he had not had any other trouble with his daughters. As to the daughter Mary, this was immaterial to the case. She had not been a witness, and therefore had given no testimony for or against the defendant. In People v. Turco, 153 Pac. 1001, we had occasion to examine the authorities bearing upon the limits of the right of cross-examination of a defendant in a criminal case, and the limits of the right to introduce rebuttal testimony based upon facts elicited by such cross-examination. The principle was recognized that the people have the right, on the cross-examination of a defendant, to draw out anything which will tend to contradict or modify his testimony given on his direct examination, and that such testimony of the defendant may be met by testimony in rebuttal. In the present case, however, we do not think that the circumstances shown by the record are such as to warrant the application of the rule stated. The testimony of the witness Mary Letoile, to which we have referred, should have been excluded.

[3] At the beginning of the trial in this case the court made an order, which was thereafter enforced, requiring all persons other than those directly connected with the trial to withdraw from the courtroom, and tried the case "behind closed doors." We do not doubt the right of the court to regulate the admission of the public to the courtroom in any appropriate manner in order to prevent overcrowding or disorder, but the right does not exist to wholly exclude the public. Under article 1, § 13, of the Constitution of this state, the party accused in a criminal prosecution is given the right to a public trial. Referring to a similar order made in People v. Hartman, 103 Cal. 242, 37 Pac. 153, 42 Am. St. Rep. 108, the Supreme Court said:

"This was a novel procedure, and has no justification in the law of modern times. We know of no case decided in this country supporting the course of procedure here pursued. It is in direct violation of that provision of the Constitution which says that a party accused of crime has a right to a public trial."

No objection was made by or on behalf of the defendant to this course of procedure by the court, and the point is made for the first time on this appeal. In view of our conclusions upon the first question discussed herein, it seems unnecessary to base our decision upon the proposition that the defendant was deprived of his right to a public trial. See, also, People v. Swafford, 65 Cal. 223, 3 Pac. 809, and the comment thereon in 103 Cal. 245.

The judgment and order are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by Annie Gallo against A. Gallo. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Webster, Webster & Blewett, of Stockton, and Farnsworth & McClure, of Visalia, for appellant. A. H. Ashley, of Stockton, and Power & McFadzean, of Visalia, for respondent.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. Plaintiff brought this action to quiet her title to the northeast quarter of a certain section of land situated in Tulare county, and obtained judgment as prayed for. The defendant appeals. On the trial the plaintiff introduced as evidence of her title to the quarter section a patent from the United States to her husband, Giacomo Gallo, dated August 9, 1897, and a deed from the latter to her, of August 12, 1911, conveying the land. The defendant (who is a brother of said Giacomo Gallo), as a defense alleged that he had obtained title to the land by adverse possession, and made no other claim. Upon this appeal the defendant insists that the findings of the court to the effect that he had not acquired title by adverse possession are not sustained by the evidence, and this is the only question presented.

[1, 2] The record shows that at about the time plaintiff's grantor obtained his patent for the northeast quarter of the section the defendant obtained a patent for the northwest quarter of the same section. Evidently the land was considered of little value at the time. Neither brother lived nor resided upon the land covered by his patent for any long period after obtaining it, and neither has lived on any part of the half section for many years. (The plaintiff's quarter section adjoins the defendant's on the east, and the two constitute the north half of the section.) The defendant testified that he built a fence on the east side of the land in dispute about 1903, and during the same year inclosed the half section. The fence was of posts and three wires. When he first built the fence he leased the half section to one Goodale for two years at a rental of $9 per year. "He agreed to pay the taxes and build the fence." He pastured some cattle on it for two years. At some date, not stated, defendant leased the half section to a man, whose name he cannot recall, under a verbal lease for five years. He paid the rent, $40, for one year and no more, and defendant does not know how long he was on the land, but never saw him after the first year. In 1911 he leased the land to one Howard for five years under a written lease. This action was begun in October, 1912. The defendant never resided on the land in dispute, and never made any use of it except as above stated. The land is in Tulare county, and plaintiff's grantor, during all this time, lived in Stockton, and defendant testified his brother never knew he was leasing the land. He also testified that he had the whole half section assessed to himself and paid all taxes on it for at least 15 years. The evidence as to the payment of taxes is that they went delinquent in 1905, and that no taxes were paid in 1906, 1907 and 1908 until 1909, when the defendant redeemed the land from tax sales.

The witness John Gallo testified that in the year 1908 the defendant told his father (the husband of plaintiff) that he wanted some money for taxes, and his father laughed and said to him: "What rents are you getting from the land?" He said: "Not much." So father said to him: "If you will pay all the taxes, what is left you can keep for your troubles."

It is very clear to us that the defendant did not sustain his plea of adverse possession. The elements required to make out an adverse possession sufficient to constitute a defense under the statute of limitations are clearly stated in Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 595, 49 Am. Rep. 100, and need not here be repeated. In said case it is said:

"The adverse character of the possession must in every case be manifested to the owner. The owner must be notified, in some way, that the possession is hostile to his claim, or the statute does not operate on his right. * * * As was said in the case cited in [Trustees of Town of East Hampton v. Kirk] 84 N. Y. [215, 38 Am. Rep. 505] per Andrews, J., 'the object of the statute defining the acts essential to constitute an adverse possession is that the real owner may, by unequivocal acts of the disseisor, have notice of the hostile claim and be thereby called upon to assert his legal title.' Hence an open and notorious occupation with hostile intent is a necessary constituent of an adverse" holding.

The defendant did not personally occupy the land. No one nor all of the persons to whom he leased it ever occupied it for any five consecutive years.

[3] The record does not show that taxes were paid for any one period of five years. Under the decisions construing subdivision 2 of section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is held that redeeming land from tax sales is not the payment of taxes contemplated by the law as an element of adverse possession.

"If it [the payment of taxes] is an element in the adverse possession tending to show good faith, certainly during those years in which the taxes have not been paid the possession lacks an essential element required in the statute. During all the years in which the delinquency was allowed, the true owner might forbear suit because of his knowledge that the person in possession had not paid taxes, thereby indicating that he was not holding adversely." McDonald v. McCoy, 121 Cal. 73, 53 Pac. 427.

[4] The relationship of the parties has a bearing and may well be considered. Two brothers owning adjoining land of little value—far from where they are residing—used only for grazing stock. One brother puts a wire fence around both holdings and leases it for short periods. Such act from a stranger, owning no adjoining land, would have far greater significance, as showing a hostile holding, than when being done by a brother owning the adjoining land.

[5] In considering the case on appeal, it will be presumed that all testimony introduced at the trial tending to support the findings of the trial court was accepted by it as true. The testimony of John Gallo, above referred to, wherein he states that in 1908 the defendant asked his father for money for taxes and the latter said to him, "If you will pay the taxes, what is left you can keep for your troubles," is sufficient in itself to negative all inferences of an adverse and hostile holding, and clearly sufficient to show that plaintiff's grantor was not advised of any hostile claims, but rather points to an understanding between brothers for their mutual benefit. See Mattes v. Hall, 28 Cal. App. 361, 152 Pac. 436. Considering the family relationship of the parties, the language used by the District Court of Appeal in Glowner v. De Alvarez, 10 Cal. App. 196, 101 Pac. 433, seems not inappropriate for quotation in this connection:

"There are no equities in favor of a party seeking by adverse holding to acquire the property of another."

The judgment is clearly right and is affirmed.

Ex parte YEE KIM MAH. (Cr. No. 363.)
(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 1, 1916.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — 90(3)—COURTS—JURISDICTION.

A justice of the peace is without jurisdiction of an offense, where the punishment prescribed is imprisonment in the state penitentiary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 133; Dec. Dig. — 90(3).]

2. CRIMINAL LAW — 84(1)—JURISDICTION—IMPLIED REPEAL.

The Whitney Act (St. 1885, p. 213) provides that in cities having over 30,000 and under 100,000 inhabitants judicial power shall be vested in the police court held by the city justices, which court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of certain public offenses committed within the city, including all misdemeanors punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both. In 1905 by (St. 1905, p. 705), section 1425, relating to the jurisdiction of justice courts in criminal cases, and providing that such courts shall have jurisdiction of all misdemeanors punishable by fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both, committed within their respective counties, was added to the Penal Code. Code Civ. Proc. § 115, which contained identical provisions, was repealed by St. 1907, p. 682. Held, that in view of the enactment and repeal of such sections the provisions of the Whitney Act, relating to cities falling within its provisions, were repealed, and any justice of the county has jurisdiction of misdemeanors committed within the city.

3. COURTS — 41—ESTABLISHMENT—CHARTER.

Prior to the enactment of Const. art. 11, § 8½, police courts could not be established by freeholders' charters.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 162, 181-183; Dec. Dig. — 41.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW — 84(1)—POLICE COURTS—JURISDICTION.

The freeholders' charter of the city of Sacramento approved in 1911 (St. Extra Sess. 1911, p. 305) creates a police court for the city with jurisdiction of all misdemeanors enumerated by the general laws or ordinances of the city and all crimes cognizable by the justice of the peace. Held, that the approval of such charter did not, there being no provision that the jurisdiction of such police court should be exclusive, repeal Pen. Code, § 1425, so as to deprive a justice of the county of jurisdiction over misdemeanors committed within the limits of the city.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 115, 120, 121; Dec. Dig. — 84(1); Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 353.]

In the matter of the application of Yee Kim Mah for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged, and petitioner remanded.

John Q. Brown, of Sacramento, for petitioner. Lee Gebhart, Hugh B. Bradford, Dist. Atty., and S. F. Otis, Asst. Dist. Atty., all of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. In the justice's court of Riverside township, in the county of Sacramento, the petitioner was charged with and convicted of a misdemeanor growing out of the violation by him of the legislative act entitled "An act to regulate the sale of poisons," etc., and, claiming that the judgment of conviction is void because the court before which he was tried was without jurisdiction to try the action against him, he seeks his release from the custody of the sheriff of Sacramento county, by whom he is now being detained by authority of the said judgment of conviction and sentence thereupon imposed upon him, through the writ of habeas corpus.

[1] In the outset it may be observed that, although the act of the violation of certain of whose provisions the petitioner was adjudged guilty prescribes penalties for the first and second convictions thereunder which are within the jurisdiction of justices' or police courts to impose, yet for a third conviction of the same person for the violation of the provisions thereof, the punishment prescribed is by imprisonment in the state prison for not less than one year and not more than five years. It hence follows that, where a person is charged with the violation of the provisions of said act, together with two previous convictions thereunder, jurisdiction to try the person so offending is in the superior court. People v. Sacramento Butchers' Association, 12 Cal. App. 471, 478, 107 Pac. 712. It is, however, conceded by the petitioner that the conviction of which he here complains was of what is popularly termed a simple or "high-grade" misdemeanor, of which justices' and police courts have jurisdiction, and this concession necessarily carries with it the further concession that he was not charged with and convicted of a violation of the provisions of the statute with two prior convictions thereunder.

[2] The point made by the petitioner, however, results from the following facts: That, as the petition shows and the demurrer interposed thereto by the respondent admits, the crime of which he was convicted was committed within the limits of the city and the judicial township of Sacramento, said township being co-extensive, territorially, with the municipal limits of said city; that Riverside township, in the county of Sacramento, in which the petitioner was charged with, tried for, and convicted of the offense for which he is now being restrained of his liberty, is not embraced within or a part of the city of Sacramento. In other words, and in brief, the petition shows that the crime of which the petitioner stands convicted was committed within the municipal limits of the city of Sacramento, and that he was charged, prosecuted and convicted in a judicial township territorially independent of and distinct from the said city and township. It is the contention that under the terms of the so-called Whitney Act (St. 1885, p. 213), the police court of the city of Sacramento has sole and exclusive jurisdiction of all misdemeanors punishable by fine or imprisonment, or by both such fine and imprisonment, committed within the limits of said city, and that therefore a justice's court whose township or territorial jurisdiction is outside or not embraced within the limits of said city cannot legally acquire or exercise jurisdiction of misdemeanors so committed. It follows, so the argument goes, that the conviction of the petitioner in the justice's court of Riverside township is coram non iudice and void.

The Whitney Act, section 1, provides:

"The judicial power of every city having thirty thousand and under one hundred thousand inhabitants, shall be vested in a police court to be held therein by the city justices, or one of them, to be designated by the mayor, but either of said city justices may hold such court without such designation, and it is hereby made the duty of said city justices, in addition to the duties now required of them by law, to hold said police court.

"Sec. 2. The police court shall have exclusive jurisdiction of the following public offenses committed in the city: First, petit larceny. Second, assault or battery, not charged to have been committed upon a public officer in the discharge of official duty, or with intent to kill. Third, breaches of the peace, riots, affrays, committing willful injury to property, and all misdemeanors punishable by fine or by imprisonment, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Fourth, of proceedings respecting vagrants, lewd, or disorderly persons."

The third section invests said court with "exclusive jurisdiction of all proceedings for violation of any ordinance of said city, both civil and criminal, and of an action for the collection of any license required by any ordinance of said city." Said court is also authorized by said act to hear and conduct the preliminary examination of charges of which the superior court has jurisdiction and to commit the offenders to trial in said last mentioned court.

The argument advanced in support of the position that from the foregoing provisions of the Whitney Act the city of Sacramento, as a municipal corporation, derives all the judicial power with which it is invested is, so it is asserted and contended, that the census of the year 1910 disclosed that said city had acquired a population of over 30,000 inhabitants, but still contained less than 100,000 inhabitants, and that said city, therefore, after the said census was taken and upon the official declaration thereof, was automatically shifted into a class which brought it within the scope of the Whitney Act with respect to its judicial power; that said city is still a city having a population of over 30,000 and under 100,000 inhabitants and still subject to the provisions of the Whitney Act regulating the power and jurisdiction of the police courts in cities of that class.

Varying legislation respecting justices' and police courts, their power and jurisdiction, has, from time to time, been enacted since the adoption of the Codes in 1872; but, in deciding the question submitted in this proceeding, it is not necessary to review said legislation or enter into a detailed examination of the changes and amendments so made in the law with respect to those courts. It is sufficient if we find, as we think we have correctly found, that the provisions of the Whitney Act, even if at any time they were applicable to the city of Sacramento, have been, in so far as they affected the question of the jurisdiction of the police court of said city, superseded by legislation enacted subsequently to the passage of said act.

The Legislature of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 705) added a new section to the Penal Code, numbered 1425, which is now a part of said Code, and which prescribes and regulates the jurisdiction of justices' courts in criminal cases. It is by said section provided, among other things, that said courts shall have jurisdiction of "all misdemeanors, punishable by fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment," committed within their respective counties. That section or the precise provisions thereof were embraced within section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure (see Deering's Pocket Edition, Code Civ. Proc., of year 1906); but the Legislature, doubtless viewing the subject-matter of said section as coming strictly and hence more appropriately within the purview, nature, and purpose of the Penal Code, adopted said section into and as a part of the latter Code in the year 1905, as stated. In 1907, the Legislature, at its regular session, in furtherance of its manifest object of making the provisions of the section a part of the criminal law system of our state, repealed section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Stats. 1907, p. 682.

While it is true, as seen, that the provisions of section 1425 of the Penal Code were, as section 115 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a part of the law of the state and no doubt governed in the matter of the jurisdiction of justices' courts (unless they were or had been superseded by some subsequent enactment) prior to and at the time said section 1425 of the Penal Code was enacted, it is also obviously true that the enactment of said last mentioned section constituted and involved an act of new and independent legislation, or an act no different, in a legal sense, from any other legislative act involving legislation upon a subject upon which there had theretofore been no legislation by the Legislature. The Legislature, in other words, in enacting section 1425, put an entirely new section into the Penal Code, notwithstanding that the identical section had been and then was the law of the state, expressed in the form of a section of another of the four Codes. And in so enacting said section, the Legislature gave vent to its latest utterance or expression upon the subject to which the section relates. The effect of the enactment of the section was therefore to repeal at least so much of the provisions of the Whitney Act as pretended or purported to vest in the police court of the city of Sacramento

"exclusive jurisdiction of * * * all misdemeanors punishable by fine or by imprisonment, or by both such fine and imprisonment," committed in said city, assuming only for the purposes of this case that by the provisions of the Whitney Act the power and jurisdiction of the police court of said city had theretofore been governed and regulated. This is only to say that section 1425 of the Penal Code is now the law which is controlling in the matter of the jurisdiction of justices' courts, and that, unless that section runs counter to some subsequent legislation upon the subject, those courts have jurisdiction of any of the offenses therein enumerated committed anywhere within their respective counties. It follows, of course, subject, however, to the qualification that so much of section 1425 as confers such jurisdiction has not, since its enactment, been repealed either expressly or by necessary implication, that it was within the lawful jurisdiction of the justice's court of Riverside township to try the petitioner for the misdemeanor charged to have been committed by him within the limits of the city of Sacramento, said township being, as seen, as is the city of Sacramento, within the county of Sacramento.

[3, 4] The only legislation to which our attention has been directed or which we have in mind, purporting to prescribe the powers and jurisdiction of the police court of the city of Sacramento, and which has been had since the enactment of section 1425 of the Penal Code, is to be found among the provisions of the freeholders' charter of the city of Sacramento, approved by the Legislature at its extra session in the year 1911. Stats. & Amend'ts to the Codes, Extra Session, 1911, p. 305. But the provisions of said charter relating to the powers and jurisdiction of the police court of said city are in no manner or degree repugnant to or inconsistent with the powers and jurisdiction of justices' courts as conferred by section 1425 of the Penal Code. And we think it is very plain that the judicial scheme established by said charter was intended to and does supersede or take the place of any previously established scheme for a police court for said city. Article 12 of the charter of said city contains, among other provisions, the following:

"Sec. 162. There is hereby constituted a police court in and for the city of Sacramento, * * *

"Sec. 164. Said police court shall have jurisdiction: 1. Of all misdemeanors enumerated by the general laws or by ordinances of the city and of all other crimes cognizable by justices' courts and courts of justices of the peace and police courts under the Constitution and laws of the state of California. * * * 3. Of the examination and commitment of persons charged with the commission of any offense that may be prosecuted by indictment or information. 4. Such other criminal jurisdiction as is, or may hereafter be conferred by law upon police courts, justices' courts, or justices of the peace. * * *

The validity of said article of the said charter is not questioned here, nor could it be successfully. The authority for the establishment of police courts by freeholders' charters is in section 8½, art. 11, of the Constitution. That authority was first conferred by the people through the Constitution by an amendment added to that instrument in the year 1896. Section 8½, art. 11. Prior to the adoption of that amendment courts could not be established by a freeholders' charter, or by a mere concurrent resolution, the means whereby the state legislative body approves such a charter. Ex parte Sparks, 120 Cal. 395, 52 Pac. 715. Parenthetically, it may be stated that the said amendment has since been added to by other amendments adopted by the people, which, however, in no way affect the question submitted here.

By the provisions, then, of the charter of the city of Sacramento we must be guided in determining the powers and jurisdiction of the police court of said city, and whether the jurisdiction so conferred is made exclusive as to all misdemeanors cognizable by justices' courts committed within the borders of said city. Under cardinal canons of construction, the article in said charter creating and establishing a police court in said city supersedes or necessarily repeals, so far as the city of Sacramento is concerned, any provisions of any previous section purporting to confer jurisdiction upon said court. It is very clear that the provisions of said charter setting up a police court in said city do not pretend, nor can they reasonably be construed to have been intended, to confer upon the court so established exclusive jurisdiction of all simple misdemeanors committed within the limits of said city. The word "exclusive" is nowhere used in those provisions. It is obvious to our minds that the most that was intended by those provisions of the charter, so far as are concerned misdemeanors committed under the general laws of the state, is that the police court of said city shall have concurrent jurisdiction with the justices' courts of the county of such misdemeanors when they are committed within the limits of said city. This clearly appears to be true from the language of the first subdivision of section 164, viz.:

"Said police court shall have jurisdiction of all misdemeanors enumerated by the general laws * * * and of all other crimes cognizable by justices' courts and courts of justices of the peace"

—clearly meaning, not that thus the several justices' courts of the county of Sacramento shall not exercise the jurisdiction over misdemeanors committed anywhere within the territorial boundaries of the county of Sacramento, including, of course, the city of Sacramento, as provided by section 1425 of the Penal Code, but that, as stated, the police court may also exercise, along with the justices' courts of the county acting upon the authority of the mentioned section of the Penal Code, jurisdiction over "all misdemeanors enumerated by the general laws of the state" committed within the limits of said city. We can perceive no reasonable ground upon which any other construction can be given the provisions of the charter under consideration.

It will not, of course, be doubted that but for that particular provision of the Sacramento city charter which gives to the police court its jurisdiction over misdemeanors under the general laws, or a like provision in some general law of the state, the police court of said city would not have jurisdiction over such misdemeanors or of "other crimes cognizable by justices' courts," whatever those "other crimes" might be if not coming within the category of misdemeanors; for the powers and jurisdiction of a police court proceed from special legislative grant only, and when a statute or a charter, legally sanctioned by the Legislature, undertakes to establish such a court and to grant to it the requisite powers and jurisdiction for its limited purposes, such court's powers and jurisdiction must be measured by and remain within the terms of the grant.

Our conclusion is, as must be manifest from the views herein expressed, that, if the Whitney Act ever applied to the police court of the city of Sacramento, its provisions, so far as they purport to give that court exclusive jurisdiction of misdemeanors punishable by fine not exceeding $500 or imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment, committed within the limits of the city of Sacramento, have been, so far as said city is concerned, repealed or superseded by the more recent legislative mandate on that subject as expressed in section 1425 of the Penal Code; that, moreover, said provisions have been superseded by the provisions of the freeholders' charter of said city, adopted and approved in the year 1911, establishing a police court therein and prescribing and regulating its powers and jurisdiction, and that said charter provisions are not in conflict with or repugnant to any provision of section 1425 of the Penal Code. It follows, of course, that the justice's court of Riverside township did not transcend its lawful authority and jurisdiction in taking cognizance of and trying the case made against the petitioner by the complaint charging him with a misdemeanor under the general law of the state.

Accordingly, the demurrer to the petition is sustained, the writ discharged, and the petitioner remanded.

APPEAL AND ERROR 417(2)—NOTICE OF APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY—NAMES OF PARTIES.

In an action wherein plaintiff obtained a judgment against the several defendants named as composing the board of trustees of a high school district, a notice of appeal bearing the title of the case as against one named defendant, "et al.," without naming them, and stating in the body thereof "that the defendants above named" hereby appeal, was sufficient, in view of the liberal rule of construction which must be applied to such notices, and the fact that the appeal must necessarily be made on the part of all the defendants or none at all.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action for mandamus by Gwynn E. Hopkins, otherwise known as Mrs. M. P. Hopkins, against Charles L. Sanderson and others, composing the Board of Trustees of the Whittier Union High School District. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Motion to dismiss appeal denied.

See, also, 159 Pac. 1064.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and Hugh Gordon, Jr., Deputy Co. Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for appellants. M. P. Hopkins, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Motion to dismiss appeal for alleged lack of sufficient notice. The respondent, as appears both from the affidavit of her attorney and the certified copies of documents presented by defendants, sued for and obtained judgment of mandamus against Charles L. Sanderson and four other persons mentioned in the title of the suit by name and as composing the board of trustees of the Whittier union high school district. A notice of appeal was given. That notice bore at its head the title of the case in the following form:

"Gwynn E. Hopkins, Otherwise Known as Mrs. M. P. Hopkins, Plaintiff, v. Charles L. Sanderson et al., Defendants."

In the body of the notice it was stated:

"That the defendants above named desire to appeal and do hereby appeal * * * from the whole of that certain order * * * and from the whole of the judgment of the aforesaid superior court; * * * and the defendants hereby request that the transcript of the testimony and evidence taken * * * be made up and prepared."

The point upon which a dismissal of the appeal is asked is that the notice was insufficient to institute an appeal on behalf of all of the defendants who were sued in the action, as they are not named in the title which appears at the head of the notice of appeal. As has already been stated, the defendants compose the board of trustees of the Whittier union high school district and were sued jointly as such. Taking the notice of appeal in its substance, it seems very clear that the intention was made manifest to take an appeal on behalf of all of the defendants. There would be no room for question as to the sufficiency of this notice, had the defendants, after designating the title as they have at the head of their notice of appeal, proceeded to state "that the defendants in the above-entitled action desire to appeal and do hereby appeal." And in view of the liberal rule of construction which must be applied to such notices in order to effectuate the right of the parties to an appeal, we feel it but reasonable to hold that the language employed by the defendants in the body of their notice, wherein the words are used, "the defendants above named," should be construed as indicating all of the defendants sued in the action and against whom judgment was entered. As sustaining the view that these notices should be liberally construed, we refer to the decision in the case of Estate of Nelson, 128 Cal. 242, 60 Pac. 772, in which case the Supreme Court suggests that where a notice of appeal is imperfect in a matter not deemed of vital substance, leave to correct under the permission given by section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, might be taken.

There is hardly any room for the claim in this case that the plaintiff could have been misled by the notice of appeal and left in doubt as to which of the parties intended to seek a review of the judgment awarded to her. The defendants composed an official board and their interest in the action was, in that particular, joint. Necessarily, as plaintiff's counsel himself suggests, the appeal should be on the part of all of the defendants or none at all. Clearly, then, where the plural form was made use of in the wording of the notice of appeal, the intention was apparent that all of the defendants should be affected by the proceedings.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action for mandamus by Gwynn E. Hopkins, otherwise known as Mrs. M. P. Hopkins, against Charles L. Sanderson and others, composing the board of trustees of the Whittier Union High School District. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, Hugh Gordon, Jr., Deputy Co. Counsel, and Frederick W. Smith, all of Los Angeles for appellants. M. P. Hopkins, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. The plaintiff herein was awarded in the trial court a writ of mandate to compel the payment to her of certain money which she alleged was due her for three months' services as librarian for the Whittier union high school district. She alleges that she was employed by the board of trustees of said district on the 4th day of June, 1915. This employment was denied on the part of the defendants, and it was alleged affirmatively that there had been an offer made to the plaintiff to employ her in the capacity of librarian, said offer being made with the express condition that notice of acceptance should be furnished within twenty days, and that no such notice was furnished within said time. On behalf of the plaintiff there was introduced in evidence a minute record of the board of trustees of a meeting held on June 4, 1915, wherein the employment of various persons as teachers and in other capacities was recorded, the plaintiff being one of the number mentioned in that minute. Upon this proof plaintiff rested as having made out a prima facie case. In the answer a copy of the document which it was alleged had been sent to the plaintiff, notifying her of her employment as librarian, was set out. An affidavit contradicting the genuineness and due execution of the instrument was filed, raising an issue as to that matter. That notice contained the following provision:

"This notice is in conformity with section 1617 of the California School Code. An acceptance of same is required under provisions of same section, within twenty days. Failure to comply with such provision renders the position vacant."

The original notice was not introduced in evidence. When the defendants sought to prove by an officer of the school board that the notice as alleged had been sent to the plaintiff, it was objected that no demand had been made for the production of the original, and that secondary evidence to establish the fact was not proper to be received. There was considerable argument had at the trial upon the question raised by the objection. However, without objection, the president of the school board was permitted to testify that the board of trustees elected the plaintiff with the proviso, as outlined in a notice which was sent to her, that ratification or acceptance by the employé must be signed and returned within twenty days, or the office would become vacant. It was, therefore, sufficiently made to appear that the employment of the petitioner as made by the board at its meeting of June 4, 1915, was conditional upon notice of acceptance being received within twenty days thereafter. As we have before stated, it was not contended that there was any such acceptance within the time provided; in fact, the express testimony showed that the plaintiff did not attempt to comply with the requirement until after the twenty days had expired. The board then refused to consider her acceptance as being within time and refused to certify to her employment.

It is said that the offer of employment requiring acceptance within twenty days only applied to teachers, citing section 1617 of the Political Code. That section in its provisions relating to the acceptance of school positions does refer only to teachers when it declares:

"Provided further, that any teacher who shall fail to signify his acceptance within twenty days after such election, shall be deemed to have declined the same. * * *

The trial judge seems to have agreed with this contention, when he found that the employment of the petitioner was completed at the time of the meeting of the board of trustees. In support of such determination the argument is that, as the board of trustees was not required in the case of employes other than teachers to demand that notice of acceptance be given within twenty days, the engagement of such other employes would be complete at the time of the adoption of the resolution selecting them. We are not in accord with the trial court in this conclusion. It was undoubtedly within the right of the board of trustees to require a notice of acceptance to be given on the part of the person proposed to be employed; and whether the section of the school law referred to required it or not, it was without question the belief of the board that the section did so require it, and it was their intent, when the notice of selection was sent to the plaintiff, that the employment should not be completed until the plaintiff had notified the board that she would accept their offer. If such a condition were wholly unauthorized, then where the board did make the condition it would follow, not that the contract of employment was completed at the time the resolution was adopted, but that there was no employment, as it was wholly without the intent of the board at that time so to make it complete. We think the trial judge was in error as to his conclusion, and that the plaintiff, not having accepted the position offered to her within the time limited, was not entitled to the salary attached to the position.

The judgment is reversed.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 282, subd. 5, requiring attorneys to maintain inviolate their clients' confidences, one alleging unprofessional conduct must prove that she reposed confidence in the accused as an attorney, and that he violated such confidence, and it is a good defense, as to transactions prior to 1911, that the client did not deal with him as an attorney; section 287 as then in force failing to provide for disbarment in such cases.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Proceedings for disbarment of Wilson H. Soale as an attorney at law. From judgment of disbarment, the defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Gray, Barker & Bowen and Wheaton A. Gray, all of Los Angeles, and Bennett & Cary, of Pasadena, for appellant. Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The Los Angeles Bar Association filed in the superior court of Los Angeles county an accusation, verified by the oath of one Grace A. Hilborn, charging that Wilson H. Soale had violated his oath as an attorney and counselor at law by the commission of certain acts therein described. An answer was filed, denying the facts alleged as showing defendant's misconduct. After trial of the issues thus presented the court found that all of the allegations of the accusation are true, and it was ordered:

"That the accused Wilson H. Soale, be deprived of the right to practice as an attorney at law in the state of California for one year from date hereof, and thereafter until the claim of the accuser, Grace A. Hilborn, against said accused is fully paid."

From this judgment he appeals.

In September, 1909, and thereafter during the occurrence of the transactions involved in this case, Mr. Soale as a member of the firm of Soale & Crump, was engaged in practice as an attorney and counselor at law in the city of Pasadena, Cal. At the beginning of these transactions the lady now known as Grace A. Hilborn was Grace Hilborn Jenkins, the wife of one Jenkins. In September, 1909, Mrs. Jenkins went into the office of Soale & Crump and entered into a discussion with Mr. Soale concerning her business affairs and her property. As a result of that discussion, as she was expecting to be absent from Los Angeles county for some time, Mrs. Jenkins executed to Mr. Soale and Mr. Crump, as copartners, a general power of attorney which, among other things, authorized them to convey real property for her and in her name. According to her testimony this was done pursuant to a suggestion by Mr. Soale that she would do well to let them care for the property and look out for it for her. Acting under this employment and authority, an exchange of property was negotiated by which, in return for five acres of land owned by Mrs. Jenkins near Alhambra, she acquired $1,000 and a house and lot in Pasadena which we will designate as the Summit avenue property. The matters complained of in this proceeding relate to an additional transaction in which Mrs. Jenkins received 4,000 shares of stock of a corporation called the Automatic Car Coupler Company, in exchange for the Summit avenue property.

In January, 1910, Mrs. Jenkins consulted Mr. Soale about obtaining a divorce from her husband, and an agreement was made as to the amount of the fee to be paid to Soale & Crump for their services in that matter. Such is the effect of the testimony of Mrs. Jenkins. The complaint in the divorce action was not filed until some months after the first consultation, and it was during that interval that the transactions occurred which are the subject of the complaint herein.

The Automatic Car Coupler Company appears to have been incorporated in the early part of the year 1909, with a capital stock of 50,000 shares of the par value of $1 each. It was organized in Pasadena, and its principal business grew out of an automatic car coupler invention which was transferred to the corporation in return for certain shares of the stock. At the same time shares of treasury stock were sold at 10 cents per share, and from time to time during the year 1909 the price was advanced by resolution of the directors of the corporation until they had raised it to par for sales by the company. Mr. Soale was one of the early stockholders. He owned 4,000 shares of stock acquired at 10 cents per share. Soale & Crump also owned 1,000 shares of stock. The 4,000 shares belonging to Mr. Soale are the same shares that were transferred to Mrs. Jenkins in exchange for the Summit avenue property, and under the circumstances to which we shall refer. In November, 1909, Mr. Soale caused the 4,000 shares to be transferred to his son-in-law Lewis Sprague, and left the new certificate with Mrs. Sprague for her husband. Soale received no consideration for this transfer.

Dr. D. T. Bentley, a retired physician residing in Pasadena, was engaged in the real estate business. He was acquainted with Mr. Soale, and occasionally consulted him in regard to legal matters. Mr. Soale informed him that Mrs. Jenkins wanted to trade her Summit avenue property for stock. Thereupon Dr. Bentley called upon Mrs. Jenkins and entered into negotiations with her for the transfer of her property to Sprague in exchange for the 4,000 shares which were represented as the property of Sprague. Thereupon Mrs. Jenkins called upon Mr. Soale and told him of Dr. Bentley's proposition, and that she had told Dr. Bentley that she would do just exactly as Mr. Soale said, and asked him if he knew anything about the automatic car coupler stock. Soale replied that he had stock in the company; that he was surprised that any stock had been offered for sale; that it was a splendid company; had $500 in the treasury; and that she would be very lucky to get it. He said:

"I have stock in it myself, so I can watch and care for it for you just exactly and take care of it for you. You leave it to me."

A few days later she called at the office, and Mr. Soale told her that the deed was made out and ready for her to sign and the certificate of stock ordered. She signed the deed, and he handed her the certificate. The terms of the transaction were that in exchange for the stock, received at a valuation of $4,000, Mrs. Jenkins transferred the Summit avenue property at a valuation of $5,000, but subject to a $2,000 mortgage, and in addition thereto paid $1,000. This $1,000 was paid by checks to the order of Sprague, indorsed by him, and the proceeds received by Soale. The only way in which Mr. Soale paid over the money to Sprague was by using it in payment of bills incurred for the support of Sprague and his family. It seems that Sprague had never been able to support his family, and that Mr. Soale was in the habit of contributing largely to the support of that family by paying its bills along with his own.

During these negotiations Mr. Soale stated to Mrs. Jenkins that he had been looking this thing up, and Lewis Sprague was a man about town who wanted a home and was willing to trade, but did not tell her, and she did not know until long afterwards, that Sprague was Soale's son-in-law, or that any financial or business relations existed between Soale and Sprague. Immediately after the Summit avenue property was conveyed to Sprague, Mr. Soale placed that property in the hands of real estate agents for sale. In placing the property with B. O. Kendall Company, as agents, he gave a price of $5,000, and stated that "it is a snap, and will not be on the market long until it is sold." The deed by which Mrs. Jenkins conveyed the Summit avenue property to Lewis Sprague was executed on the 2d day of March, 1910, and recorded July 28, 1910. On the same day, and immediately following the record of that deed, there was recorded another conveyance, executed July 26, 1910, whereby Lewis Sprague and his wife conveyed the same property to Wilson H. Soale. A few months later Mr. Soale conveyed the Summit avenue property to a purchaser subject to the existing $2,000 mortgage, and received a further consideration of $2,000. He testified that this $2,000 went to Sprague, his son-in-law; but he further stated that this was done by paying bills amounting to $2,000 and a great deal more for the sustenance of his son-in-law and his family. They were paid with Soale's checks. "That is the way the business was carried on most of the time they were married. I was disbursing agent for the whole family, and they brought the bills to me."

Dr. Bentley claimed a commission for negotiating the trade in which he acted as agent. When Mrs. Jenkins informed Mr. Soale that Bentley wanted to charge her a commission, Mr. Soale said:

"Never mind; you leave it all to me. I will see Bentley and see what can be done. You leave it all for me."

Later he told her that he had managed to get Dr. Bentley down to $50, and she paid that amount through Soale to Bentley. Soale paid Bentley an additional sum of $150 out of the $1,000 obtained from Mrs. Jenkins in the trade, but did not inform Mrs. Jenkins, and she did not know that anything was being paid to Bentley other than the $50 paid as above stated.

[1] Many of the facts given in the foregoing statement were denied by appellant in his testimony, but are supported by other evidence. We give them as the facts in the case because the court found that all of the allegations stated in the accusation are true, and it is necessarily implied that the court found these facts in accordance with the testimony of the accusing witness and against the testimony of appellant. Under the well-established rule, a Court of Appeal must assume the facts to be as found by the trial court when those facts find support in the evidence, notwithstanding other evidence to the contrary.

Aside from their contention that some of the facts above stated are not supported by the evidence, counsel for appellant insist that there is no evidence to support the implied finding that the shares of stock transferred to Mrs. Jenkins were not substantially worth $4,000, or $1 per share, as they were assumed to be in making the exchange. They further contend that, even if appellant defrauded Mrs. Jenkins in the transaction he was not in that transaction acting as an attorney at law, and could not be said to have violated his oath and duty as an attorney at law by anything that he did therein. Finally they say that the court exceeded its authority in rendering the judgment, which not only ordered that the accused be deprived of the right to practice as an attorney at law in the state of California for one year from the date thereof, but further deprived him of that right "until the claim of the accuser, Grace A. Hilborn, against said accused is fully paid."

[2] Aside from the patent rights transferred to it and possibly a small sum of money in the treasury, the only asset of the Automatic Car Coupler Company in March, 1910, seems to have been a certain contract dated November 1, 1909, made between that corporation and the Electric Traction Supply Company, a Missouri corporation, by which the latter company was given the exclusive right to manufacture and sell the said patented automatic couplings within the United States of America. Certain obligations were entered into by the Missouri company for the payment of royalties, and a minimum amount was named for a series of years commencing with the year beginning November 1, 1910. It was not shown that any business has ever been transacted under that contract or any income received therefrom. Prior to March, 1910, the Automatic Car Coupler Company had manufactured a limited number of car couplers, which had been given or loaned to certain railway corporations, evidently for advertising purposes. It is stated in the testimony of Mrs. Jenkins that when she consulted Mr. Soale about the proposed exchange involved in this case, he said that the Automatic Car Coupler Company stock was well worth $1 per share, and perhaps more. He also told her of the contract with the Electric Traction Supply Company, and said that on account of this contract the stock would be as good as 6 per cent. from the 1st of November, 1910; but he also gave her a copy of the contract, and she took it away with her. On behalf of the accused only one witness was questioned about the value of the Automatic Car Coupler Company's stock, and he did not claim to know anything about its value. Over defendant's objection this witness, J. W. Dubbs, was permitted to say that when he bought stock in the company about one year before March, 1910, he bought it from the company, and paid 10 cents a share. At the close of the case for the prosecution, defendant's counsel moved for a nonsuit; but as it was in general terms and did not specify any particular defect in the evidence, that motion should be disregarded. Coffey v. Greenfield, 62 Cal. 602, 608; Schroeder v. Mauzy, 16 Cal. App. 443, 450, 118 Pac. 459.

[3] The defendant introduced much evidence to support his claim that the market value of stock in this company was equal to or in excess of the par value, and it is our duty to consider all of the evidence and determine whether as a whole the evidence is sufficient to sustain the implied finding against defendant on this branch of the case; for notwithstanding testimony to the contrary, the finding must be sustained if the record contains evidence which by itself would be sufficient to support such finding. We will refer to defendant's witnesses in the order of the references to their testimony in the brief of his counsel. Karl Elliott was the secretary of the corporation. He knew of sales made early in 1910 at $1 per share, and one sale at $1.25 per share. The first stock sold by the company was at 10 cents a share, the next price was 25 cents a share, next 50 cents a share, and late in 1909, 80 cents a share. After that the asked price was $1, but no sales were made by the company at that price.

Frank R. Bonny was president of the corporation. His regular occupation was that of a conductor in the freight department of an electric railroad. He said that he knew the value of the Automatic stock in March, 1910, and that it was $1.12½ per share. He sold 200 shares of his stock at that time and at that price. It was much sought after, and still worth $1 per share even down to the date of the trial in April, 1913. He knew of other sales as follows: 1,000 shares sold in August, 1909, by the corporation, at 80 cents; 400 shares sold in August, 1909, by the corporation, at 80 cents; 200 shares sold in December, 1909, at $1, by the witness to Mr. Heiss; 500 shares sold by the witness in November, 1909, at $1 per share; 250 shares bought by the witness July 15, 1910, at $1.25 per share; 3,800 shares bought July 1, 1910, by Mr. Goode, at $1 per share; 3,400 shares bought in March, 1911, by Mr. Goode at $1 per share. The principal part of Mr. Bonny's stock consisted of 10,000 shares issued to him by the company in return for the patent rights which he transferred to it in March, 1909. He had a few other small transactions in the stock besides those above noted. The following occurred on his cross-examination:

"Q. Did you ever place any of this on the public market for sale? A. No, sir. Q. Do you know whether any of it ever was placed on the market for sale? A. I don't know. Q. All the sales were among your own people and your associates, were they not? A. It was. Q. Officers of the corporation and their associates; all of it was made that way? A. Yes."

E. S. Goode became a stockholder in this corporation in April, 1910, when he purchased between 11,000 and 12,000 shares at $1 per share. While he asserted that he would not now take less than that amount for his stock, he did not claim that he knew at any time what the stock was worth in the market. On cross-examination this witness admitted that after purchasing the stock in question he made an assignment for the benefit of his creditors and did not list this property as part of his assets. "I bought the stock in my name and transferred it to my wife and nephew, except 50 shares stood in my name. * * * I was trying to buy a controlling interest in the company. Would do it to-day if I could get it."

The defendant Wilson H. Soale, testifying about the stock transferred to Mrs. Jenkins, was asked: "Is that stock worth any money now?" to which he replied: "Certainly; it is worth more than it was traded for." C. M. Gruell, a shipping clerk, testified that the stock was quoted at from $1 to $1.13 in the early part of 1910. Cross-examination developed that he had very little actual knowledge of the subject. C. H. Wills testified that the market value of the stock in the early part of 1910 was 80 cents per share. He had bought some of the stock from the company when it was 10 cents per share, and later sold some to Mr. Bonny at $1 per share. F. H. Norwood, the original patentee of the automatic car coupler, testified that the value of the stock in March, 1910, was 80 cents per share; that shortly before that time he sold some stock to Mr. Bonny at $1 per share. Norwood also testified that he received 10,000 shares of the stock in consideration of the transfer of his patent rights to the company. Whether he and Bonny received 10,000 shares each for the transfer of separate patents, or received that number of shares jointly for a joint transfer of patents does not clearly appear. Frank L. Heiss, clothing merchant, testified that the value of this stock on the market in February and March, 1910, was $1 per share. He bought his stock from Bonny at that price, and knew of other sales at the same price.

On this record was the court justified in determining that the accused violated his oath and his duties as an attorney and counselor at law? One of the stipulations in the statutory oath is that the person admitted will faithfully discharge the duties of an attorney and counselor at law to the best of his knowledge and ability. One of these duties requires the attorney and counselor "to maintain inviolate the confidence * * * of his client." Code Civ. Proc. § 282, subd. 5. In order to support the charges here, it must have appeared that Mrs. Jenkins was Mr. Soale's client, that she reposed confidence in him as a counselor at law, and that he violated that confidence. On behalf of the accused it is contended that in connection with the exchange of Mrs. Jenkins' Summit avenue property for corporation stock, he was not acting in his capacity as an attorney, "because in its nature the act complained of was a personal business transaction, requiring no skill of attorney and no knowledge or understanding of law." The causes for which an attorney may be removed or suspended are stated in section 287, Code of Civil Procedure. Under that section as amended in 1911, this defense could not be maintained; but if the nature of the facts is such as claimed by the accused, that would be a good defense against charges based, as these are, upon transactions occurring in the year 1910. Thus, in the case of In re Collins, 147 Cal. 12, 81 Pac. 222, where it clearly appeared that the acts complained of were not done by the respondent in his professional capacity or in connection with any matters in which his duties as an attorney were involved, it was held that:

"To the extent that an attorney may be disbarred for causes which affect his moral integrity in dealings with others of a purely personal character, and transacted in his private capacity, the statute has provided that it shall be done by the court only when he has been convicted of a felony, or of a misdemeanor involving moral turpitude."

[4, 5] It is our opinion, however, that in these transactions Mrs. Jenkins reposed confidence in Mr. Soale as a counselor at law. The evidence does not indicate that he was engaged in business as an agent or broker, or maintained his office for any purpose other than in the course of his profession as an attorney and counselor. She went to him in that office and called upon him for advice and assistance in the conduct of her business affairs, without any notice or suggestion that in accepting the employment he was representing her in any way other than in his professional capacity. The occupation of a lawyer is not confined to appearances for parties in actions in courts of justice. A very large part of the professional work done by them consists in advice given to clients for the general purpose of aiding them in the conduct of their business affairs. At the time of these transactions Mrs. Jenkins was consulting Mr. Soale concerning a proposed action at law, and it appears that she consulted him about her other business affairs indiscriminately and without any attempted classification of the transactions as being partly within and partly without the scope of his professional business. She was entitled to believe that she was under his care as a counselor employed by her. The fact that in this particular transaction he did not enter any fee charges against her does not change the situation at all, for he was entitled to charge such fees if he so desired. We conclude, therefore, that she did repose confidence in him as her counselor at law, and the only remaining question is as to whether or not he maintained inviolate that confidence. The phrase "maintain inviolate the confidence," as contained in section 282, Code of Civil Procedure, is not confined merely to noncommunication of facts learned in the course of professional employment; for the section separately imposes the duty to "preserve the secrets of his client."

[6, 7] Appellant contends that under the evidence in this case it appears that he did not intend to wrong Mrs. Jenkins or to defraud her in any way in the trade, and that even if false representations and concealments occurred which are chargeable against him, no cause of action has been established, since the stock was in fact worth the $4,000 which it cost her. Some of the circumstances involved, to which we have referred, tend to show that the accused secretly treated as his own property which, by his advice and pursuant to a plan conceived by him, she was induced to transfer to a third person without knowledge of the fact that in reality her property was passing into appellant's hands. The court was entitled to believe, and did believe, these to be the facts; and, this being so, the conclusion is clearly warranted that he considered the transaction as one favorable to himself and to which he believed that she would not consent if she had known his real interest therein. Under these circumstances, it should be determined that a lawyer is violating the confidence of his client, even though in its ultimate result the transaction does not lead to a substantial financial loss on the part of the client. In order to sustain an accusation in a disbarment proceeding in a case of this character, it is not necessary to establish all of the facts with reference to the ultimate loss on the part of the client which might be necessary in an action brought by her against him for damages on account of the alleged deceit.

[8] Our conclusions, as above stated, are sufficient to require us to sustain a judgment removing or suspending the accused from the right to practice his profession. We have to consider further only the claim that the court exceeded its authority by rendering an indefinite and uncertain judgment suspending the accused, not only for one year from the date of the judgment, but also "thereafter until the claim of the accuser, Grace A. Hilborn, against said accused is fully paid." The court found that all of the allegations of the accusation are true. One of these allegations was that the 4,000 shares of stock were worthless. It was also alleged and the evidence shows without question that the value parted with by the accuser amounted to $4,000. It was held by the Supreme Court of California in the only decision which covers the question that in a disbarment proceeding the accused might be suspended for a period not necessarily limited as a fixed and determinate period of time, but could be for an uncertain time, subject to the right of the accused to relieve himself therefrom by making restitution of a stated amount of money which he had improperly obtained by means of his professional misconduct. In re Tyler, 78 Cal. 307, 20 Pac. 674, 12 Am. St. Rep. 55. In that case the record showed the amount as established by another judgment, and the judgment of suspension was not subject to attack by reason of any uncertainty in the amount which the accused was required to restore. Following that decision, we think the judgment in the case at bar should be sustained in the form in which it was entered, unless it requires to be modified on account of uncertainty in its statement of the amount of the claim of the accuser. If the evidence is sufficient to show that the stock was worthless, that amount would be $4,000, with interest. The record herein shows that at some time the accuser obtained a judgment against Soale by reason of these same transactions, but that judgment is not before the court, and we do not know either its date or the amount to be recovered as specified therein. We think that the evidence in this case is insufficient to prove that the stock was worthless. That being so, the amount of the claim referred to in the judgment is not ascertained, and the above-quoted final clause thereof is too uncertain to be capable of enforcement.

It is ordered that the judgment herein be modified by striking therefrom the words "and thereafter until the claim of the accuser, Grace A. Hilborn, against said accused is fully paid." As thus modified, the judgment is affirmed.

Rehearing Denied Oct. 9, 1916.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS $\Leftrightarrow$ 269(1)—STREETS
— RAILROAD CROSSING — “MUNICIPAL AFFAIRS”—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 11, § 6, provides that city charters adopted thereunder shall not be subject to control by general laws, so far as municipal affairs are concerned. The charter of the city of Los Angeles (St. 1889, p. 456), as amended March 25, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 2061) authorizes the city to establish, lay out, open, or vacate streets and crossings, to acquire real property for the exercise of its powers, and, to regulate the operation of railroads and other public utilities within the city. Const. art. 12, § 23, reserves to each incorporated city all control of public utilities, other than the fixing of rates, unless the city by a vote transfers such control to the Railroad Commission, and Public Utilities Act of 1911 (Sp. Sess. 1911, p. 40), § 43, provides that no grade crossing shall be made without the permission of the Railroad Commission, and section 82 thereof reserves the same control to cities, as that given by Const. art. 12, § 23, Code Civ. Proc. § 1247, gives the superior court jurisdiction to regulate the mode of making crossings, condemnation, etc. Held, that the city, which had not elected to make such transfer to the Railroad Commission, had the power to lay out and regulate streets, such matters being clearly “municipal affairs,” and the incidental power to regulate the construction of railroads and to open a street across an existing road, to regulate the railroad at such crossing, and to acquire land for such purpose, so that it might open a street across a railroad, acquire land therefor, and regulate the use of a crossing without the permission of the Railroad Commission.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Proceedings by the City of Los Angeles against the Central Trust Company of New York and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. W. McKinley, Frank Karr, and A. W. Ashburn, Jr., all of Los Angeles, and Joline, Larkin & Rathbone, and Murray, Prentice & Howland, all of New York City, for appellants. Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., and Charles S. Burnell, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent. Max Thelen and Douglas Brookman, both of San Francisco, for Railroad Commission.

SHAW, J. The defendants appeal from the judgment. By regular proceedings under the Street Opening Act of 1903 (St. 1903, p. 376), and subsequent amendments thereto, the city council of Los Angeles ordered the opening of Arlington street across a strip of land owned in fee by the defendant Southern Pacific Company and used by it as a part of its right of way for its railroad, and directed the city attorney to bring an action in the name of the city for the condemnation of the interest of the defendants in the land necessary to be taken for said crossing. This action was begun in pursuance of said order. Upon the trial the parties stipulated that the condemnation of the lands by the city for street purposes should not interfere with nor prejudice the defendants in the use of said land for the maintenance and operation of its railroad thereon, and that with that condition appended to the right to open and use the street, the value of the land to be taken was $10. The court below found the necessary facts regarding the proceedings for the opening of the street and the right of the city to condemn the land and, in pursuance of the stipulation, entered judgment of condemnation, fixing the value of the land taken at $10. Proceedings to open the street were begun on December 26, 1911. This action was begun in April, 1912, and judgment was given in May, 1913.

The appellants base their appeal upon section 43 of the Public Utilities Act of 1911, which took effect March 23, 1912 (Special Sess. 1911, p. 18), providing that no grade crossings of any railroad by a street, or of any street by a railroad, shall be made without the permission of the Railroad Commission first obtained, that the Commission shall have power to refuse or grant such permission upon such terms and conditions as it may prescribe, and that it shall have exclusive power to determine and prescribe the manner and place of making such crossings, and to abolish such crossings, at its pleasure. Their position is that this provision withholds from the superior court jurisdiction to entertain the condemnation suit for the opening of the street across a railroad in operation until after the permission of the Railroad Commission shall have been obtained. If section 43 is in force in the city of Los Angeles, and is to be construed as claimed by appellants, the effect would be that the land for the crossing cannot be acquired by condemnation, nor the crossing itself established, until after the Railroad Commission has consented thereto, and then only upon compliance with the conditions which it may prescribe.

It is contended by the respondent that, conceding the statute to have this effect, it would not divest the superior court of jurisdiction, but would give the court power to entertain the action and render its judgment of condemnation, leaving the city to make its application to the Railroad Commission after having acquired title to the land in the condemnation proceeding. To this, objection is made on the ground that it would be futile to subject the property owner to the expense of the litigation necessary to obtain the judgment of condemnation before it could be known whether the crossing could be established at that point or not, and that the damages could not be estimated until the conditions regulating its maintenance were prescribed. We do not think it necessary to determine the question thus presented. We have concluded that the aforesaid section of the Public Utilities Act does not apply to street openings and railroad crossings within the city of Los Angeles.

The power of the Legislature to pass the Public Utilities Act is derived from the provisions of section 23, art. 12, of the Constitution. This constitutional provision reserved to every incorporated city all the powers of control over public utilities relating to the making and enforcement of local, police, sanitary and other regulations, other than the fixing of rates, which are vested in such city, unless the city by popular vote chooses to transfer the same to the Railroad Commission. Section 82 of the Public Utilities Act in substantially identical terms makes the same reservation in favor of cities. The city of Los Angeles has never elected to make such transfer. Consequently it still retains unimpaired all its regulatory powers of control over public utilities, except rate fixing. Section 6, art. 11, also provides that city charters framed and adopted under the provisions of that article shall not be subject to or controlled by general laws, so far as municipal affairs are concerned. The amendment of 1914 to section 6 uses different terms, but does not change the effect, and it still leaves such city charters paramount to general laws with respect to municipal affairs. The charter of the city of Los Angeles, as amended on March 25, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 2061), gave to that city the following powers:

"To establish, lay out, open * * * or vacate, * * * streets, * * * crossings, * * * and other public places." (Section 2, subd. 13); also "to acquire by * * * condemnation * * * real property * * * within or without the city, necessary, * * * for the exercise of the powers of the corporation" (section 2, subd. 16); also "to regulate, subject to the provisions of the Constitution of the state of California, the construction and operation of railroads," and other public utilities in their operations within the city (section 2, subd. 30).

The charter of 1889 and the amendments of 1905 and 1909 to section 2 thereof gave to the city similar powers. St. 1889, p. 457; St. 1905, p. 994; St. 1909, p. 1291.

The opening, laying out, and improving of streets within a city, and the regulation of the manner of their use, are matters of much greater concern to its inhabitants than to the people of the state at large, and they are clearly municipal affairs, the control of which has always been deemed within the proper scope of municipal powers. Sinton v. Ashbury, 41 Cal. 531; People v. Holladay, 93 Cal. 248, 29 Pac. 54, 27 Am. St. Rep. 186; Hellman v. Shoulters, 114 Cal. 149, 44 Pac. 915, 45 Pac. 1057; Byrne v. Drain, 127 Cal. 667, 60 Pac. 433. The power to establish, lay out, and open streets, and crossings thereof, and to regulate the construction and operation of railroads within the city, includes the power to open a street across an existing railroad as well as anywhere else within the city, and to regulate the operations of the railroad at such crossing as well as elsewhere. The power to acquire land for that purpose applies as well to the land of a railroad company as to that of any other person. The charter, therefore, vested in the city of Los Angeles the power to open this street across the defendants' railroad, to acquire such interest in the land as was necessary for that purpose, and to regulate the manner in which the crossing should be maintained, guarded, and protected by the railroad company and the municipal authorities, respectively. Being municipal affairs the provisions of the charter on the subject are paramount, and supersede general laws which would otherwise apply thereto, so far as operations within the city are concerned. Law v. San Francisco, 144 Cal. 391, 77 Pac. 1014; Fritz v. San Francisco, 132 Cal. 377, 64 Pac. 566; Byrne v. Drain, supra; Barber, etc., Co. v. Costa, 171 Cal. 138, 152 Pac. 298.

Therefore, if we regard the Public Utilities Act as a general law on the subject and consider it independently of any special authority to legislate upon that subject given to the Legislature by the provisions of section 23, art. 12, of the Constitution, the conclusion is inevitable that the charter provisions override those of the Public Utilities Act on the subject so far as the same would otherwise apply to the city of Los Angeles.

If we consider the Public Utilities Act as an exercise of the power to legislate over public utilities specially given to it by the last-cited section of the Constitution, we find that the Legislature is restricted in its powers by the aforesaid proviso, declaring that all powers theretofore vested in a city respecting the local control of public utilities shall remain unimpaired, until such city has voted to transfer such powers to the Railroad Commission; that these powers, in cities such as Los Angeles, are reserved to the city, and hence that they are unaffected by any act of the Legislature purporting to confer power of that character upon the Railroad Commission. For these reasons we are of the opinion that the provision of the Public Utilities Act has no application to this case.

It is contended, however, by the appellants, and also in a brief, filed amicus curiæ on behalf of the Railroad Commission, that the city of Los Angeles never possessed the power to regulate the place and manner of making crossings of streets and railroads within its limits, because, as they say, section 1247 of the Code of Civil Procedure, enacted in 1872, vested in the superior court the power to make such regulations whenever they should be involved in a condemnation suit. The provision of that section is as follows:

"The court shall have power—

"1. To regulate and determine the place and manner of making connections and crossings, or of enjoying the common use mentioned in the fifth subdivision of section twelve hundred and forty."

If section 1247 were construed to give the superior court power to determine the places where public streets should be allowed to cross existing railroads and to make regulations governing the manner of making such crossings, it would confer legislative power upon the judicial department of the state. The opening and maintaining of public streets and the regulation of the manner of making crossings of streets and railroads so as to promote the public safety and welfare are legislative functions, and hence it may be doubted if under article 3 of the Constitutions of 1849 and 1879 such functions could be given to the superior court by the Legislature. Wulzen v. Board, 101 Cal. 21, 25, 35 Pac. 353, 40 Am. St. Rep. 17; People v. Provines, 34 Cal. 532; Smith v. Strother, 68 Cal. 196, 8 Pac. 852. Perhaps the power so given extends only to the making of such provisions in the judgment of condemnation as may be appropriate to preserve the rights of the respective parties, having reference to the compensation to be made for the taking, and to secure to them the guaranty of the fifth (now the seventh) subdivision of section 1240 and of section 1242 that the property shall be taken in the manner most compatible with the greatest public good and the least private injury. In doing so the court must comply with existing regulations on the subject made by the legislative department. We need not discuss its scope in this direction, nor decide the questions which might arise concerning it. Whatever it may mean, it cannot prevail over the provisions of the city charter of Los Angeles, above quoted, on the subject, so far as to interfere with the powers of the city to extend and open streets. These provisions relate to municipal affairs, and, as we have said, they are paramount to general laws, and supersede such laws where inconsistent therewith. This section of the Code of Civil Procedure is not to be distinguished in this respect from any other general law inconsistent with the charter, and it falls within the rule above applied to the Public Utilities Act, considered independently of the special legislative authority given by section 23, art. 12, of the Constitution. The power to open a street, establish the crossing, and regulate the use thereof, and the manner of making it, were therefore vested in the city of Los Angeles at the time the Public Utilities Act and section 23, aforesaid, became the law, and by virtue of the reservation in said section 23 and of section 82 of the act, if not otherwise, they remain vested in the city, and not in the Railroad Commission, anything in section 1247 of the Code of Civil Procedure to the contrary notwithstanding.

This conclusion disposes of the case, and settles all the questions presented by the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; SLOSS, J.; LORIGAN, J.; LAWLOR, J.

HENSHAW, J. (concurring). I concur in the foregoing opinion and judgment. I do so because I agree with my Associates that the law is so written. One may be permitted, however, to express the regret that the law itself is not otherwise. Touching a public utility operating wholly within the corporate limits of a municipality, no reason can be perceived why its regulation and control might not, with propriety, be intrusted to the municipal authorities; but the condition is very different where the operations of the utility extend beyond the boundaries of a city and where its services are rendered to several, or to many other communities and cities. In such cases it is manifest that the welfare of all concerned (of the utility, of the public and of the state) is best conserved by placing the whole control under a single board or commission (in this state, the Railroad Commission) empowered to adjust all questions which may arise, in the light of all interests entitled to consideration. But, as pointed out, our laws are designedly framed so as not to do this thing, and, as framed, they must be given effect.

PEARSON v. PARSONS. (L. A. 3763.)

1. SALES 71(5)—CONSTRUCTION—NOTICE OF SELECTION.

Under a contract providing that plaintiff would buy and defendant sell 25,000 budded orange trees of standard size, the buyer to have the option of taking them at one year old or two years old from the bud, delivery to be between 1909 and 1911, inclusive, that the buyer should notify the seller one month before the trees were budded as to the variety which he would select in purchasing the trees under the contract and option, and that the buyer should have an option to purchase 25,000 additional trees on the same terms, a notice of selection of varieties for budding, given March 31, 1908, specifying that the trees to be purchased were to be budded to certain varieties, applied both to those bought outright and to those bought under the option, and was sufficiently certain as not to release the seller from delivery of the optional number of trees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Sales, Cent. Dig. §§ 194, 195; Dec. Dig. 71(5).]

2. SALES 71(5) — CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—EXERCISE OF OPTION.

A notice served on the seller March 13, 1909, that, in accordance with the contract, the buyer would take 25,000 standard trees one year from the bud for delivery in April, 1909, and 25,000 standard trees two years from the bud to be delivered between January 1 and July 1, 1910.

constituted an exercise of the option to buy the additional trees.

3. SALES ☞81(5) — CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—EXERCISE OF OPTION—TIME.

The notice of the buyer's exercise of his option, given March 13, 1909, after he had given notice of the varieties he desired in time for the trees to be budded to such varieties, and in the absence of anything to show that the alleged delay caused any inconvenience or loss to the seller, was given within a reasonable time after the making of the contract.

4. WITNESSES ☞167—COMPETENCY—TRANSACTIONS WITH DECEDENT.

In an action for damages for the refusal of an administrator to deliver certain orange trees covered by an option contained in his intestate's contract to sell, testimony of the plaintiff as to conversations, etc., with the intestate were inadmissible, under the express provision of Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by George M. Pearson against Sidney J. Parsons, administrator of the estate of E. E. Hendrick, deceased. Judgment for defendant, motion for new trial denied, and plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Miguel Estudillo and George A. French, both of Riverside, for appellant. Sidney J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff has appealed from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial. The complaint alleges that on or about November 12, 1906, the plaintiff and E. E. Hendrick entered into an agreement whereby said Hendrick agreed to sell plaintiff 25,000 orange trees at a price therein stated; that by the terms of said agreement plaintiff was given an option to purchase 25,000 additional trees upon the same terms and conditions as provided in said agreement for the purchase of the first 25,000 trees; that on or about February 20, 1907, plaintiff exercised and took up said option by notifying the said E. E. Hendrick of his intention to purchase the said additional trees; that on March 13, 1909, plaintiff notified Hendrick that he would buy under said option 25,000 trees to be delivered between January 1 and July 1, 1910; that Hendrick died October 25, 1909; that thereafter, on April 22, 1910, plaintiff demanded of J. G. McKinney, then the administrator of the estate of Hendrick, the delivery of 10,000 trees, and on June 25, 1910, the delivery of 14,200 trees, all in accordance with the terms of the agreement and the option therein provided, but that McKinney refused to make delivery. Parsons was substituted as administrator and as defendant after the action was begun.

[1] The contract sued on is the contract that was under consideration in Pearson v. McKinney, 160 Cal. 649, 117 Pac. 919. The action there determined was a suit for the refusal to deliver the first 25,000 of the budded trees covered by the contract. The present action relates exclusively to the refusal of McKinney, as administrator of the estate of Hendrick, to deliver the 25,000 trees covered by the option given by said contract. The contract contained the following clause:

"It is hereby agreed that the party of the first part shall give notice to the party of the second part one month before the trees are budded as to the variety which the party of the first part will select in purchasing the trees as per this contract and the option hereinafter set forth."

The court found that on March 31, 1908, Pearson gave to Hendrick a notice of selection of varieties for budding, but that at said time Pearson had not exercised or accepted the option for the additional 25,000 trees, and that the notice did not refer to the option, and was not intended to apply thereto. It also found that:

The plaintiff "did not, within a reasonable time after the making of the contract, or at all, accept and become bound to the said E. E. Hendrick to take and purchase said additional 25,000 trees mentioned in the optional portion of said contract."

We are of the opinion that the court was wrong upon both propositions.

The contract first provided that Pearson would buy and Hendrick would sell to him "25,000 budded trees of standard size," Pearson to have the option of buying them "at one year old or two years old from the bud," and that "the delivery of said trees shall be between 1909 and 1911, inclusive." The last clause of the contract was the one giving the option, and was as follows:

"In consideration of the covenants and agreements hereinbefore mentioned, the party of the second part hereby gives to the party of the first part an option to purchase 25,000 additional standard trees as above described, upon the same terms and conditions as herein provided for the purchase of the first 25,000 of such standard trees."

The notice of selection of varieties for budding given on March 31, 1908, was as follows:

"In accordance with contract between G. M. Pearson and E. E. Hendrick, dated the 12th day of November, 1906, I hereby notify you that the trees which I am to purchase under said contract I wish budded to the following varieties: 20 per cent. Thompson improved navels; 25 per cent. Valencias; 45 per cent. Washington navels, 10 per cent. Eureka lemons."

There is no ground for the conclusion that this notice did not apply to the trees to be bought under the option as well as to those bought outright. The clause providing for such notice refers to the trees embraced in the option, as well as to those bought outright, and its terms imply that one selection should serve for all the trees to be bought under the agreement. The notice of selection includes "the trees which I am to purchase under said contract." This would include the last 25,000 trees as well as the first 25,000 trees, and it refers as much to one as to the other. Furthermore, it appears from the evidence that all of the trees of the Pearson stock were budded during the year 1908, after the receipt of this notice, and that a large number of them were budded to the varieties named in the notice. We see no ground for the conclusion that Hendrick was released from the obligation to sell the optional 25,000 trees by reason of any uncertainty in the notice of selection for budding.

[2] With respect to the exercise of the option the court found that it was not exercised on the 20th of February, 1907, as alleged. There was evidence by a witness that in 1907 Pearson handed a letter to Hendrick, in the presence of the witness, saying to Hendrick that it was a notice stating that he would take 50,000 of those citrus trees under a contract. Because of this evidence, which was not contradicted in any way, it is insisted that the finding that the option was not then exercised is not correct. The court further found, however, that on March 13, 1909, Pearson served on Hendrick the following notice:

"In accordance with the contract between Pearson and Hendrick dated November 12, 1906, by the terms of which I am to buy and you are to sell certain nursery stock, I hereby notify you that, in accordance with the terms of said contract, I will buy 25,000 standard trees, one year old from the bud, for delivery in April, May, and June, 1909, and 25,000 standard trees, two years old from the bud, to be delivered between January 1 and July 1, 1910. Will give you later details as to exact dates."

[3] There can be no doubt that this notice constituted an exercise of the option to buy the 25,000 additional trees, even if it had not been previously exercised in February, 1907. The court's finding that the notice of March 13, 1909, was not given within a reasonable time after the making of the contract is not sustained by the terms of the contract itself. Pearson was to have the option of taking trees at one year or two years old, and was given the right to demand delivery at any time during the years 1909, 1910, and 1911. He had already given notice of the varieties he desired, and in accordance therewith the trees had been budded to such varieties during the year 1908. A notice given in March, 1909, before any of the trees had become one year old from the bud, stating that he would take the 25,000 additional trees, under the option, during the year 1910, between January 1st and July 1st, was clearly within the time which the contract itself specified. There was nothing in the circumstances requiring an earlier election to exercise the option. No facts are shown indicating that the delay caused any inconvenience, hardship, or loss to Hendrick, nor anything to indicate that an earlier time would be beneficial to Hendrick. The evidence shows that he persistently and designedly refused to deliver any trees under the Pearson contract. As it also appears that the price of such trees had increased two or three times over in the meantime, we need not seek far to discover the motive for the refusal. In April and June, 1910, when Pearson demanded delivery of the trees covered by the option, the defendant had on hand trees of the kinds and varieties described in the contract and notice of selection. Because of its conclusion that the option had not been exercised, the judgment was given for the defendant. As the notice of March 13, 1909, was a sufficient exercise of the option, even if there was none in February, 1907, as alleged, and as the notice of selection of varieties applied to all the trees bought under the contract, including the option, the judgment should have been for the plaintiff.

[4] Upon the trial Pearson was called as a witness to testify to the service of the notice of February, 1907, of the exercise of the option, and of the conversation between him and Hendrick at that time. The court first admitted the evidence, but before the decision was filed it made a ruling excluding it. A large portion of the briefs is devoted to the discussion of the soundness of this ruling. We do not doubt that it was correct. The action was upon a claim against the administrator upon a contract made with the decedent in his lifetime, and the evidence related to facts occurring prior to the death of the decedent. That the other party is incompetent to testify to any facts occurring prior to the death of the decedent is too thoroughly settled to require discussion. Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 3; Stuart v. Lord, 138 Cal. 676, 72 Pac. 142; Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 145 Cal. 598, 79 Pac. 272.

1. PLEADING  417—DEMURRER—WAIVER—AMENDMENT.

Where a demurrer to the complaint was sustained on the ground that it included several causes of action not separately stated, and the plaintiff amended to state such causes of action in separate counts, and thereby removed the objection and went to trial upon the complaint as amended, he waived the objection that the demurrer was improperly sustained.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS  222(2)—PRESENTATION OF CLAIMS—SCOPE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1500, requires claims against an estate to be presented before suit thereon, and section 1502 provides that, where an action is pending at a decedent's death, plaintiff must file his claim against the decedent with his administrator. A buyer contracted for sale and delivery to him of orange plants. On failure of the seller to comply with the contract, he brought an action for its breach, and on his death pending action his administrator was substituted as defendant, and plaintiff presented a claim against the estate for damages for breach of contract. Judgment for plaintiff was reversed on appeal, and he filed an amended complaint setting forth fraud and negligence of the seller. Held that, as damages for fraud were not included in the claim presented to the administrator, evidence thereof was inadmissible on the second trial.

3. SALES ☞ 81(5) — ACTION FOR BREACH — FRAUD—ALLEGATION.

Plaintiff under contract was to furnish defendant's intestate orange plants to be cultivated and budded by him in varieties selected by plaintiff during 1909–11. Plaintiff was to give notice one month before the budding of the varieties wished, and gave notice March 31, 1908, of such varieties, and that plaintiff would demand deliveries thereof in April, 1909. Held, that the notice was too late to cause intestate to delay budding in April, 1908, as he had prepared for, and where he had sufficient trees left to bud for delivery in 1909, whether the budding in April, 1908, was to prevent plaintiff from obtaining such trees or not, it showed no fraud against plaintiff.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; B. F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by George M. Pearson against S. J. Parsons, administrator of the estate of E. E. Hendrick, deceased. Judgment for plaintiff, and he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 159 Pac. 1171.

Miguel Estudillo and George A. French, both of Riverside, for appellant. Purington & Adair, of Riverside, and Sidney J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This cause was heretofore before this court on an appeal by the defendant from a former judgment. Pearson v. McKinney, 160 Cal. 649, 117 Pac. 919. Upon that appeal the judgment in favor of the plaintiff was reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial. Afterwards S. J. Parsons was substituted as administrator of the deceased, Hendrick, and the complaint was amended. Thereupon another trial was had resulting in a judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $900. From this judgment, the plaintiff appeals.

[1] The first point urged by the appellant is that the court below erred in sustaining a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that the complaint included several causes of action which were not separately stated. The plaintiff then amended the complaint by stating in separate counts the respective demands claimed to constitute separate causes of action. Having thus removed the objection, and having thus gone to trial upon the complaint as amended, the plaintiff must be deemed to have waived the objection that the demurrer was improperly sustained. Gale v. Tuolumne W. Co., 14 Cal. 28; Ganceart v. Henry, 98 Cal. 283, 33 Pac. 92.

[2] The only other point urged in support of the appeal is that the court erred in refusing to allow the plaintiff to introduce evidence in support of damages claimed to have been suffered by reason of the fraud and negligence of the decedent, Hendrick, in carrying out his part of the contract of sale upon which the action was based. In order to make this point clear it is necessary to state the facts.

The original complaint attempted to state a cause of action against the decedent, Hendrick, who was then living, to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the refusal of Hendrick to deliver to the plaintiff 25,000 budded orange trees sold by him to the plaintiff. The contract of sale was made November 12, 1906, and was in writing. As construed upon the former appeal, it provided that Hendrick was to set out 150,000 seed bed orange plants sold to him by Pearson, to be delivered to Hendrick, before May 15, 1907, cultivate them, bud them when of proper size to varieties of oranges selected by Pearson, and sell 25,000 of them to Pearson during the years 1909, 1910, and 1911, at stated prices. Pearson was to have the option of taking them when one year old from the bud at 30 cents each, or two years old from the bud at 35 cents each. They were to be of a specified size in order to come within the contract. The decision on the former appeal was that in an action by the vendee for breach of the contract of the vendor to sell trees to be budded by the vendor and to be grown under his care for one year or more thereafter, and to a specified size before delivery, it was necessary for the plaintiff to allege and prove that at the time when delivery was demanded the vendor had trees on hand of the kind required by the contract. 160 Cal. 657, 117 Pac. 919. The complaint contained no allegation that Hendrick had the trees on hand of the proper kinds, size, or age at the time Pearson demanded delivery thereof. It was framed upon the theory that the contract of sale was general, and must be performed by Hendrick even if he did not have trees of the size and kind required, and that in such a case he would be obliged to go into the market and get them from any source to fill his contract. For this reason it was held to be defective. It alleged demands made in April, May, and June, 1909, for delivery of trees under the contract, and the failure of Hendrick to deliver them. The action was begun on July 1, 1909, immediately after the alleged breach occurred. Before the first trial Hendrick died and the administrator of his estate was substituted as defendant. It then became necessary for the plaintiff to present to the administrator a claim for the demand sued on before proceeding with the action. The plaintiff presented such claim, stating therein that the estate was indebted to him in the amount claimed in the complaint, as damages for breach of the agreement sued on, as set forth in the complaint in the action, a copy of which was attached to and made a part of the claim. The complaint stated no breach of the contract except the failure to deliver the 25,000 trees in May, June, and July, 1909, as called for. It did not claim damages because of any fraud or negligence of Hendrick resulting in his failing to have on hand the trees necessary to fill the contract at the time of Pearson's demands. 160 Cal. 659, 117 Pac. 919. After the reversal the plaintiff filed in the court below the amended complaint, in which he set forth that because of Hendrick's fraud and negligence, particularly set forth, Hendrick did not have on hand trees of the proper kinds, size, or age to fill the orders of Pearson in April, May, and June, 1909. On the second trial the court below was of the opinion that damages for this cause was not included in the claim presented to the administrator, and, under the familiar rule, it held that evidence could not be received in support of a demand not included in the claim so presented. Lichtenberg v. McGlynn, 105 Cal. 47, 38 Pac. 541; McGrath v. Carroll, 110 Cal. 84, 42 Pac. 466; Etchas v. Orena, 127 Cal. 593, 60 Pac. 45; Morehouse v. Morehouse, 140 Cal. 94, 73 Pac. 738. There is no distinction in this respect between claims in support of pending actions, under section 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and claims filed before the action is begun, under section 1500 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

We think the court was correct in its conclusion that the claim presented to the administrator did not include a demand for damages caused by the negligence of the vendor whereby he did not have the trees ready for delivery at the times of the demands. The original complaint proceeded upon the theory that the defendant had the trees ready for delivery, but failed to deliver them. It alleged nothing in regard to a breach of the implied contract to properly care for and cultivate the trees. The claim for damages on account of the breach of that part of the contract was therefore not included in the claim presented to the administrator, and evidence thereof was correctly excluded.

[3] The allegations of fraud are insufficient, and therefore it is immaterial whether it was included in the claim presented or not. Pearson gave notice of his selection of the varieties for budding on March 31, 1908. On the former appeal we held that this notice did not give him a right to demand trees budded during April, 1908. The fraud alleged is that Hendrick, after receiving that notice, budded 24,500 of the trees in April, 1908, that being all that were then large enough to bud; that this was done to prevent Pearson from obtaining trees under the contract. It is not alleged that Pearson had at that time given notice to Hendrick that he would demand trees for delivery in April, May, and June, 1909. Hendrick received 150,000 plants from Pearson, out of which Pearson was to buy, at some time during the years 1909, 1910, and 1911, 25,000 budded trees with an option, not then exercised, for 25,000 more. The contract did not specify the time of budding the trees. Under its provisions Hendrick was free to bud in April, 1908, all of the trees that were then large enough, provided enough were left to be budded afterwards to supply Pearson at some time after April 30, 1909, on which date, as held on the former appeal, he first became entitled to buy trees in pursuance of his selection of varieties on March 31, 1908. It is not disputed that there were plenty of trees left in addition to those budded in April, 1908, to supply all that were to be sold to Pearson during the years specified in the contract. Until he received notice that Pearson would demand deliveries of trees in April, May, and June, 1909, Hendrick was under no obligation to delay the budding of the trees ready therefor in April, 1908, so that they might be budded in May to fill possible orders from Pearson. Hence the budding of 24,500 trees in April, 1908, violated no right of Pearson, and, whether done to prevent Pearson from obtaining the trees budded during that month or not, it did not constitute any fraud against Pearson and evidence thereof was properly rejected.

For the purposes of the case, we have assumed that evidence was offered which would have supported the allegations of fraud and negligence. In view of the general neglect of the statutory requirements that the parties shall print in their briefs such portions of the record as they desire to call to the attention of the court (Code Civ. Proc. § 953a), we take occasion to say that, if it had been necessary to reverse the case for error in the ruling complained of, it is extremely doubtful if we would have been able to consider the point over the objection of respondent that the matter was not properly presented to the court for decision. There is no other point of sufficient importance to merit notice.

The judgment is affirmed.

ARMSTRONG v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (S. F. 8038.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 15, 1916.)

1. INJUNCTION — 231 — PUNISHMENT FOR VIOLATION — CERTIORARI.

That an order restraining picketing by defendants is too broad, in that it enjoins all picketing, is not ground for sustaining certiorari to review an order, adjudging a defendant in contempt for violating the restraining order; there being no question as to jurisdiction to enter the restraining order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 517; Dec. Dig. 231; Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 680.]

2. INJUNCTION — 228 — PARTIES — DEFENDANTS — ASSOCIATION.

Code Civ. Proc. § 388, authorizing two or more persons associated and transacting business under a common name to be sued by such common name, authorizes an action to restrain the members, officers, agents, representatives, and employés of voluntary associations, in their common or associate name, from maintaining pickets in front of plaintiff's place of business, so as to render all members having knowledge of the terms of an injunction granted, as well as the officers, etc., liable for contempt in any willful violation thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 484-495; Dec. Dig. 228.]

3. INJUNCTION — 230(2) — VIOLATION — PROCEEDINGS TO PUNISH.

Where a restraining order enjoins picketing upon plaintiff furnishing a bond, an allegation in a contempt proceeding for violation of the order that the restraining order was made whereby the defendants were enjoined, etc., was sufficient to support a finding that the court made an effective restraining order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 507, 508; Dec. Dig. 230(2).]

In Bank. Petition by A. C. Armstrong for certiorari to the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the City and County of San Francisco and John Hunt, Judge of said Court. Denied.

Henry B. Lister and Devoto, Richardson & Devoto, all of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of certiorari to review an order of the superior court of San Francisco adjudging one A. C. Armstrong guilty of contempt of court, and imposing a penalty therefor.

The contempt alleged was disobedience, with knowledge of the terms thereof, of a restraining order of said court made in an action pending therein, whereby the defendants, being certain voluntary associations, alleged to be associations composed of more than two persons associated in business and transacting such business under a common name, including Cooks' Union No. 44, and their members, officers, agents, representatives, and employés, and various fictitious defendants, were enjoined and restrained from placing or stationing or maintaining pickets in front of the plaintiff's place of business. Violation of this order on the part of petitioner and others, alleged to be members of said Cooks' Union No. 44, and to have violated the same with knowledge of its terms, were alleged in the affidavit upon which the contempt proceeding was based, and the superior court found, after hearing the parties on an order to show cause, that Armstrong was guilty of such violation.

[1] In view of the fact that certiorari will lie only to review an excess of jurisdiction and that errors in the exercise of jurisdiction may not be considered in such a proceeding, we see no good ground for the granting of the application. Something is said, for instance, in support of the claim that the restraining order is too broad, in that it enjoined all "picketing," the theory being that there are certain kinds of "picketing," as that term is used in connection with labor disputes, that should not have been enjoined. However this may be, we are satisfied that it cannot be held that a court of equity is without jurisdiction to enjoin any and all picketing, as it has done in this case, and that if there be any error in this regard, a matter as to which we are not to be understood as intimating any opinion, it is simply error in the exercise of jurisdiction which can be reviewed by a higher court only upon direct appeal from the order.

[2] We deem it proper to say, in reply to certain claims made by counsel for petitioner in their brief filed with the application, as follows:

First. We are all of the opinion that the provisions of section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorize the maintenance of an action of the character of the one in which the restraining order was made, against the members of such associations as are described in the complaint in that action, in their common or associate name, and that all members of any such association having knowledge of the terms of any injunction issued therein, as well as all their officers, agents, representatives, and employés having such knowledge, are bound thereby, and guilty of contempt in any willful violation thereof.

[3] Second. The restraining order provided "that upon plaintiff furnishing a bond in the sum of $500, the said defendants," etc., be enjoined and restrained. The order, of course, was ineffectual for any purpose unless and until such bond was given. It is claimed that there was no showing that any bond was ever given. Even if we assume that in the contempt proceeding the superior court could not take judicial notice of the records and files in the action in which the restraining order was made, we are of the opinion that the affidavit constituting the foundation for the contempt proceeding, while not as specific and definite as it might well have been, sufficiently alleged an effective and valid restraining order for all the purposes of the proceeding. The effectiveness of the order as one actually enjoining and restraining is sufficiently alleged to support the finding that "the court made an order * * * restraining," etc.

No other point made by counsel requires notice on this application for a writ of certiorari.

The application is denied.

LIABILITY OF CONTRACTOR.

A contractor employed by a city to regutter a street, removing the rock of which the old gutter was constructed, to be replaced by other material, is not liable for injuries to the basement of an adjacent owner, caused by rainwater seeping through the natural soil and washing away the inadequate walls of the basement, where the work of the contractor was done in a workmanlike manner, and the contractor was in no wise negligent with regard to the performance of its contract with the city.

Shaw, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by S. W. Norton against the Ransome-Crummey Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Raleigh E. Rhodes, of Madera, and R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, for appellant. Harris & Hayhurst and J. P. Bernhard, all of Fresno, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This appeal was heard originally by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, and the following opinion, prepared by Mr. Presiding Justice Lennon, was announced by that court:

"The plaintiff is the lessee, and is also the assignee of another lessee, of certain premises consisting of storerooms and basements on Mariposa street in the city of Fresno. At some time prior to the injuries complained of the plaintiff and his assignor had each applied to the city council of Fresno for permission to extend their respective basements out under the sidewalk of Mariposa street to a distance at or near the gutter line; and, being granted such permission, made the extension, building brick walls along the line thereof and adjacent to the gutter line of the street. The city of Fresno is the owner of the fee of said Mariposa street. The street being in need of repair, a contract was let to the defendant, by the terms of which it was required to remove the basalt blocks which had hitherto formed the base of said gutter, in order to replace them with other material. While these blocks were so removed opposite the premises of the plaintiff and his assignor a rain-storm came on, which flooded the gutter, the water flowing down through the unprotected portion of the gutter to and through the brick walls along the extended line of these two basements, which walls proving an ineffectual barrier to those waters, they flooded the basements and caused the damage to the goods of plaintiff and his assignor, for which recovery is sought in this action. From a judgment awarding such damages and from an order denying a new trial the defendant prosecutes this appeal.

"The plaintiff's complaint alleges that the defendant negligently and carelessly removed the stone gutter and protecting curb in front of said premises, and 'negligently and carelessly left said basement of said premises open and unprotected,' by reason whereof the detriment occurred. The court in its findings has found this averment to be true; but it was stipulated at the trial, and is conceded upon this appeal, that the defendant was in all respects performing in a workmanlike manner the terms of its contract with the city, and was in no wise negligent in that regard, so that the only negligence upon which the plaintiff can rely to support the court's finding must consist in the fact that the defendant, by its act in removing the basalt blocks and curb of the gutter, according to the requirements of its contract, and in an otherwise proper manner, put said gutter in such a condition that it would not and did not retain the floodwaters of the storm, but permitted the same to reach and penetrate the plaintiff's ineffectual wall into the basements. The question which arises out of this state of facts, and which is practically the only question in this case, is as to what duty the city, or the defendant, its contractor, owed this plaintiff and his assignor in respect of the protection of their property from consequential damages growing out of the repair of the street when, as is conceded, such repair is being made in accordance with contract and in a proper and workmanlike manner.

"The Supreme Court of this state, in the early case of Shaw v. Crocker, 42 Cal. 435, laid down the rule that, cities having the right to improve and grade their streets, neither they nor their contractors are responsible for consequential damages to adjacent property when such work is performed with proper care and skill. The same doctrine was later adhered to in the case of Reardon v. San Francisco, 66 Cal. 492 [6 Pac. 317, 56 Am. Rep. 109], wherein the court declared that it was the universally accepted rule that in the making of street improvements the city is the agent of the state, and is performing a public duty imposed upon it by law, and that neither it nor its duly authorized agents are answerable for consequential damages as a result of such work when done with proper care and skill. And the court in that case went further in holding that the owners of property adjacent to streets in the course of such improvement or repair were bound to take steps to protect their own property from the liability of such injury. It is true that in the case last cited the court construed and applied the rule adopted by the then recent change in the state Constitution relating to compensation for property taken or damaged for public use; but that question does not arise in the present case. The general rule, in harmony with the foregoing cases, is thus laid down by Dillon in the latest edition of his work on Municipal Corporations: 'In view of the nature of streets, and of the control over them which of right belongs to the state, and of the nature of ownership of lots bounded thereon, which implies subjection, if not consent, to the exercise and determination of the public will respecting what grades or changes in the grade thereof shall, from time to time, be found necessary, and what other improvements thereon or therein (within the legitimate purposes of a street) shall be found expedient, it results, we think, that adjoining property owners are not entitled, of legal right, without statutory aid, to compensation for damages which result as an incident or consequence of the exercise of this power by the state, or the municipality by delegation from the state. Accordingly the courts by numerous decisions in most states have settled the doctrine that municipal corporations, acting under authority conferred by the Legislature to make and repair, or to grade, level, and improve, streets, if they exercise reasonable care and skill in the performance of the work resolved upon, are not answerable to the adjoining owner whose lands are not actually taken for consequential damages to his premises, unless there is a provision in the charter of the corporation or some statute creating the liability." 2 Dillon, Municipal Corporations, sec. 782-3, and cases cited.

"In view of the foregoing statement of the general trend of authority touching the question in issue here, we are constrained to hold that the defendant was guilty of no breach of duty in the performance of the work of making the street repairs in question under its contract with the city of Fresno, of which the plaintiff can complain, but that on the other hand, it was the duty of the plaintiff and his assignor to protect their respective premises excavated below the street level, and which they had extended beyond the street line into proximity with this gutter as mere licensees of the city, from the possibility of consequential damages occurring through the course of proper street repairs. The cases cited by the respondent, announcing a rule apparently at variance with the foregoing principles, will be found, upon analysis, to involve questions of negligence in the performance of the work which were eliminated from the case at bar."

Subsequently a hearing in this court was ordered. Upon further consideration of the case we are constrained to agree with the conclusions reached by the District Court of Appeal, and to adopt the opinion of that court.

It was alleged in the complaint, and found by the court to be true, that:

"Defendant negligently and carelessly removed the stone gutter and protecting curb on the street in front of said premises and negligently and carelessly left said basement of said premises open and unprotected, so that by reason of said negligence and carelessness on the part of defendant, a large quantity of rainwater ran into said basement."

Undoubtedly if the work done by defendant had made an opening into the basement through which water could have run, the consequent damage from rain occurring during the progress of the work would be chargeable to the contractor. The proof showed, however, that the removal of the stones forming the gutter (the curb not being disturbed) merely exposed the sandy soil and permitted the water to find its way to that which Mr. Justice Lennon aptly calls "the plaintiff's ineffectual wall." True, the action of the water eventually made a hole through which a stream poured into the basement, but that was after the "ineffectual wall" had collapsed. The question, then, is this: Was the contractor, when it had, in the proper execution of its contract, removed the stones forming the bed of the gutter, obligated to protect plaintiff and his assignor from the consequences of the seepage of water through the sandy soil and through an underground wall which was not water tight? We feel bound to answer this question in the negative. Suppose, for example, that there had been no wall at all, and that through the negligence of the superintendent of streets the removal of the blocks forming the gutter had been permitted, resulting in the seepage of water into the cellar. In such a case could the owner of the property charge the city with liability for failing to protect the cellar? We think not. The officers of the city might well say to the owner:

"You were given a license to excavate under the sidewalk, but the city did not promise to keep your cellar dry by constantly maintaining a waterproof street in front of your premises."

Obviously such contention must be correct. If the rule were otherwise, the city would be estopped from repairing, regrading, or removing the pavement from the street for any purpose except in dry weather. If, then, the city would not be required to insure the property owner against percolation of water into his unvalled basement, may a court hold the city's contractor for the penetration of the previous and inadequate wall by the water which went through the sandy soil after the removal of the stones which formed the gutter? We think not. If the wall had been properly constructed, it would have turned any water which might have soaked through the sandy soil. Surely it was not the contractor's duty to know that the basement was inadequately walled. There was no proof of great hydraulic force exerted against the wall, nor of the maintenance of a large body of water exercising hydrostatic pressure thereon. On the contrary, the evidence showed a very slight rainfall during the time that the natural soil of the street was uncovered. That the wall was totally inadequate to keep out water is very evident from the proof adduced at the trial. Surely it was no part of the duty of defendant to go upon the property of plaintiff and repair the latter's masonry. Alta Planing Mill Co. v. Garland, 167 Cal. 179, 138 Pac. 738. Any default upon the contractor's part must have been due to its negligence in prosecuting or in failing to safeguard the work required of it under the contract. That the work of removing the blocks from the gutter was done in the usual manner is admitted; that the contractor was not bound immediately to replace the material removed with other substance impervious to water we are certain.

While some of the cases cited by respondent seem to be at variance with our conclusions, the facts in each of them differ from those presented by the record before us in this case.

For example, in Schumacher v. The City of York, 166 N. Y. 103, 59 N. E. 773, it was held that the lower court erred in not permitting the evidence to go to the jury. The facts were that a trench had been dug two feet from the curb; that this excavation was several rods long, four or five feet wide, and more than eight feet deep; that the earth taken from the trench was so placed as to obstruct the gutter and a culvert; and that the trench "thus became a pocket for all the surface drainage of a large area." During a heavy rain, water accumulated in the trench, "washed out the sand between it and the basement wall, and then percolated through the wall into the basement." Although the work was done under the supervision of the city's inspector it made no attempt "to open the gutter, uncover the culvert, protect the trench, or provide for water." Hence the court of appeals held, very properly, that there was sufficient evidence to go to the jury. In the case at bar there was no such evidence of a large body of water negligently maintained for a long period of time in contact with the wall surrounding the basement. The case is not therefore controlling, nor even persuasive against our conclusions in the case now before us.

Schroeder v. City of Baraboo, 93 Wis. 95, 67 N. W. 27, also presents a set of facts totally dissimilar to those set forth in this record. In that case plaintiff alleged damage to his property by reason of the incapacity of the defendant's new drainage system and by the bursting of the drain which defendant had caused to be obstructed. There was evidence tending to support these allegations, and the Supreme Court held that the lower court erred in granting a motion for nonsuit.

In Wallace v. City of Muscatine, 4 Greene (Iowa) 373, 61 Am. Dec. 131, also cited by respondent, the complaint contained allegations to the effect that plaintiffs were damaged by the improper and unskillful construction of certain culverts, drains, and gutters by which water was made to flow upon their land, and that the city, in the construction of these works, carelessly and negligently left them in an unfinished state, whereby a large quantity of water was made to flow upon and injure the property in question. It was held that a demurrer to this pleading had been erroneously sustained. This authority is not in any way opposed to the views expressed above.

From the foregoing it follows that the judgment and order must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: LORIGAN, J; HENSHAW, J.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment. The evidence does not, in my opinion, fairly furnish sufficient support for a conclusion that the defendant was guilty of any negligence with relation to the plaintiff or his assignor. If in doing the work it had contracted with the city to do it used reasonable care to avoid injury to the property of others, concededly it cannot be held to have been negligent. To my mind there is nothing in the record fairly warranting a conclusion that it knew, or had any reason to believe, that the basement walls were in such a condition that a possible rainfall, while its work was in progress, might cause water to penetrate the same and thus gain access to the basements, or that there was anything reasonably putting it to inquiry regarding this matter. Apparently the owners themselves were fully aware of the work being done. I am entirely unable to see any reasonable support for a conclusion that defendant failed to use reasonable care to avoid injury to the property of those fronting on the line of the work.

SHAW, J. I dissent. I am of the opinion that if matters of common knowledge were considered in connection with the facts proven, and all reasonable inferences therefrom indulged in favor of the action of the court below, there is enough evidence to support the finding that the defendant did not exercise reasonable care to protect the basement of plaintiff from injury in case of the rain then threatening. This, in my view, is the only question in the case. Being a question of fact, and as the evidence may be different upon a new trial, I should deem it useless to express my dissent if there were no other reason therefor.

I do so solely to emphasize the fact that the views of the majority, except on the point above stated, do not constitute a decision of the court, only three Justices concurring on the other points discussed. The intimation and statements that it was the duty of the plaintiff to construct a retaining wall impervious to water, and that one lawfully replacing the pavement of a public street, under authority from the city, is not liable for damages from his failure to use ordinary care to protect the property of abutting owners from overflow or accumulations of rainwater caused by his temporary interference with the surface of the street, do not constitute the law of this case. In my opinion they are contrary to our own decisions and against the principles of justice. Stanford v. San Francisco, 111 Cal. 202, 43 Pac. 605; Durgin v. Neal, 82 Cal. 595, 23 Pac. 133; Parker v. Larsen, 86 Cal. 236, 24 Pac. 989, 21 Am. St. Rep. 30; 3 Farnham on Waters, p. 2625, § 895; Paolini v. Fresno Canal Co., 9 Cal. SCHOLLE v. FINNELL et al. (S. F. 6899.)

1. TRIAL ~~393~~(1)—TRIAL BY COURT—DECISION—OPINION.

On trial without a jury, where findings are not waived, no expression of the judge, whether casual or in the form of an opinion, can restrict his power to declare his final conclusion by filing a decision, consisting of findings of fact and conclusions of law, as provided by Code Civ. Proc.

§§ 632, 633, though the record is prepared under the new and alternative method.

2. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ⚡276—REMEDIES OF CREDITORS — BURDEN OF PROOF — TRANSFER.

In an action under Civ. Code, §§ 3439, 3440, to set aside a transfer as fraudulent, it is essential, to make out the case alleged, for plaintiff to establish that there has been a transfer of the property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 808; Dec. Dig. ⚡276.]

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ⚡24(1) — TRANSACTIONS INVALID—"TRANSFER."

Civ. Code, § 1039, defining a transfer as an act of the parties or of the law by which title to property is conveyed from one living person to another, is applicable to the Code sections declaring certain transfers void against creditors, so that in such case the word "transfer" designates only those transactions which, as between the parties, pass, or purport to pass, the title or right of possession to property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 32, 34-36; Dec. Dig. ⚡24(1).]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Transfer.]

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ⚡32—TRANSACTIONS INVALID—FORM OF TRANSFER.

That live stock of a debtor was mingled with live stock belonging to defendants, and they sold it, does not give creditors a right of action to set aside as fraudulent a transfer of the live stock to defendants, but shows a conversion of the live stock to their own use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 49, 50; Dec. Dig. ⚡32.]

5. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ⚡276—REMEDIES OF CREDITORS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action to set aside transfers of personal property as fraudulent, the fact that the court found against the contention of defendants that the property had been transferred to a third person, and by him to defendants, did not relieve plaintiff of the necessity of proving the transfer he alleged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. § 808; Dec. Dig. ⚡276.]

6. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES ⚡74(1) — TRANSACTIONS INVALID — FORM OF TRANSFER.

The purchase of corporate stock by a debtor, which he caused to be transferred to defendant without consideration, if accompanied by a fraudulent intent as to debtors, would constitute a transfer to defendant assailable by the creditors.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡1011(1)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT—FINDINGS.

Where there was a substantial conflict of evidence as to whether a transfer alleged to have been fraudulent as to creditors was made, the determination of the trial court that it had been sold to defendant by a third person, and that the debtor had no interest in it, and had not transferred it to defendant is conclusive on appeal.

8. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡843(2)—REVIEW—SCOPE AND EXTENT.

In an action to set aside a transfer of personalty as in fraud of creditors, where the court found that the transfer alleged had not been made, it is immaterial that a fraudulent intent of the debtor may have been shown.

9. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡1056(4)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to set aside transfers of personalty as in fraud of creditors, where the court found that the transfers were not made, the exclusion of evidence of declarations by the debtor, tending to show his ownership of the property afterwards claimed by one or more of the defendants, but having no tendency to show that transfers had been made, is immaterial.

10. PLEADING ⚡248(16)—AMENDMENT—COMPLAINT—NEW CAUSE OF ACTION.

In an action to set aside transfers of personal property, a proposed amendment, alleging facts regarding transfers of real estate, construed as laying foundation for an attack on the conveyance of real estate, was properly denied as introducing a new and distinct cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 686; Dec. Dig. ⚡248(16).]

11. PLEADING ⚡11—FORM OF ALLEGATIONS—EVIDENTIARY MATTER.

In an action to set aside transfers of personalty, amendment alleging matters connected with transfers of realty, construed merely as tending to establish a general scheme of conspiracy to defraud, is properly excluded as being merely evidentiary.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Albert W. Scholle against John Finnell, Jr., and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck and Edward Lynch, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Charles W. Slack and Bush Finnell, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. John Finnell was, in his lifetime, largely indebted to the plaintiff. He died in October, 1905, leaving an estate which was appraised at a value insignificant in comparison with his obligations. Plaintiff's claim for the amount due him was presented, allowed by the administrator of Finnell's estate, and approved by the court. The plaintiff sought to realize on his claim by instituting actions to set aside, as in fraud of creditors, transfers of property alleged to have been made by John Finnell during his lifetime. One such action was instituted in the superior court of Tehama county. In that litigation the plaintiff assailed six conveyances of real estate, all made to one or more of John Finnell's four sons. The superior court of Tehama county found and adjudged that three of the six conveyances were fraudulent and void as to plaintiff, because made without consideration and while the grantor was insolvent. The defendants appealed from this portion of the decree, and such appeal resulted in an affirmation. Scholle v. Finnell, 166 Cal. 546, 137 Pac. 241. With respect to the other three conveyances involved in the Tehama action, the court found against the allegations of fraud, and gave judgment in favor of Simpson Finnell, the grantee named in said three deeds. From this part of the judgment the plaintiff appealed, and an affirmation followed. Scholle v. Finnell, 167 Cal. 90, 138 Pac. 746.

The present action was brought to set aside as fraudulent two alleged transfers of personal property from John Finnell to his son Simpson Finnell. The property involved consisted of two items: (1) A quantity of live stock and farming implements claimed to have been transferred in September, 1900; and (2) 2,000 shares of the capital stock of the Finnell Land Company, a corporation, and a contingent claim to a further number of shares of said company. A general view of the relations between the plaintiff herein and the estate of John Finnell, and of the complications in which the affairs of the Finnell family had become involved, may be had from a reading of the two decisions in Scholle v. Finnell, above referred to, and of the opinions of this court in Finnell v. Goodman & Co. Bank, 156 Cal. 18, 103 Pac. 483, and Finnell v. Finnell, 156 Cal. 589, 105 Pac. 740, 134 Am. St. Rep. 143.

For present purposes, it will suffice to say that the plaintiff alleged that the live stock and farming implements in question were transferred by John Finnell to Simpson Finnell in September, 1900; that such transfer was not accompanied by a delivery or change of possession, and was made by John Finnell while he was insolvent, with the intent to hinder, delay, and defraud his creditors. The averment with respect to the shares of stock of the Finnell Land Company was that on September 8, 1903, John Finnell purchased these shares from George E. Goodman for the sum of $20,000, and caused the same to be transferred to Simpson Finnell, there being no consideration to John Finnell for said transfers, and the same being made to Simpson fraudulently for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of John Finnell. All of these allegations were denied by the answers.

The court found that John Finnell was insolvent from July, 1893, until the time of his death, and that his estate was insolvent; that he did not, in the year 1900, transfer to Simpson Finnell any live stock, farming implements, or machinery. It was further found that the live stock mentioned in the complaint was, at the time of the alleged transfer thereof, mingled with other live stock belonging to the sons of John Finnell, defendants herein; that the said live stock was controlled and retained by John Finnell up to the time of his death, until sold and disposed of in connection with the control by the four sons of the live stock belonging to them. It is further found that said live stock was all sold prior to the commencement of this action, and that so much of it as was unsold at the time of John Finnell's death belonged to the said John Finnell, and that "the claim of the plaintiff thereto and for the proceeds thereof is barred by the laches of the plaintiff." The farming implements and machinery were found to be of no value at the time of the alleged transfer; and, as this finding is not attacked, we need not concern ourselves with these items of property.

With respect to the shares of stock of the Finnell Land Company, the court found that John Finnell did not purchase such shares from George E. Goodman, nor cause said shares to be transferred to Simpson, but that on or about September 8, 1903, George E. Goodman sold, assigned, and transferred to Simpson Finnell, for the sum of $20,000 the said 2,000 shares of stock, together with his claim to the additional shares, and that said transfers were not made to Simpson Finnell nor the shares placed in his name fraudulently and for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding the creditors of John Finnell.

On these findings the court gave judgment that the plaintiff take nothing by his action, and that the defendants recover their costs. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals, bringing up a record of the proceedings under sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The principal contentions of the appellant have to do with the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. Some six weeks after the submission of the case, the learned judge of the court below delivered an opinion in which he summarized the important facts, as he saw them. The findings were signed and filed between two and three months later. The findings do not, in all respects, accord with the views which had found expression in the opinion. The appellant contends that the formal findings are, so far as there is any conflict, to be subordinated to or controlled by the opinion theretofore rendered. This position is not tenable. "The findings of fact must be taken as embodying the conclusions of the trial court on all questions of fact submitted to it for decision." Goldner v. Spencer, 163 Cal. 320, 125 Pac. 347. Where the trial is without a jury, and findings are not waived, the issues of fact remain undecided until findings are filed. No antecedent expression of the judge, whether casual or cast in the form of an opinion, can in any way restrict his absolute power to declare his final conclusion in the only manner authorized by law, to wit, by filing the "decision" (findings of fact and conclusions of law) provided for by sections 632 and 633 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This rule, which has long been established in our practice, is not altered by the circumstance that the record has been prepared under the "new and alternative" method.

[2] As hereinbefore stated, the complaint charged that the live stock and farming implements had been transferred by John Finnell to Simpson Finnell in September, 1900. The finding was that John Finnell did not transfer such property to Simpson. The respondents contend that this finding, if supported by the evidence, as they contend it is, is determinative of the case so far as these items of property are concerned. The action was one to set aside a transfer as fraudulent under sections 3439 and 3440 of the Civil Code. To make out the case alleged it was essential for plaintiff to establish that there had been a transfer of the property. Doerfler v. Schmidt, 64 Cal. 265, 30 Pac. 816; Lyden v. Spohn-Patrick Co., 155 Cal. 177, 184, 100 Pac. 236.

[3] The term "transfer" is defined in section 1039 of the Civil Code as "an act of the parties or of the law by which the title to property is conveyed from one living person to another." The appellant contends that this definition has no application to the Code sections declaring that certain transfers are void against creditors. He seeks to include in the word transfer every act, whether committed by the debtor or by others, which may tend to hamper the creditor in subjecting the property to the payment of his claim. We are cited to no authority which, in our view, sustains this interpretation. The word "transfer" is, no doubt, a broad one, but it designates only those transactions which, as between the parties, pass, or purport to pass, the title or right of possession to the property. The transfer need not, to be sure, be by a writing, but it must be such an act as vests the real or apparent ownership of some interest in the transferee.

[4] If the facts were as found by the court, the situation was simply this: John Finnell was the owner of the live stock and machinery in controversy. He made no transfer of this property to Simpson Finnell, but remained the owner and in possession of it until his death. The live stock was mingled with other live stock belonging to the defendants, and they, prior to the commencement of this action, had sold all of it. The legal consequence of these facts is, not that there was a transfer of the live stock to Simpson Finnell or his codefendants, but that such live stock, belonging to and in the possession of John Finnell, was unlawfully taken by the defendants and converted to their own use. Such conversion may have given a right of action for damages to the estate of John Finnell, but it did not give to the creditors of John Finnell a right to sue in their own names to recover such property or its proceeds on the ground that it had been fraudulently transferred. Even if it were granted that a creditor has the right to pursue one who has unlawfully taken property belonging to the estate of his debtor, the complaint in this case was not framed upon any such theory, and did not allege any such cause of action.

[5] There can be no doubt that the evidence fully supports the finding of the court that there was no transfer of the live stock and machinery from John to Simpson Finnell. Simpson contended that the live stock had been transferred by John Finnell to George E. Goodman, and subsequently transferred by Goodman to Simpson Finnell. The court did not accept this view, the finding being "that the said property was not sold or transferred by Goodman to Simpson Finnell." But the fact that the particular mode of transfer under which Simpson claimed title was found not to have taken place did not relieve the plaintiff of the necessity of proving the fraudulent transfer (from John Finnell to Simpson Finnell) upon which he relied, and the record is devoid of any evidence tending to show such transfer. In fact, the appellant's contention, as has already been suggested, really is that Simpson Finnell and his codefendants were in possession of the live stock which had belonged to John Finnell, the debtor, and that proof of this fact alone established a transfer which a creditor could assail as fraudulent. For the reasons above stated, we do not agree with this contention. The finding against the transfer alleged is sufficient to support the judgment with reference to the live stock and machinery, and renders it unnecessary to consider whether the finding of laches is supported by the evidence.

[6, 7] Similar considerations force the conclusion that the plaintiff cannot succeed in his attack upon the findings relative to the stock of the Finnell Land Company. The allegation of the complaint was that John Finnell purchased this stock from George E. Goodman, and caused the same to be transferred to Simpson Finnell without consideration. Such transaction, if accompanied by the fraudulent intent asserted, would, in effect, have constituted a transfer from John to Simpson, assailable by the creditors of John Finnell. But the court found that no such transfer had taken place. On the contrary, it found that in September, 1903, Goodman sold and transferred the stock to Simpson Finnell for $20,000, and that the estate of John Finnell had no interest in the stock. The record contains direct testimony to support these findings. The appellant makes an elaborate and earnest argument designed to show that this testimony should have been rejected by the trial court, and that there were strong circumstances pointing to a contrary conclusion. We shall not take the time or space required for a complete review of all of the items of evidence introduced in this connection. Suffice it to say that, even if we concede the probative force of the various matters insisted upon by the appellant, it still remains that there was at the least a substantial conflict of evidence upon the point, and that the finding of the trial court, evidencing its view of the preponderance of the evidence, is beyond our power of review. The determination that the stock, belonging to Goodman, had been sold by him to Simpson Finnell, that John Finnell had no interest in it, and that he had not transferred it to Simpson is conclusive here.

[8] Since the plaintiff failed to prove a transfer from John to Simpson Finnell of any of the property described in the complaint, it is entirely unnecessary to follow counsel in the inquiry whether the circumstances showed a fraudulent intent on the part of the debtor. There may have been an intent to defraud, but such intent cannot justify the setting aside of a transfer unless there has been a transfer. In other words, the findings which are sustained by the evidence required the giving of the judgment which was given, irrespective of the soundness of the findings on other issues.

[9] Certain rulings by the court below are assigned as error. The court excluded evidence of declarations by John Finnell tending, as is claimed, to show his ownership of the property, afterwards claimed by one or more of the defendants herein. Without passing on the question of the admissibility of this evidence, it will be sufficient to say that the declarations could have had no tendency to show that transfers had been made as alleged in the complaint. In the face of the findings that there had been no such transfers, these rulings become immaterial.

[10, 11] During the trial the plaintiff asked leave to amend his complaint by adding thereto various allegations connected with the transfers of real estate which had theretofore been under judicial scrutiny in the action instituted in Tehama county. The court declined to grant leave to file the amended pleading. There was no error in this ruling. If the amended complaint was intended to lay the foundation for an attack upon the conveyances of real estate, the plaintiff was seeking to introduce an entirely new and distinct cause of action, and this was a sufficient ground for denying the application. Peiser v. Griffin, 125 Cal. 9, 57 Pac. 690. If, on the other hand, as the appellant claims, he sought to make the allegations regarding the transfers of real estate for the purpose merely of establishing the existence of a general scheme or conspiracy to defraud, which scheme embraced the transfers of the personal property here attacked, it may be answered that the new matter was merely evidentiary, and thus incidental to the cause of action set up in the original complaint. It is, of course, well settled that the evidence tending to support a cause of action need not be pleaded.

We find no other points requiring notice.
The judgment is affirmed.

KIMBOL v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION. (L. A. 4193.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 20, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT §371 — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — "ARISING OUT OF EMPLOYMENT."

Within Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 283) § 12, an injury arises out of the employment if there is a causal connection between the working conditions and the injury, but not in the absence of such connection, nor if the injury is common to persons regardless of the work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. §371.]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT §373 — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — "ARISING OUT OF EMPLOYMENT."

A restaurant dishwasher, upon whom, while at work, the ceiling fell, due to overload of stored goods on the upper floor, over which the master had no control, received an injury "arising out of the employment."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. §373.]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT §371 — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — "ARISING OUT OF EMPLOYMENT."

If the employment necessarily accentuates and increases the danger to a higher degree than that to which persons generally are subjected, then it may fairly be held that there was such special exposure to such danger as warrants a conclusion that the accident arose out of the employment, even though unexpected or unusual and in no way actually anticipated.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT §372 — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — "ARISING OUT OF EMPLOYMENT."

In determining whether injury arises out of the employment, it is immaterial whether the danger was anticipated, or the employer was free from fault, or the injury resulted from the act of a third party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. §372.]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT §101, 102(1)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

It has always been the law that it is the master's duty to furnish his servant a safe place to work, and if for any reason the place was unsafe the master was liable for resultant injuries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 135, 171, 178, 179; Dec. Dig. §101, 102(1).]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT §371—INJURIES TO SERVANT—SAFE PLACE TO WORK.

Under the old law the employer's exemption from liability where he was not negligent existed solely because he was not negligent, and not because the injury did not arise out of the employment, and even under Workmen's Compensation Act the injury, to create liability, must result from a risk reasonably incident to the work.

Henshaw, Lorigan, and Melvin, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank. Proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission by Fred Douglas for workman's compensation, opposed by Ed. Kimbol, employer. Certiorari by said Kimbol to review an award of the Commission in favor of the claimant. Affirmed.

Boyer & Beach, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. Certiorari to review an award made by the Industrial Accident Commission to one Fred Douglas against petitioner, Ed. Kimbol, for injuries received by him by accident in the course of his employment by said Kimbol, and alleged and found to have arisen out of said employment.

[1, 2] There is no doubt that the injury to Douglas was sustained "by accident," within the meaning of our Workmen's Compensation Law, and admittedly the accident happened "in the course of the employment." Our act requiring as an essential to compensation that the injury must not only be received in the course of the employment, but must also arise out of the employment (section 12), the claim is that the injury here did not arise out of the employment within the meaning of our act. A divided commission has found against this claim. There is no dispute as to the material facts.

Kimbol was the owner of and was conducting a restaurant business on the ground floor of a building in Los Angeles. Douglas was in his employ as a dishwasher. While working as such, the floor immediately above the place where he was at work suddenly gave way, with the result that he was struck by some falling object or objects and injured. The giving way of this floor was due to the fact that it was overloaded, a large quantity of bottled grape juice having been stored thereon. This floor was not included in the lease under which Kimbol occupied that portion of the building devoted to restaurant purposes, and he had no control whatever thereof; nor did he have any knowledge that the floor above was being used for storage purposes. It was in fact rented for a rooming or lodging house, and the lease contained a clause that it should not be used for any other purpose. Under these circumstances can it fairly be held that the injury arose out of the employment?

The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts has said in regard to the meaning of the term "arising out of the employment" as used in Workmen's Compensation Laws:

"It [the injury] 'arises out of' the employment when there is apparent to the rational mind, upon consideration of all the circumstances, a causal connection between the conditions under which the work is required to be performed and the resulting injury. Under this test, if the injury can be seen to have followed as a natural incident of the work and to have been contemplated by a reasonable person familiar with the whole situation as a result of the exposure occasioned by the nature of the employment, then it arises 'out of' the employment. But it excludes an injury which cannot fairly be traced to the employment as a contributing proximate cause and which comes from a hazard to which the workman would have been equally exposed apart from the employment. The causative danger must be peculiar to the work and not common to the neighborhood. It must be incidental to the character of the business, and not independent of the relation of master and servant. It need not have been foreseen or expected, but after the event it must appear to have had its origin in a risk connected with the employment, and to have flowed from that source as a rational consequence." In re McNichols, 215 Mass. 498, 102 N. E. 697.

This appears to us to be a good general definition of the term "arising out of the employment," and we think it fairly includes such a case as this. It will be conceded, in view of the facts we have stated, that the place in which Douglas was employed was not an unsafe place in the sense that there was any structural defect therein likely to cause injury so long as the building was used for the purposes for which it was intended, and that the danger of a collapse of the ceiling of the restaurant and the collapse of such ceiling were due wholly to the unauthorized use by another of the floor above for storage purposes, and the consequent subjection of that floor to a greater burden than that for which it was designed; but because of this unauthorized use of the floor above for storage purposes those below were, in fact, in danger of injury from a collapse of the floor, and in that sense the place in which Douglas was required to do all his work was an unsafe place. The danger was one peculiar to that very place—an incident of the particular premises used as they were being used—and it is not unreasonable to say that Douglas was specially exposed to that danger by reason of his employment. Solely by reason of and in pursuance of such employment he was required to remain in this unsafe place exposed to this danger of a collapse of the ceiling of the room in which he was constantly at work. The risk was normally one incident to working in that place, one due solely to its unsafe condition. If this be so, we are of the opinion that the injury may fairly be said, in view of the authorities, to have arisen out of his employment. All the circumstances being considered, there is a causal connection between the conditions under which the work was required to be performed and the injury. The resulting injury was a natural incident of the work in view of the conditions under which it was being done, one that would have been contemplated by a reasonable person familiar with the whole situation as a result of the exposure occasioned by the nature of the employment. The danger was peculiar to the particular place in which the employé was required to work. It is true that the accident was not actually foreseen or expected, but this is not necessary. It is sufficient that after the event it appears to have had its origin in a risk connected with the employment and to have flowed from that source as a rational consequence.

[3] The question of special exposure by reason of the employment has been considered in various cases. The general rule deducible therefrom is that, if the exposure of the employé to a particular danger differs substantially from the normal risk to which all are subject, if the employment necessarily accentuates and increases the danger to a higher degree than that to which persons generally are subjected, then it may fairly be held that there was such special exposure to such danger as warrants a conclusion that the accident arose out of the employment, even though unexpected or unusual and in no way actually anticipated. See Martin v. Lovibond & Sons (English Court of Appeal) 5 Neg. C. C. Ann. 985, and note; Hoenig v. Industrial Commission, 159 Wis. 646, 150 N. W. 996; L. R. A. 1916A, 339; 8

Neg. C. C. Ann. 192; State ex rel. People's Coal & Ice Co. v. Court, 129 Minn. 502, 153 N. W. 119, L. R. A. 1916A, 344; 9 Neg. C. C. Ann. 129; Adamson v. Anderson, Workmen's Comp. Cases 1913, p. 506, 2 S. L. T. 139.

[4] It seems clear that this case is one in which the accident and injury to Douglas can fairly be held to have "arisen out of the employment" within the meaning of that term as it is defined in Re McNichols, 215 Mass. 498, 102 N. E. 697, L. R. A. 1916A, 306, and the other authorities cited herein, and that the conclusion of the Accident Commission to that effect must therefore be sustained. As we have seen, it can make no difference that the danger was not known or anticipated; nor can it make any difference that the employer was entirely without fault. The liability for compensation created by our law is not founded on any want of care on the part of the employer; nor is it material that the dangerous condition of the place in which Douglas was working was due entirely to the fault of some third party. The room in which Douglas was required to do his work had become an unsafe place in which to be because of the danger of a collapse of the ceiling thereof, and solely by reason of his employment in that unsafe place he was specially exposed to such danger. We have said that an accident arises "out of the employment" where "it is possible to trace the injury to the nature of the employé's work or to the risks to which the employer's business exposes the employé," and that "it 'arises out of' the occupation when there is a causal connection between the conditions under which the servant works and the resulting injury." Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, 158 Pac. 212. The italics are ours. Under the facts we apparently have here a risk to which the employer's business specially exposed the employé. The danger was a constant one, inherent in the place itself under the conditions there existing, and the injury was one which a person cognizant of those conditions would reasonably expect to occur.

[5] It has always been the law that it is the duty of the employer to use reasonable care to furnish an employé a safe place in which to do his work. If for any reason, whether due to the negligent or even criminal act of a third party or not, the place was in fact unsafe, the employer was liable to the employé for any injury due thereto, provided that if he had used reasonable care in the matter he would have known of the defect and would have remedied it. The condition as to the safety of the place in which the work was to be done is thus always a matter incident to the employment, and an injury arising from its unsafe condition has always been considered an injury arising out of the employment.

[6] Under the old law the employer's exemption from liability where he was not negligent in the matter existed solely because he was not negligent, and not because the injury did not arise out of the employment. Our industrial compensation system has dispensed altogether with the element of negligence on the part of the employer, but it still must remain true that injury to an employé which is due to the dangerous condition of the very room in which he is required to do his work is an injury resulting from a "risk reasonably incident to the employment." Of course, there is no analogy between such a case as this and such cases as Coronado Beach Co. v. Pillsbury, supra, and Fishing v. Pillsbury, 158 Pac. 215, in which it is held that there is no liability on the part of the employer to the employé for an injury inflicted by the "skylarking" of a fellow employé, because such an injury does not arise out of the employment.

In view of the suggestion as to the impossibility of the employer insuring against such an accident as this, it is proper to observe that if, as we hold the injury did arise out of the employment, it was one that would be covered by a policy insuring against liability for injuries to employés received in the course of employment and arising out of the employment.

The award is affirmed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; SLOSS, J.; LAW-LOR, J.

HENSHAW, J. I dissent. The case is the first of its kind before this court, and, because in my judgment the award is supported by an altogether strained and unwarranted extension of the language and meaning of our law, it has seemed to me fitting that I should express my views at length.

It is a part of familiar knowledge that the fundamentals of our Compensation Act are taken from the English law—a law which had been in existence for many years before the enactment of the similar measure by this state. The phrases of paramount and controlling importance in measuring the right to an award, namely, that the injury must have been sustained "in the course of the employment," and also must have "arisen out of the employment," are adopted bodily from the English law. As is to be expected, these phrases, as applied to accidents and injuries, came frequently before the English courts for interpretation. With only the latter of the two are we here concerned. Admittedly in this case the injury was sustained while the employé was properly engaged in his labors. The one question calling for answer is whether, within the language and spirit of our law, it can be said that the accident "arose out of the employment."

In considering the vast number of cases that have arisen and continue to arise under the terms of the English act and of the similar enactments adopted by our states, it will not create surprise to find amongst them extreme cases and very doubtful cases. This is inevitably to be expected, since the jurists called upon to consider these acts are jurists trained in the principles of the common law, from which principles these acts are a wide departure, and also because these jurists are called upon to construe and to apply to these new conditions new phrases of description and definition. Nevertheless, in no one of these numerous adjudications which has passed under my review is there to be found any support for the extreme construction which is here given to our law in support of this award.

In so declaring I accept unreservedly the definition of the Massachusetts court in Re McNichols, which is adopted in the prevailing opinion, as being satisfactory and complete. But to my mind the very terms of that definition, in which the prevailing opinion finds support for this award, actually forbid it. I say this quite realizing the fact that my statement is necessarily a reflection upon my own powers of reasoning and understanding, or else that the language of the Massachusetts court furnishes a striking illustration of the grave limitations of English written words to convey exact thought.

It may not be amiss to consider for a moment precisely what these compensation acts design to accomplish. They were enacted under the sanction of the police power because it was believed that direct provision should be made for the support of an employé whose injuries grew out of his work, and for the maintenance of his family and dependents, where, under similar conditions, his injuries resulted in his death, and it was decreed that the employer—the industry—in all such cases should bear the burden of this compensation, the employer in some cases being allowed, in other cases being compelled, to insure against the losses which might arise from these causes. Elsewhere I have pointed out that the interest of the state in seeing that an injured workman receives compensation during the period of his incapacity is just as great whether that workman be injured in his hours of leisure or in his hours of labor, and equally that the loss to the workman and the economic loss to the state are just as great if the workman be injured in his hours of leisure as if he be injured in his hours of labor. Nevertheless these laws limit their beneficence with much rigidity to injuries received by the employé during his hours of labor which injuries must also arise "out of the employment." If this last phrase "arise out of the employment" means any injury (not willfully occasioned by the employé himself) which he sustains because as an employé he is working at a given place—and this unquestionably is the meaning of the prevailing decision—then there was no occasion for the lawmakers to have used this phrase at all, for that construction is the exact equivalent of saying that a workman shall be compensated for any injury which he sustains during the course of his employment, or, in other words, while at work.

In the broadest sense, whenever accident and consequent injury befall a workman who is duly in the performance of his duties, it may be said that such accident and injury arose "out of his employment." But some of them arise out of the employment only because of the fact that by virtue of his employment the workman was at a given place at the given time when the accident happened. Is this latter class of accidents included within the meaning of our law? The prevailing opinion holds that it is. I am convinced that it is not. I construe our law to embrace only that class of injuries which may for convenience be described as "occupational injuries," precisely as we use the phrase "occupational diseases." To this broad class belong all injuries which result to an employé from the performance of his work, even though occasioned by his own negligent performance of it. Second, all of those injuries resulting to the employé, with or without negligence on his part, because of the employer's failure to perform some duty which he owes to his employé. And in this large class belong all of those cases where injury results from unsafe and inadequate appliances, place of labor, etc. And, third, all of those injuries resulting from extra hazard either inherent in the character of the labor or occasioned by the act of the employer.

Into one of these three classes must fall every injury for which compensation may properly be awarded, or otherwise there is no limitation whatsoever to the right of an award if the employé has been injured while at his labors. But it will not be disputed that our law does not grant compensation for every injury sustained while the employé is engaged in his labors. For example, it is not questioned that, saving in exceptional cases hereinafter distinguished, the employé is not entitled to compensation for injuries sustained by the so-called acts of God. Indeed, this was very early held and decided by our accident commissioners in Fensler v. Acc. Com., 1 Cal. Ind. Accd. Com. Dec. No. 21, p. 41. There an employé engaged in piling and unpling bags of cement in a warehouse on a hot day was overcome by heat, and, after laying down the general principle that the employer is not liable for accidents occurring by the act of God, it was found that this employé was especially exposed by his employment to the danger of sunstroke, and that his injury was therefore compensable, thus following the unbroken line of authority of the English and American courts; nor yet, saving in exceptional cases, is an injury compensable which is occasioned by the tortious act of a fellow employé, or the tortious or negligent act of a stranger.

Touching injuries arising from the act of God, it is said by Mr. Ruegg (Ruegg's Employers' Liability and Workmen's Compensation [8th Ed.] p. 338):

"The question has arisen, Could an operation of the laws of nature—as earthquake, flood, lightning, or extraordinary tempest—occasioning personal injury to a workman whilst engaged in his employment, be said to be 'accident arising out of and in the course of the employment'? It is thought not. It may be granted that, but for the fact of his being engaged in the employment at the time, the accident would not have happened to him. In this sense it may be said to have happened to him in the course of his employment. But in what fair sense could it be held to have arisen out of the employment? The employment may have been a cause sine qua non, but we do not think it could be regarded even as an effective cause of the accident."

As illustrating the application of the principle and of the exception to its application may be cited Kelly v. Kerry County Council, 42 Ir. L. T. 23, where a workman engaged in cleaning out gullies to prevent the road from being flooded was struck by lightning and killed. Compensation was denied him, the judge saying:

"I am unable to find any special or peculiar danger from lightning to which these men were exposed from working on the road. * * * It is only under very special circumstances, when the employment of the workman exposes him to peculiar risk from lightning, not shared by men in other employments, that an accident by lightning can be said to arise out of his employment."

The same principle was declared by the Supreme Court of Michigan in overruling an award granted by the Michigan Industrial Accident Board in Klawinski v. Lakeshore & Mich. Southern Ry. Co., 185 Mich. 643, 152 N. W. 213, L. R. A. 1916A, 342. Klawinski was a section laborer. During a violent storm, under directions of the foreman of the gang, all took refuge in a barn. A bolt of lightning struck the barn and killed Klawinski. It was conceded that he met his death in the course of his employment, but it was held that his death did not occur by reason of an accident arising out of his employment. Such also was the ruling of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in Hoenig v. Industrial Commission of Wisconsin, 159 Wis. 646, 150 N. W. 996, L. R. A. 1916A, 339, where Hoenig was killed by a stroke of lightning while working on a dam in the Fox river. The Industrial Accident Commission, notwithstanding the introduction of certain testimony seeking to show that a workman so employed was exposed to an extra hazard from lightning, declined to consider the evidence sufficient to establish this extra hazard and refused to grant an award. The judgment of the commission was sustained by the Supreme Court. Upon the other hand, the exceptional cases where an award from death by lightning has been sustained because of the extra hazard growing out of the special occupation are typified by Andrew v. Fallsworth Industrial Society Limited, [1904] 2 K. B. 32, 6 W. O. C. 11, where a bricklayer was killed by lightning while working on a scaffold 23 feet above the level of the ground. Expert evidence was given showing that his position exposed the deceased to extra hazard and special danger from lightning. The county court held under this showing that compensation should be allowed, and the award was sustained for the indicated reasons. Such also was the decision of the Supreme Court of Minnesota in State ex rel. People's Coal and Ice Co. v. District Court, 129 Minn. 502, 153 N. W. 119, L. R. A. 1916A, 344, 9 Neg. C. C. Ann. 129, under certiorari to review an award, where the driver of an ice company, compelled by his duties to be out in stormy weather, left his team and went toward a tall tree, either for protection or in the performance of his duties soliciting orders. He was killed by a bolt of lightning. The authorities are reviewed and the award sustained on the ground of the unusual risk and special hazard.

It will be instructive at this point to consider other cases where the question of extra hazard pertaining to the employment has been considered and the claim allowed or disallowed. In Armitage v. Lancashire & Yorkshire R. R. Co., [1902] 2 K. B. 178, the accident happened to a workman engaged in his work, through the willful wrongful act of a fellow workman, and it was held the accident did not arise out of and in the course of his employment. Falconer v. London, etc., Ship Building Co., 3 Fed. 564, arose under the following facts: The accident befell a workman through the negligence of a fellow workman who was indulging in horseplay, and it was held that the accident did not arise in the course of his employment. To the same effect are our own cases. In Coronado Beach Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 158 Pac. 212, an employé going down a flight of stairs in the performance of his duties was tickled by a fellow employé. He fell and seriously injured his knee. Compensation was denied him upon the ground that the injury was not from an accident arising out of the employment or incidental to the employment. To the same effect is Fishering v. Industrial Accident Commission, 158 Pac. 215, where an employé lost the sight of an eye by a missile fired into it from a trick camera operated by a fellow employé in sport. In the first of these cases this court accepts the unquestioned rule so frequently noted above that the injury must be the result of a "risk reasonably incidental to the employment." Upon the other hand, in Challis v. London & S. W. Ry. Co., [1905] 2 K. B. 154, an engine driver received injuries resulting in his death through being struck by a stone thrown from a railway bridge at his engine by a malicious boy. Here Collins, Master of the Rolls, uses the phrase so often found in the decisions "a risk incidental to the employment," and his exposition clearly shows the meaning with which he employs these words; for he says that an accident arising out of an employment necessarily involves the consideration of the question, "what risks are commonly incidental to the particular employment in question?" And it is held that the temptation of boys to throw stones, whether done maliciously or heedlessly, is so well known that the risk to which the engine driver was exposed from this source was an extra hazard of his business, even though it were not a hazard common to other businesses. And this is exemplified by the language of Cozens-Hardy, Master of the Rolls, in Craske v. Wigan, [1909] 2 K. B. 635, where, discussing the Challis Case, he says:

"That case really turned on this: That there was evidence which satisfied the county court that there was an irresistible temptation to small boys to drop stones onto a train as it passes under a railway bridge. In that case a boy dropped a stone which hit the glass of the cab of the engine where the driver was, with the result that the fragments of glass were driven into his eye. We there held that that was a risk incidental to his employment. To quote a few words from my own judgment in that case, I said: 'It seems to me that the risk of such an occurrence is one which may reasonably be looked upon as incidental to the employment of an engine driver, though it might not be incidental to other employments.'"

The principle that only risks incidental to the service are covered by the act stood established as the interpretation of the English law long before and at the time our own act, with identical language, was adopted. Wilson v. Laing, 46 S. L. R. 843. This condition, namely, that the accident is incidental to the employment, must be found to exist in all cases, even those where the award is based upon the exceptional hazard. Thus in Rowland v. Wright, [1909] 1 K. B. 963, known as the stable cat case, a stableman, in the recognized discharge of his duty, was taking his meal quietly in the stable, when the cat, without any provocation, flew at him and bit him. The cat was the proprietor's cat. It remained in and about the stable at the instance of the proprietor. For it and its conduct he was held responsible. His employes were thus subject to this extra hazard at the instance of the employer, and the injury which resulted to this one thus became incidental to his employment, the court, in discussing the case in Craske v. Wigan, supra, declaring that:

"The stable cat was really a part of the furniture of the stable. The accident was just as much an accident arising out of his employment as if he had been kicked or bitten by a horse in the stable."

In Nisbet v. Rayne, etc., [1910] 2 K. B. 689, a cashier was traveling in a railway carriage to a colliery, with a large sum of money for the payment of his employer's workmen. He was robbed and murdered. It was held that he was the victim of an accident within the meaning of the law, and that the extra hazard which he underwent in carrying this large sum of money was "a risk incidental to his employment and likely to have been in the contemplation of the parties when Nisbet was engaged," Cozens-Hardy, Master of the Rolls, affirming this view upon appeal, and declaring that Nisbet was exposed to this special risk incidental to his employment. The same view was taken and principle announced in Anderson v. Balfour, 2 I. R. 97, where a gamekeeper was attacked by poachers. Notwithstanding the act of the poachers was criminal, it was held that this extra hazard to which the gamekeeper was exposed was incidental to his occupation. It is a generally accepted principle that risks to which all persons similarly situated are equally exposed are not risks incidental to the business.

Having thus pointed out certain exceptions distinguishing those engaged in particular employments and exempting them from the operation of the rule upon the ground of a special hazard incidental to the employment, another class of cases now merits mention. The ordinary perils of a highway or of a crowded street are common to all upon the highway or street. Yet it is held that, where the nature of one's employment compels his continuous presence on and use of the streets, and even perhaps where a special and particular service requires his presence upon a street for a limited time, if injured he becomes entitled to compensation, but always upon the same ground of the special hazard incidental to the business. Thus a collector was kicked by a passing horse while riding in the street on his bicycle in the course of his employment, and was allowed compensation for the indicated reason. M'Neice v. Singer Sewing Machine Co., 48 Scott. Law Rep. 15. To like effect in Millar v. Refuge Assurance Co., 49 Scott. Law Rep. 67. And in Martin v. Lovibond & Sons, 5 N. C. C. A. 985, a drayman, whose duties took him into the street for many continuous hours while going his proper rounds, stopped outside a public house, left his dray, crossed the street, drank one glass of ale, and recrossing the street to his dray was run over and killed. The English Court of Appeal, first declaring that the drayman was still in his employment during this temporary absence for refreshment, held that the street risk that he ran was incidental to his employment, and that his hazard, since he practically spent his life upon the streets, was exceptional, and that he was "exceptionally exposed to street accidents; * * * whereas an ordinary member of the public not so exceptionally exposed would not be entitled to claim compensation." This principle was declared by the California Accident Commission in Leary v. Fairchild, Gilmore, etc., Co. (volume 1, No. 3), where Leary, engaged in repairing pavements in the street, was struck by an auto truck. And, finally, touching the proposition that it is not necessary that one's occupation should demand his continued presence upon the street, but that the same principle would apply to one who was required to be upon the street in the performance of some specially delegated duty, it is sufficient to refer to Elliott, Workmen's Compensation Act (6th Ed.) p. 78, and to the language of Cozens-Hardy in McDonald v. Owners, etc., 2 K. B. 926, where he says:

"If I send my domestic servant in the evening with a letter to a friend, and he is knocked down by a motor omnibus on his way to my friend's house, I should be liable. If, however, he, having a night off, goes, as he is at full liberty to go, to the Franco-British Exhibition for his own amusement, and meets with an accident at the same spot, I take it that I should not be liable."

I have heretofore said that all injuries to be compensable under our act must, in a broad sense, be occupational injuries, and that in the first subdivision will naturally fall all those injuries resulting to an employé and growing out of his performance of the work, even though the accident has its origin in his own negligent performance of it. The precise kind of accident or character of injury which an employé may thus sustain is immaterial, and the fact that it may be unusual or exceptional in character is equally immaterial. Thus in the case at bar, if this dishwasher had carelessly slopped water upon the floor and made it slippery, and then, taking up a knife for the purpose of cleaning it, had slipped and wounded himself with the knife, the accident would have been exceptional and unusual in character. But it would have arisen strictly out of the performance, though the negligent performance, of his duty. No one, I take it, will question the soundness of this classification nor of the right of the employé to compensation for any injury so arising.

As little doubt can be entertained over the soundness of the second classification—the right of the employé to compensation where the employer has failed in a duty owing to the employé, for this is but one of the forms of the familiar common-law right of action. It is within this class, as I read the prevailing opinion, that the accident to Douglas is placed. It calls for detailed consideration later. The third class, entitling the employé to compensation when the injury results either from an extra hazard inherent in the character of the labor or occasioned by the act of the employer, is typified by the cases above cited, such as the Challis Case, where the engine driver was struck by the stone thrown by a malicious boy, and the award was upheld upon the ground that engine drivers are exposed to an extra hazard inherent in the character of the work, and the Andrew Case, where the award in the case of the bricklayer killed by lightning upon a high scaffold was sustained upon like ground. The cases where liability is imposed upon the employer for extra hazard to his employés occasioned by his own act are typified by the Rowland (or stable cat) Case, and by the McNichols Case, where the award was sustained because the deceased employé had been beaten to death by a fellow workman in an intoxicated frenzy of passion; it being known to the employer that the offending workman did so become intoxicated and did fall into violent fits of rage and would be liable to assault his fellow workmen when in such condition, but that nevertheless he was retained in the service of his employer.

It is in this case that the definition of an injury arising out of the employment is given and found acceptable by this court. The definition, it is proper to say, is but a compilation of the utterances of English judges, and it will be of advantage in determining the meaning of the language to quote some of these utterances. Thus says Hardy, M. R., in Butler v. Burton on Trent Union, [1912] W. C. Rep. 222:

"We have heard an argument from counsel for the respondent that it did arise out of the employment because it took place on premises where Butler was engaged in working. If he was right in this argument, the words in the act providing that the accident must arise 'out of' the employment might be omitted, and the words providing that the accident should arise 'in the course of' the employment alone be left. The provision that the accident must be an accident arising out of the employment has the meaning that the accident must arise out of some risk reasonably incidental to the employment. * * * There was nothing peculiar to his employment which rendered the risk of this accident happening greater than it would have been otherwise."

And says Buckley, L. J., in Fitzgerald v. Clarke & Son, [1908] 2 K. B. 796:

"The latter words relate to the circumstances under which an accident of that character or quality takes place. The character or quality of the accident as conveyed by the words 'out of' involves, I think, the idea that the accident is in some sense due to the employment. It must be an accident resulting from a risk reasonably incidental to the employment."

And says Kennedy, L. J., in the same case:

"The words [arising out of] appear to point to accidents arising from such causes as the negligence of fellow workmen in the course of the employment, or some natural cause incidental to the character of a business." "We conclude, therefore, that an accident arises 'out of' the employment when it is something the risk of which might have been contemplated by a reasonable person when entering the employment as incidental to it. That this is so appears from an examination of Armitage v. Lancashire & Yorkshire Railway Co., supra, Collins v. Collins, [1907] 2 I. R. 104, Murphy v. Berwick, [1909] 43 Ir. L. T. R. 126, and Blake v. Head, [1912] 106 L. T. R. 822, in each of which recovery was denied because the act of the third party was not a risk reasonably to be contemplated by the employé in undertaking the employment." Bryant v. Fissell, 84 N. J. Law, 72, 86 Atl. 458.

Says Hardy, M. R., in Craske v. Wigan, [1909] 2 K. B. 635:

"I think it would be dangerous to depart from that which, so far as I am aware, has been the invariable rule of the Court of Appeal since these acts came into operation, namely, to hold that it is not enough for the applicant to say, 'The accident would not have happened if I had not been engaged in that employment or if I had not been in that particular place.' He must go further and must say, 'The accident arose because of something I was doing in the course of my employment or because I was exposed by the nature of my employment to some peculiar danger.' Unless something of that kind is established, the applicant must fail, because the accident is not one arising out of and in the course of the employment. In my view we should not be administering law and justice if we did not hold that the learned judge was quite right. The appeal must be dismissed."

And says Lord Salvesen, in Kinghorn v. Guthrie, [1912-13] 50 S. L. R. 863, after setting forth with approval the language just quoted from Craske v. Wigan:

"It is, of course, true that he would not have met with the accident unless he had been in that particular place, and that he would not have been in that particular place unless he had been engaged in that particular employer's work; but, as the Master of the Rolls said, that is not enough; you must point to something in the nature of the employment that makes you peculiarly liable to a risk of that kind."

That it may not be thought they have been intentionally ignored, it is pertinent to refer specifically to the cases cited in the prevailing opinion as supporting this award. The first of these is Martin v. Lovibond. That case has already been considered. The drayman left his truck and crossed the street, drank one glass of ale, and returning was injured. The decision points out that the drayman, with his long hours of street service, was entitled, as a part of his employment, to adequate food, and that this included reasonable drink; that therefore he was engaged in his employment at the time the accident occurred, and, though he received his injuries upon the street, the nature of his employment exposed him to a peculiar hazard which brought the case within the compensatory terms of the act. Hoenig v. Industrial Commission also has been mentioned, and is the case where an employé working on a dam in the Fox river was killed by lightning, but the holding was that there was no special hazard in his employment which would entitle him to compensation. People's Coal and Ice Co. has also been mentioned. That also is the case of a special hazard by lightning growing out of the nature of the employment. The last case is Adamson v. Anderson, [1912-13] 50 S. L. R. 855. There a division of the Scottish court held that a workman who, during a violent gale, was engaged in erecting a stone-planing machine in an open yard, and who, while bending over, was struck and injured by a slate blown off the roof of an adjoining building, was entitled to compensation, because the character of his employment exposed him to this extra hazard. The case was declared by the court to be one of the border line and doubtful cases. But immediately following that case another division of the same court decided Kinghorn v. Guthrie, supra. There a carter, while leading his horse and wagon out of his employer's yard in the course of his employment, was struck by a piece of corrugated iron blown by a high wind from the roof of an adjoining building, and it was held that the accident did not arise out of his employment. A not very successful attempt was made by the learned judges to distinguish this case from the preceding, the basis of the distinction seeming to be that in the Anderson Case the employé was bending over, looking at his work, and so was unable to detect his danger from the flying slate. It must be apparent, I think, that no one of these cases affords any support for upholding the award for an accident arising under the circumstances of the present case.

Attention may now be directed to a consideration of the definition in the McNichols Case and to the statement in the prevailing opinion that:

"It seems clear that this case is one in which the accident and injury to Douglas can fairly be held to have 'arisen out of the employment' within the meaning of that term as it is defined in Re McNichols."

But, before doing so, it should be pointed out that our own law is more specific than is the English law or the law of Massachusetts. With an apparent deliberate intent to limit the right of recovery to occupational or industrial accidents, it declares in terms the conditions which must exist before a recovery may be awarded, and one of those conditions is that the injury must have been "proximately caused by the employment." W. C. I. & S. Act, § 12, subd. 3, as amended by St. 1915, p. 1081, § 2.

Can it be said that this injury was proximately caused by the employment? If so, it is only in that very limited and discredited sense spoken of by Ruegg and again quoted:

"It may be granted that but for the fact of his being engaged in the employment at the time the accident would not have happened to him. In this sense it may be said to have happened to him in the course of his employment, but in what fair sense could it be held to have arisen out of the employment? The employment may have been a cause sine qua non, but we do not think it could be regarded even as an effective cause of the accident."

And this, as we have seen from the quotations above, is the precise view taken by all the English and American courts; also it is the precise view taken by the Massachusetts court. Says that court, compensation is to be allowed "if the injury can be seen to have followed as a natural incident of the work." But this accident was not an incident of the work, natural or unnatural. Compensation is allowed if the injury can be seen "to have been contemplated by a reasonable person familiar with the whole situation as a result of the exposure occasioned by the nature of the employment." There was nothing in the nature of this employment that exposed the injured person to this injury. Would any one say that, growing out of the nature of the employment of dishwashers, they are liable to be injured by the overloading of floors above the restaurants where they work? "It excludes," says the Massachusetts court, "an injury which cannot fairly be traced to the employment as a contributing proximate cause." This is nearly the language of our own statute just quoted and discussed. "The causative danger must be peculiar to the work," as the lightning stroke, or the stone throwing at locomotive engineers. Was this danger in the slightest sense peculiar to the work? "It must be incidental to the character of the business." Will it be said that it is incident to the character of the business of a dishwasher that he shall be injured by an outside agency in crushing down a ceiling over his head? "It need not have been foreseen or expected," which is perfectly true of most accidents, the precise form which they may take being beyond the reach of exact foreknowledge. But the accident "must appear to have had its origin in a risk connected with the employment, and to have flowed from that source as a rational consequence." This was a risk not in the slightest connected with the employment. It was an accident that happened to the man because his employment happened to place him where an independent tortious act of a third person inflicted injury upon him.

But it is said that the place where the injured man worked was unsafe, and that because it was unsafe the employer is liable. This pays not the slightest regard to all the other elements—that the employer has failed in some duty; that the special condition was or should have been known to him. But the prevailing opinion reasons that because a place of employment has become unsafe, regardless of the acts and conduct of the employer, regardless of the means or measures by which it has been made unsafe, the employer is liable. Here, to my mind, is the grave mistake in reasoning leading to a most unwarranted extension of the law. The act of piling bottles of grape juice upon the floor above was negligent and tortious. It was the act of an independent third person, performed without the knowledge of the employer. Admittedly the employer was in no way responsible for this act. If, then, the employer is to be held responsible for all such kinds of accident upon the theory that the premises have become unsafe, and all this without regard to his chargeable knowledge of the fact, it inevitably results in declaring the employer to be an insurer of his employés whenever accident has befallen them while engaged in their duties. There can be no distinction between a tortious act committed by negligence and one committed by design. The injury that results will be the same; the right of compensation to the injured person is the same (saving, of course, in the exceptional case where punitive damages may be added). What would be said, then, if the accident had occurred by the intent of the man who piled the bottles of grape juice to accomplish the result which his negligence brought about? The place of labor would have become equally unsafe. Is it possible that our law contemplates a recovery for such a wrongful act not within the legitimate hazard of a business? Assuming that a destructive bomb had either carelessly or intentionally been left in the room above, and by its explosion the same injury had resulted—the premises were made equally unsafe—is the employer liable? The length of time when the premises became unsafe, or the knowledge of the employer that they have become unsafe, is utterly eliminated. The premises become equally unsafe whether to the bomb is attached a one-minute fuse or clockwork which will explode it in 48 hours. And for any and all of these acts it is held that the employer is liable in compensation. Yet every decision is to the contrary and limits the employer's liability to accidents legitimately connected with the hazards of the business. Let us take the case of the boy descending the flight of steps and made to fall by the tickling of a fellow employé. Assume that, instead of so doing, the fellow employé, in horseplay, had greased the steps, and so occasioned the fall. Here would be another instance of the premises being unsafe, and here, under the authority of the prevailing opinion, the employer would be liable. Yet the decisions, as we have taken pains to point out, hold the employer to be exempt from liability for the willfully tortious act either of fellow employés or of outsiders, and for all the negligent acts of fellow employés, unless the negligent act has a bearing upon the performance of the duties of the injured employé. The boy who was tickled was in the performance of his duty. The other boy who negligently tickled him was not.

If the boy had greased the steps, the employer would have been liable, but because he tickled his companion the employer is exempt. Can this be the law? And if the unsafeness of the place of labor is the sole controlling consideration, what becomes of the Kelly Case, supra, the Klawinski Case, supra, and the Hoenig Case, supra, where precisely as in the Andrew Case, supra, the men were killed by lightning stroke? In all these cases indubitably the places of labor became as unsafe when the men were struck and awards denied as was the place where Andrew was struck and an award given. No one of these cases adopts for an instant the reasoning that an employer without fault can be held liable for an untoward and unexpected injury occasioned by act of God or a third person, nor accepts the theory that an employer may so be held liable because at the instant of the accident the place of labor had become unsafe. So far as all the adjudications go, it is uncontroverted that acts by outside agencies willfully tortious or negligently done are not acts arising out of the employment, even though they make the place of labor unsafe, unless peculiar and exceptional circumstances distinguish them; a familiar proposition typified, as has been said, by such cases as the Challis Case and the Bryant Case.

In my judgment the award should be annulled.

ARUNDELL v. AMERICAN OILFIELDS CO. (Civ. 1520.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 8, 1916.)

1. WORDS AND PHRASES—"TOWER."

In testimony that a driller in an oil well is supposed to be boss when he is on tower, "tower" means the same as "shift" in other mining operations.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT § 279(5)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for injuries to a tool dresser, evidence held to justify the jury in finding that the driller under whom the tool dresser worked was negligent in raising a pipe by a rope rather than by elevator, and in leaving the pipe suspended at a height where the tools, when elevated, would interfere with it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 978; Dec. Dig. § 279(5).]

3. EVIDENCE § 587—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY—NECESSITY FOR DIRECT EVIDENCE—"INDIRECT EVIDENCE"—"INFERENCE."

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1832, defining "indirect evidence" as that which tends to establish a fact by proving another fact, which affords an inference of the existence of the fact in dispute; section 1958, providing that an "inference" is a deduction which the reason of a jury makes from the facts proved; and section 1960, providing that an inference must be founded on fact legally proved—the law does not require in all cases direct evidence of a fact in dispute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2436; Dec. Dig. § 587.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Indirect Evidence; Inference.]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT § 203(1)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMED RISKS—"ORDINARY RISKS."

"Ordinary risks" assumed by a servant are such as may not be avoided by reasonable care by the master, or by his servant, who is superior to the injured servant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 538-540, 542, 543; Dec. Dig. § 203(1).]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Ordinary Risk.]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT § 216(3)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMED RISKS.

A tool dresser does not assume the risk of injury by the falling of a pipe, due to the negligence of the driller under whom he worked in leaving the pipe suspended where the tools would interfere with it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 570; Dec. Dig. § 216(3).]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT § 238(2)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The act of a tool dresser in tying a rope on a heavy pipe to be hoisted at the direction of the driller, through whose negligence in not hoisting the pipe far enough the tools interfered with it and caused it to slip from the rope and fall, does not show contributory negligence of the tool dresser, barring recovery for his injuries.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT § 279(5)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to show that a driller of an oil well had a right to control or direct the services of a tool dresser, within Civ. Code, § 1970, providing that an employer shall be liable for injury resulting from the neglect of a person, employed by the employer, having the right to control or direct the services of the employé injured.

8. EVIDENCE § 114—COMPETENCY—REMOTE-NESS.

In an action for injuries to a servant, a copy of a record of a land company of weather reports telephoned to the office from superintendents of farms in various parts of the county was not competent to disprove that it rained at the oil well where plaintiff was injured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 125-132; Dec. Dig. § 114.]

9. NEGLIGENCE § 134(1, 2)—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Negligence, like any other fact, may be inferred from a preponderance of the evidence, whether circumstantial or direct, and plaintiff need not prove his case beyond a reasonable doubt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 267, 272; Dec. Dig. § 134(1, 2).]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR § 930(1)—INSTRUCTIONS—DUTIES OF JURY—BURDEN OF SHOWING ERROR.

The refusal of an instruction that the jury should not be governed by sympathy, but by the evidence, and that they should not be influenced by the fact that plaintiff is a laboring man, and defendant a corporation, in the absence of anything tending to show that the jury acted out of sympathy for plaintiff, or through prejudice against defendant, is not error; it being presumed that the jury obeyed their oath.

11. MASTER AND SERVANT § 291(12)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to a servant, an instruction that a plaintiff cannot recover unless he has a preponderance of the evidence supporting the proposition that he was not at the time of the accident guilty of any failure to exercise ordinary reasonable care for his own safety, which proximately contributed to his injury, was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1143, 1144; Dec. Dig. § 291(12).]

12. APPEAL AND ERROR § 901—REVIEW—BURDEN OF SHOWING ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

On appeal from a judgment for plaintiff, where plaintiff contends that the proper instructions which were refused were covered by instructions given, the burden is on defendant, by setting forth all the instructions, to show the error complained of.

13. APPEAL AND ERROR § 1066—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction correctly stating the law as found in Civ. Code, § 1970, as to the liability of an employer for injuries to an employé, if not applicable, is not prejudicial to the employer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. ☞1066.]

14. TRIAL ☞189—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTION AS TO FACTS.

An instruction beginning, "If you believe from evidence that," etc., does not assume the existence of any facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 442-445; Dec. Dig. ☞189.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Roy E. Arundell against the American Oilfields Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Olin Wellborn, of Los Angeles, and George E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, for appellant. Shepard & Alm, of Los Angeles, and J. R. Dorsey, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Judgment for $10,000 followed the verdict of a jury as damages suffered by plaintiff for the loss of his right hand while in defendant's employ. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

In 1910 plaintiff, then 23 years of age, worked for defendant for about six months, receiving $3.50 per day and board, including Sundays. He had had some previous experience in the oil fields, being employed principally as a "roustabout." For some weeks previous to November 15, 1910, he had been employed by defendant as a "tool dresser" and was working in that capacity on that date. He commenced work at midnight, the accident occurring at about 4:30 o'clock in the morning. The only other person at work on the derrick at the time was one A. F. Mellen, designated as a "driller." Plaintiff's testimony as to what he was doing and the cause of the accident was as follows:

"I was jarring on a pipe, running the spear to the bottom of the pipe, and jarring it up trying to free the pipe to get it loose in the well—it was froze. The well was somewhere in the neighborhood of 2,000 feet deep. A spear is a contrivance you put on the tools, the same as you do a bit; then you can go down into the casing and take hold of it. The string of tools was about 40 feet long. It may be a little more with the spear. I continued jarring on the pipe two or three hours. After I was through jarring I pulled on the casing trying to pull it loose. I got it partly loose, then I parted the pipe, it was hard to tell where. By 'parting the pipe' I mean pulled it in two. I next tried to take the spear out of the hole. I didn't succeed, because the top joint was crimped near the top, and the spear would not come through. We had to take the joint out and get it out of the road—the top joint. I unscrewed it. In the first place Mellen and I had to unscrew this joint loose from the rest of the pipe. We both helped to do it. After that was done I put a rope on the pipe and Mellen pulled it up in the derrick. If I remember right, I mentioned the fact about using elevators, I said that to Mr. Mellen. He said, 'No,' to use the rope. I tied the rope on with a timber hitch just below the collar, probably 6 or 8 inches, maybe a foot. The collar is about 6 inches wide. The rope was about an inch or a little more thick. It was a strand out of a drilling cable, about 10 feet long. After tying the rope to the pipe I hooked it onto the block hook. It had an eye in it. Block hook is what they generally use for handling casing, the one that is permanently in the casing block. I slung the eye of the rope over that hook in the casing block. Mr. Mellen pulled the casing up in the derrick with the casing block by means of the engine and apparatus. At the time he was at the throttle. You can reach it from the derrick floor. This happened about 4 or 5 in the morning. It was dark. I could see about 20 feet in the derrick; above that I could not distinguish anything. After Mellen had hoisted that pipe I pulled the tools up and took that spear out. I lifted the tools just high enough so that I could take the spear off. It was on the lower end. The spear got above the floor. Mellen told me to elevate the tools at that time. Mellen had not got around to helping me yet. I put on the wrenches to break the joint. It would not take me but a few minutes to loosen that joint. When I removed it the tools were naturally moving around to a certain extent; jarring them rather. They were practically perpendicular all the time, but they would swing. I did not lower or elevate them. We didn't get the spear loose. This joint of pipe fell and caught my hand. I had my hand on the spear at the time. I just started to steady the tools to put on the wrench. The pipe dropped down around the tools. It struck me back of the thumb joint on the wrist. It removed my thumb, two fingers, and part of the others. The pipe was 6½ inches in diameter. It weighed, I think, 20 pounds to the foot. It was 14 or 15 feet long. * * * They amputated the hand at the wrist in the hospital."

Defendant makes the following points against the validity of the judgment: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence to show how the accident happened; (2) contributory negligence; (3) plaintiff assumed the risks of the employment; (4) plaintiff was not injured by the negligent act of an employé "having the right to control or direct the services" of plaintiff; (5) errors occurring at the trial.

[1] Plaintiff's testimony, above given, conveys some notion of how the accident happened; but it becomes necessary to inquire further into the particulars and plaintiff's relation to the work in hand. Much testimony was given explanatory of the relative duties of the driller and the tool dresser in a derrick for drilling an oil well. Witness Crites, who was superintendent of the Peerless Oil Company in the Kern River field, and had been in the oil business continuously since 1896, "in the operating department, drilling wells, etc.," and was "familiar with the custom and manner of performing work in and around derricks," testified:

"The driller is a man that has charge of the tools, and you look to him, of course, to do that part of the work. The tool dresser's business is to help the driller. If there is a boiler, he takes care of the boiler; keeps the fire up, and keeps water in the boiler, and attends to the work in and around the rig that the driller requires of him, dressing bits, helping him in all sorts of ways around the derrick. The tool dresser has certain duties which are strictly his duties, and the driller has certain other duties which are strictly his duties. As to the general work, the driller is boss of the rig and directs the work in and around the derrick. In the performance of work that requires both the tool dresser and the driller to lend a hand, the driller directs the work. Attending to the boiler is one of the routine duties that the tool dresser is supposed to do. If he wants any help, he usually asks the driller to help him. In the actual work of sinking a well, handling the tools, hoisting the casing, and such matters, the driller directs that work. The driller controls the derrick; directs the tool dresser in and about his work in the derrick."

Other witnesses described the driller as "the man that does the work inside and does the directing of it. He is supposed to be boss when he is on tower." ("Tower" means the same as "shift" in other mining operations and in plaintiff's case was from midnight until noon.)

Witness Harry Arundell, who was "lease drilling superintendent" of defendant company, testified to the duties of the tool dresser and driller:

"The tool dresser's duties are to fire and look after the boiler, take care of the engine, and assist the driller around the rig, under the driller's orders. He works under the driller's orders entirely; the driller in a derrick has, in a way, a right to control and direct the services of the tool dresser at his work. All the tool dresser's work is generally under his supervision. He has to do the work to the driller's satisfaction. The meaning of 'tool dresser' is dressing and sharpening tools. * * * In this line of work it is necessary to use a timber hitch almost every day around a drilling rig, particularly hoisting pipe. If a timber hitch is properly tied with a dry rope, it would not permit a pipe to slip from the rope and fall; it could be tied with a wet rope so that it can't slip. A wet rope would be stiff and hard to use, and would not draw down tight, and would have a tendency to open up if the weight was taken off of it. * * * The scope of the duties of driller and tool dresser are understood by them usually, so that they can work without much said. Ordinary work, sometimes very little spoken; ordinarily each knows his duty and goes ahead and does it. It was the duty of the tool dresser to step to the throttle when the tools started up, and to run the engine while the tools are hoisted out. Custom made it the duty of the driller to be at the throttle when the pipe was hoisted. It is the tool dresser's duty, under the driller's supervision, to fasten the hoisting block and hook to the pipe."

It is not necessary to quote further from the testimony as to the relative duties of the driller and tool dresser. There is but little difference between the testimony of plaintiff and defendant on this point, and there is substantial agreement that the driller is the directing head of the work in the derrick and controls the movements of the tool dresser.

A. F. Mellen was the driller in charge of the work when the accident occurred. He and plaintiff were the only persons present. His deposition was taken by defendant and was introduced by plaintiff and read in evidence. As to the accident he testified:

"It is a kind of a mystery how the joint of pipe happened to fall. In raising the pipe to strip the tools through it while taking off the spear the pipe fell—fell from up in the derrick. We pulled it up there with a block and tackle, the casing block—I did. It was fastened to a sling made of rope. Arundell fastened the rope to the piece of pipe that fell. It was his duty. He knew how to fasten it. Nobody directed him how to fasten it. As a rule we generally kept the block and tackle on the hook all the time. It is a tool dresser's place to put that on; it is almost always carried on the hook. The elevators generally hang on them. The elevators are used to put in a long string of pipe; and the sling is used for a small article. As a general thing they were both of them hanging on the same hook. I don't know whether they were on that night—as a rule they were on. I hoisted the pipe up with an engine. I ran the engine. * * * I could not say how high I hoisted it. All that I had to go by was the lines. I figured on hoisting it to the blocks at the top of the derrick—probably 40 feet. Arundell hooked it on. I could see for myself that the pipe was unscrewed when I hoisted. * * * The rope was put on after the pipe was unscrewed. While Arundell was putting the rope on it, I was at the engine. After I helped to unscrew it, I went to the engine and told him to let the blocks down while he connected with the rope. I saw when he got the rope finally connected. When the rope was on, I hoisted it. I could see for myself it was ready to be hoisted. I could not say definitely how high I hoisted it; I figured on how much line I had. I went by the coils on the shaft. I took the blocks to the top of the derrick, at least 40 feet from the bottom of the floor. I had a way of ascertaining whether it was at the top or not. It could not have been from the top 6 or 8 feet. I don't know just exactly. * * * It was dark at the time I hoisted it. I didn't look up to see."

It appeared that the derrick was lighted by four incandescent globes of 16 candle power and so placed under the roof of the derrick that they cast no light in the open space above the roof into which the pipe was hoisted. The roof was about 20 feet above the floor. The witness, continuing, testified:

"I don't know how the pipe happened to get loose from the rope that Arundell fastened it to. The rope didn't come down with the pipe; it stayed on the hook. When we took Arundell to the doctor, the rope was hanging onto the hook with the timber hitch still in it; that showed it slipped—showed the pipes slipped out of it. * * * I am sure the pipe slipped down the rope; the rope was still on the block, and the timber hitch was still in it when I came back; that was after 7 o'clock. Arundell was hurt between 4 and 5. * * * When I hoisted the string of tools up, I didn't hear any blow or jar as if it had hit up there. I didn't feel any indication of the tools hitting the pipe, when I ran the engine. It seems like you could have felt such a thing. The only thing I could figure on why the pipe slipped through the rope and came down, it must have become loosened—picked it up on the tools. That was a theory; I have no knowledge. * * * When you can see in the daylight it is the tool dresser's duty to watch for that. In the dark he could not see. * * * The man at the throttle, who is hoisting it, could not see it at the same time he was performing his duty at the engine there—it is impossible. * * * The man at the engine could not see anything in the top of the derrick. On the night in question I hoisted this block to the top of the derrick as far as I could possibly do. I had 6 or 8 feet more to run—I mean I could hoist it further. * * * I don't think it was possible to escape my attention, if it had been so adjusted that there was danger of it slipping out; at that distance it seemed all right. The rope knot was on the side away from me. I could see the turns of the rope on the pipe next to me."

He testified that after he had hoisted the pipe he set the brake to hold it with the calf wheel, and then pulled up the tools preparatory to taking it off the spear.

"While I was letting it back again, so the spear would not have to drop far, it stuck a little, enough to turn a twist in the rope two or three times when Arundell started to take it off. Of course, while he was doing that, I was letting it down with the brake. When I got it down 2 or 3 inches of the floor, I went to the tools myself, and had just got hold of them with my hands when I heard this racket; that was all there was to it."

On cross-examination he testified that when Arundell tied—

"that knot around the pipe it was pretty close to the collar; he tied it 2 or 3 inches. The collar is about 6 inches; it was 8 or 9 inches from the top. We lifted three or four joints of pipe with the same knot. It didn't show any tendency at that time to slip."

He testified that:

"The closer you get to the collar the better it is, as they most always slip some; and for that reason it is better to tie as close to the collar as you can."

Plaintiff testified further:

"At the time this accident happened it had been raining—everything was wet and slippery. There is always an opening in the center of the roof of the derrick. Of course, directly under the roof would not much water fall. The roof came to a peak, like this (illustrating), about 3 or 3½ feet opening clear across the derrick the full width of the rig from front to back. The roof covers each side; leaves the center open. * * * I didn't have anything to say about how the hoisting of this pipe and the removing of the spear was to be done. All told, I had worked in and around oil well derricks approximately 5 or 6 months. No similar state of circumstances arose in my experience during that time. It was the first time that I ever had exactly that kind of work to do, and it became necessary to remove a joint of casing out of the well in order to remove the spear. I personally tied the knot by means of which that particular pipe was hoisted. I tied a timber hitch. (Witness illustrates.) I tied a safe knot; I tied it in the usual manner. I had been experienced in tying knots of that kind ever since I had been working in the oil business. The tying of that knot is a frequent occurrence; use those knots every day. I could not say how high that pipe was hoisted by Mr. Mellen, because it went up where there was no light. It was none of my business to pay any attention to that. * * * There were no lights above the roof. The roof is about 20 feet high above the floor, I judge. * * * During the daytime or daylight I could have seen the position of the pipe, and the man who hoisted it could see; not after night. He could in the daytime by stepping out just a little. He could still hold the throttle and look up to the top of the derrick."

On cross-examination he testified that he had worked there for 4 months and was fit for the work he was expected to do, although he "was not what you call an experienced man in particular"; that "the string of tools would be about 40 feet from where the cable joins the rope socket down to the bottom of the spear." A working model of a derrick in operation was brought into court by defendant and used in the examination of witnesses. Plaintiff was called upon to and did illustrate by this model with much particularly how he and Mellen conducted the work before and up to the time of the accident. Not having the model before us, we are deprived to considerable extent of the advantage enjoyed by the jury. There was testimony of several witnesses to the effect that it would have been the proper thing to do, and safer, to have hoisted the pipe with the elevators. Plaintiff testified:

"The elevators which I had been using when I broke the pipe [by "broke" we understand is meant unscrewing it] were set aside on the derrick floor. The elevator block was hanging somewhere in the derrick. I got that down far enough to hook the rope into it; then I pulled the pipe up in the derrick. After I hooked one end of the rope to the hook, one end was already on the casing. I tied the rope to the casing—that is the timber hitch I refer to in my testimony."

He then described how he hoisted the tools high enough to get at the spear which was at the lower end—

"high enough to unscrew it. The next step was to take the spear off. * * * When I was proceeding to unscrew the spear there, the joint of pipe that was held in the air dropped. The rope that held it did not break; the rope did not break loose from the hook; the rope remained aloft and the pipe came down. * * * Mellen was presumably at the throttle during the lifting of the pipe. * * * I knew my duties and went ahead with the performance of them; Mellen knew his duties and went ahead with the performance of his."

On redirect he testified:

"I mean by saying I knew my duties, as I testified a moment ago, that I knew my duties as tool dresser; that is, when I was told to do anything I knew how to go around and do it. * * * I don't know of my own knowledge that the pipe slipped through the knot. I know by what Mellen said afterwards. If I remember right, I asked before I tied this rope around there if we should not use the elevators—something to that effect. I did not have any particular reason for that, only I just took it that that would be the best way in doing it. He told me to use the rope."

On recross:

"Q. Did Mellen give you any directions about the tying of that knot, or any advice or any suggestions or anything, or did you know? A. I knew what knot to use."

His attention was called to testimony he had given, as we understand, in a deposition:

"Q. Did the pipe go clear down, or was it stopped by the piece of rope with the eye in it, which was fastened to it? A. It dropped through the knot. Q. It did not break the rope, then? A. No, sir. Q. But it slipped down there through the knot which you had tied around it and came through it? A. Yes, sir. Q. How did you ascertain that? A. Because it could not possibly happen without—that is, it could not have slipped through the knot without the pipe was raised and the weight was taken off the pipe to let the knot become slack. Q. How did you know that the knot was slack? A. The pipe could not have slipped through it without it did. Q. Could not the rope break? A. The rope did not break. Q. Did the rope remain hanging on the block hook? A. Yes, sir. Q. So that your theory of the manner in which the accident happened is that the tools were hoisted in such a way that they lifted the pipe enough to shake the rope loose from it sufficiently to let it drop down through the knot? A. Yes, sir. Q. You believe that is the way the accident happened? A. Yes, sir."

Expert witnesses were called by plaintiff to explain what they regarded as the proper and safe way to remove a spear from the tools under circumstances such as existed in the present case. Witness T. Phillips, a driller of many years' experience, testified:

"I was running the opposite tower the day Mr. Arundell was injured. There are two towers—the morning tower (from noon to midnight) and the afternoon tower (from midnight to noon.) * * * Assuming that the top joint was crimped, so that the spear would not pass through it; and assuming that I wanted to remove the spear from the lower end of the tools, the only way to go about it is to bring that spear up and take it off. I would take off the top joint of pipe and take it off. I would hoist it that high, probably (demonstrates with model). I would only hoist it above the floor here high enough so that I could break this joint. About there is where I would put the casing (demonstrating). I would suspend the casing about at that point, with the brake on the calf wheel; it would not be over 3 or 4 feet. * * * I would break it and take the spear off, then let the casing down and pull the tools out through it, * * * and after you get your tools out there is nothing in the way of putting the pipe anywhere you want to. I would take the elevator rather than use a 1-inch manilla rope to hoist it with. I think it would be more safe; with that rope there is a chance of slipping. Where the elevators are fastened onto the casing there is not much chance in the matter. If I merely hoisted it up that distance, there is a chance of the rope slipping; there is always a chance if the rope is wet; there is a chance for it to slip. It was raining that night, it had been raining when I went off tower. I don't think it is safe to hoist that pipe a greater distance than that under any circumstances—not with a hitch on, because, you see, if that rope is wet there is a chance for it to slip—anything loosens it up it is liable to slip through and you once loosen it and it won't take hold again. It would not be apt to slip without anything interfering with it, if it was properly tied. There would have to be something to interfere with it, if it was drawn up by a knot properly tied. * * * Up that high it is pretty close to the center of the derrick or to the pipe. Of course, there is a chance for it to swing over and catch."

Given the circumstances in this case of the pipe hoisted up toward the top of the derrick, and that the tools were hoisted out of the well so as to reach the spear to take it off, and in attempting to take it off the pipe fell, he testified:

"I would say that there is only one chance to cause the pipe to fall. If the knot was properly tied, the only chance would be catching the tools onto this pipe and raising it up and lifting the weight off the rope. The tools were approximately 45 feet in length. A pipe being hoisted in that manner, assuming it to be a 14-foot pipe with a rope, say 8 or 10 feet, that would have to get very near to the top to clear it from the tools."

Referring to the manner the pipe was hoisted and its height in the derrick, he testified:

"I should think it would be carelessness in a man to hoist it up where it was."

Other witnesses expressed similar opinion, though one or more testified that the upper joint of pipe should be unscrewed and drawn up a few feet above the floor of the derrick—3 or 4 feet—and the tools then drawn up through the pipe and the spear taken off at this opening in the pipe. The tools could then be drawn up through the pipe and disposed of, and the pipe screwed on again and let down into its place, or laid aside if faulty. But all agreed that the pipe need not and should not be raised but a few feet above the floor.

Witness Cox testified:

"If I should hoist it [the pipe] up that way, and then afterwards hoisted the tools up so as to get at the spear, assuming that it was dark and I could [not] see any distance above the top of the roof there, I would not really know when I had that pipe in a safe place—I suppose it would be guesswork. I would not guess at it; I would not pull it up there; if I did, I would use the elevators. If I did pull it up with a rope, it is liable to fall—to come in contact with some part of the rig that you could not see, or something, and the rope might slip. If you hoisted the tools in order to get at that, in order to get at the spear, assuming the tools were about 40 feet in length, the rope socket would not likely pass through the pipe without catching on the bottom of the pipe. If the pipe was tied up by means of a rope—a sling—there would not be much chance to pull it up without hitting the bottom of the pipe. The pipe would not hang perpendicular, in my opinion; the tools would probably catch on the side of it. The chances are that would have an effect on the knot or rope, it would loosen up your knot; if your rope was wet or stiff, or a new rope, it would give you slack on your rope."

Witness Nangle, having explained the process of taking off the spear and removing the tools under the circumstances here, testified:

"I would raise the joint by means of an elevator. It is safer. I would not raise that joint of pipe above the roof. I would not consider it safe to do that."

Witness Hutchings testified:

"I would not think it was equally safe to hoist that pipe way up to the top of the derrick out of the reach of the tools and then hoist the tools—not in my experience I would not."

Speaking of the rope as attached in the present case and the pipe hoisted up as described, he testified:

"It would not slip unless the tools caught it and raised it up and loosened the hitch. The timber hitch will hold the pipe safely, I suppose, if there is not anything to interfere with it. * * * You see the tools are liable to catch on this joint here (indicating on model), and raise it up, and it will unhook the rope up there, if he was using a rope—raises that joint (indicating); it would not be apt to unhook if he used the elevator. (Witness demonstrates pulling tools up, showing how they would catch on the pipe.) If the pipe was lifted in that manner, it would loosen timber hitch. * * * This pipe is bound to hang out of the perpendicular. The tools would catch on the bottom of the pipe and raise that up, and it will loosen that knot; then, when they drop back, of course, it will slip—bound to slip. If this rope was a 1-inch manilla rope, and wet at the time, it would make a lot of difference on the holding qualities of the rope; it would be stiff, would not draw down tight; you could not make that knot as safe, it would not draw down as hard on the pipe, and would be more easily loosened, if anything raised the pipe and slackened the pull on the rope. If it was a manilla rope, and not a cotton rope, it would make a lot of difference—it is stiffer and won't draw down like this one. (Referring to sample piece of cotton rope in the court room.)"

Witness McManus testified:

"I would not lift a pipe to the top of a derrick by means of a rope tied in a timber hitch. I would consider it careless on the part of a man who did that, as long as he had an elevator there to handle it."

Witness Harry Arundell testified:

"Q. If, under the circumstances just stated, the driller hoisted the pipe to a great distance up in the derrick, up near the top, would you consider that a safe manner of proceeding or not? A. I would consider it dangerous to hoist anything to the top of the derrick by a rope, unless great care is taken. There would be danger of getting tangled up and falling, the knot slipping or becoming untied."

The height of the derrick is not certainly given by any witness. Witness Phillips thought is 82 feet; witness Harry Arundell stated that the standard derrick was 82 to 84 feet from below the crown block to the ground. "The bottom of the casing block, the hook, would be about 10 feet under the crown; that would be about 72 feet up." Witness Phillips thought the tools were about 45 feet long.

[2, 3] Expert witnesses called by defendant testified that a timber hitch, if properly tied, as the evidence showed was the case here, would not slip, even though interfered with, while holding up a pipe, for example, by the tools when elevated. But on this point the evidence is decidedly conflicting, as will be seen from the testimony introduced by plaintiff. There was sufficient evidence to justify the jury in finding that Mellen, who, for the time, represented the authority and responsibility of defendant, was guilty of negligence in raising the pipe so far above the roof of the derrick that the rope by which it was held suspended could not be seen, and leaving the pipe thus suspended at a height where the tools when elevated would interfere with it. Mellen was not at all certain to what height he lifted the pipe. He testified that all he had to go by was the lines; that he could not say how high he hoisted it. "I figured on how much line I had. I went by the coils on the shaft. * * * I figured on hoisting it to the blocks at the top of the derrick—probably 40 feet." In view of the testimony that it was not necessary to take the obvious risk of hoisting the pipe into a space of darkness and that in taking this unnecessary course care was not observed to make sure that the tools when elevated would not interfere with it, and that, if this happened, it was almost certain that the knot would become loosened and the pipe slip through it, the jury might well have inferred the negligence of defendant to have been the proximate cause of the accident.

The principles enunciated in the cases cited by defendant, that negligence will not be presumed merely from injury shown, or from facts unexplained that an accident has occurred, and that the burden of proof was on plaintiff to show defendant's negligence, need not be gainsaid. But the law does not require in all cases direct evidence of a fact in dispute. The law recognizes the force of indirect evidence which tends to establish such fact by proving another which, though not in itself conclusive, affords an inference or presumption of the existence of the fact in dispute. Code Civ. Proc. § 1832. An inference is a deduction which the reason of a jury makes from the facts proved (Id. § 1958); but an inference must be founded upon fact legally proved (Id. § 1960). The testimony showed that Mellen adopted a plan of handling the tools and pipe, which the witnesses testified was unsafe, by hoisting the pipe into a dark space where the timber knot by which it was held could not be seen, or any tendency of its slipping be observed, and by not using the elevators which would have held the pipe in perfect security. This was his initial act of negligence, and it was followed by another step, testified to as unsafe, which was to elevate the tools without being assured that they would not interfere with the pipe, knowing, as he must be presumed to have known as a competent driller, that such interference might loosen the knot holding the pipe and permit the pipe to slip through.

One or more of defendant's witnesses testified, and it is urged in argument, that the danger was not increased by the height to which the pipe was hoisted, for had it been raised but 5 or 6 feet and had fallen it would as surely have injured plaintiff. This suggestion ignores the fact that, had the pipe been raised but a few feet from the floor, both plaintiff and Mellen could have observed any tendency of the pipe to slip, and, besides, there would in that case have been no tools hovering around the pipe and endangering the security of the knot in the rope. Defendant contends that the testimony shows a clear space between the tools and the lower end of the pipe, and hence the impossibility of the tools having had anything to do with the pipe's slipping through the rope. This contention is grounded on the assumption that Mellen hoisted the pipe to the top of the derrick, a fact not deducible from Mellen's testimony, the only witness who had any knowledge on the subject. The estimates given of the inside height of the derrick, the length of the tools and pipe, and the pieces of rope and the blocks used on each would leave but a small, if any, margin of space between the tools and pipe. Mellen said he hoisted the pipe probably 40 feet; again, that he did not know how high he hoisted it; again, that it was a few feet from the top; again, that he had only the lines to go by, or the coils on the shaft; but he did not say he counted the coils or examined his line. If he hoisted the pipe only 40 feet, it would not have cleared the tools, for they were 45 feet long, as Phillips testified. And this witness, who worked on this same derrick as driller, testified that the pipe "would have to get very near to the top to clear it from the tools." Defendant further suggests that the evidence is as consistent with the theory that the rope was carelessly tied by plaintiff as that the pipe was raised and the rope loosened by the tools. This suggestion derives no force from the testimony, for both plaintiff and Mellen testified that plaintiff tied a proper timber hitch, and the testimony of many witnesses was that a timber hitch properly tied is safe, and not likely to loosen its grip. We think the evidence was fairly responsive to the issues presented by the complaint and answer, and that there was sufficient evidence to justify the jury in attributing the injury to defendant's negligence.

[4, 5] It is contended that the injury to plaintiff was caused by an assumed risk. In support of this contention it is claimed that plaintiff "had the same opportunity of observing the situation as Mellen had"; that "he was in as good a position as Mellen to notice the danger and risk of the business"; that it is not charged that the appliances furnished were not adequate and the place a safe one in which to work or that Mellen was an unskillful driller. Under these circumstances it is urged that plaintiff's injury "was the result of an accident happening in the ordinary course of the business in which he was employed, and the risk of which he assumed as one of the hazards of his employment." The rule is relied on as stated by Labatt:

"That a servant assumes all the ordinary risks which are incidental to his employment," and that, "unless the plaintiff can adduce evidence which tends fairly to show that the injured person, by reason of his want of experience or his tender years, was not chargeable with that comprehension of the risk which, in the absence of such evidence, he is presumed to have possessed." 1 Labatt on Master and Servant, p. 2102.

Conceding the correctness of the rule, as it existed when the accident happened, that "the servant assumes all the ordinary risks which are incidental to his employment," the question is: What is meant by the term "ordinary risks"? It certainly is not meant that the servant assumes all risks of injury that may result in the ordinary course of his employment, for the master, under such a rule, would never be held liable. We take it the ordinary risks which the servant assumes are such as may not be avoided by the exercise of reasonable care by the master, or by his servant who is superior to the injured servant. It cannot be said that plaintiff and Mellen stood upon an equal footing, or that plaintiff's opportunities of observing what Mellen was doing and how he was doing it were equal. Plaintiff could not know, nor could he be presumed to have anticipated, the possibility or probability of Mellen's not having hoisted the pipe sufficiently far to clear the tools. Plaintiff was in no situation to observe what Mellen was doing or how he was doing it. He was at his post of duty, endeavoring to "break" the spear, ignorant of his position of danger caused by Mellen's carelessness and negligence. By the exercise of ordinary care on Mellen's part the accident would not have happened.

[6] Appellant contends that plaintiff tied the timber hitch, raised the tools, and moved the tools after they were raised, and hence, if the tools caused the rope on the casing to be loosened, it was caused by plaintiff's negligence and he cannot recover. The testimony was that Mellen hoisted the pipe to a place above the roof and set his brake. Under Mellen's orders, and with his assistance, plaintiff hoisted the tools high enough above the floor to allow him and Mellen to remove the spear. Mellen testified:

"I pulled the tools up and prepared to take the spear out. * * * We pulled the tools up to the joint in the pipe, about even with the floor."

What plaintiff did in the matter was done under Mellen's orders, with his personal assistance, and without any knowledge or comprehension of the dangerous position of the pipe; and it seems to us the jury were justified in finding that he acted as a reasonably prudent and cautious man would have acted under the circumstances. The accident did not happen by reason of hoisting the tools too far—they were raised only sufficiently high to admit of removing the spear. The cause of the accident, as the evidence warranted the jury in finding, was that the pipe was not hoisted high enough. Of course, it was incumbent upon plaintiff to exercise his senses and reasoning faculties, and whether he did so in the present case was to be determined by the jury, taking into account all the attending circumstances. The accident cannot be traced to any act of plaintiff which was not performed in the line of his duty or directly ordered to be done by his superior. We do not think defendant sustained the burden of proving contributory negligence of plaintiff as the cause of his injury.

[7] The point urged that plaintiff "was not injured by the negligent act of an employé of defendant having the right to direct and control his services," we think, cannot be maintained. Section 1970 of the Civil Code provides that:

The "employer shall be liable for such injury when the same results from the wrongful act, neglect or default * * * of a person employed by such employer having the right to control or direct the services of such employé injured."

It seems to us the testimony of both plaintiff and defendant showed very clearly that the work in and around an oil well derrick is under the direct control of the driller. In the absence of the superintendent his authority is supreme. It is by virtue of this authority given by custom to the driller that he has the right to exercise it. One of defendant's witnesses, himself president of vice president of several oil companies, testified:

"In removing a pipe from the well, as in this case, in determining what was to be done with the top joint of casing, the driller would tell the tool dresser what they were going to do and that if the tool dresser should say, 'No, I don't think that should be done,' the superintendent on the lease would get another tool dresser, if I was the driller."

We have called attention in the earlier part of this opinion, to sufficient testimony to show that Mellen had the right, and exercised it, to direct plaintiff in his work.

[8] Error is claimed in the court's not allowing defendant to prove by witness Munzer the condition of the weather in Kern county at the time of the accident. It had been shown by plaintiff that it was raining the night of the accident, and the purpose of the offered evidence was not so much to dispute a fact of no great importance in the case as it was "in determining which party spoke the truth." The report offered was made up by the Kern County Land Company at Bakersfield from reports sent in by superintendents of farms in various parts of the county. These reports were telephoned to the telephone operator in the office; he reported them to the stenographer, and she "makes the proper record of it." It was a purported copy of this record that was offered. Aside from its nonofficial and hearsay character, the reports from the Kern County Land Company's farms would not disprove that it rained at the oil well in question. The ruling was not error.

[9] Error is claimed in giving the following instruction:

"Presumptive or circumstantial evidence is admissible in civil cases. When direct evidence cannot be produced, minds will form their judgments on circumstances. So in this case it is not necessary that the plaintiff produce direct evidence as to what caused the casing, mentioned in this case, to fall, if any casing did fall; but such cause may be inferred from all of the circumstances in the case."

It is contended that:

"A jury is not permitted to infer the negligence of a defendant from circumstances, unless they are strong enough and convincing enough to exclude every other reasonable hypothesis than that of negligence."

We have already referred to the law that the fact of negligence may be proved by indirect as well as by direct evidence. Jones v. Leonardt, 10 Cal. App. 284, 101 Pac. 811. Section 1832, Code Civ. Proc. Negligence, like any other fact, may be inferred from a preponderance of the evidence whether it be circumstantial or direct, and plaintiff is not required to prove his case beyond a reasonable doubt. The instruction, fairly considered, merely told the jury that they were at liberty to determine the question of defendant's negligence from evidence other than direct proof of the cause of the accident.

[10] The court refused the instruction, requested by defendant, to the effect that the jury should not be governed by sympathy, but by the evidence, and that in considering the evidence the jury should not be influenced by the fact that plaintiff is a laboring man and defendant a corporation. A jury sworn to try the case and a true verdict rendered upon the evidence must be presumed to have obeyed their oath, and unless it should appear that they were influenced by sympathy or prejudice, and not by the evidence, we must presume that their verdict was based upon the evidence. Nothing in the record tends to show that the jury acted out of sympathy for plaintiff or through prejudice against defendant.

[11, 12] An instruction asked by defendant was refused in which the jury were told that plaintiff could not recover "unless they find he has a preponderance of evidence supporting the following propositions: First, that the plaintiff was not at the time of the accident guilty of any failure to exercise ordinary care for his own safety which approximately contributed to his injury; second, that the defendant was guilty of negligence in the manner charged in the complaint; third, that such negligence was the proximate or direct cause of the plaintiff's injuries in question"—and that if plaintiff has failed to sustain by evidence these propositions or any one of them he cannot recover. The first subdivision of this instruction is in effect an instruction that the burden is upon plaintiff to show by a preponderance of the evidence that he was not guilty of contributory negligence; for one who fails to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, if he is injured in consequence thereof, certainly contributes thereto. But this issue was presented by defendant, and upon it rested the burden of establishing it by a preponderance of evidence, and not upon plaintiff to prove the negative of that issue. That it was necessary for plaintiff to show that defendant was guilty of the negligence charged, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries, is undoubtedly true. Defendant was entitled to these instructions, and plaintiff claims they were elsewhere given in the charge, which is not denied, but defendant contends that:

"If counsel wished these instructions to be considered they should have incorporated them in the record. Not having done so they cannot now rely upon them to show no error was committed by the refusal of the lower court to give the instructions."

The transcript does not purport to contain all the instructions, and it is apparent that it does not. Error must be shown, and if equivalent instructions, though not in the same language, were given no error was committed. If no such instructions were given, it was defendant's duty so to show. We have seen that the evidence was sufficient to justify the jury in finding the fact that defendant was guilty of negligence as charged and as the issues were tried, and that such negligence was the proximate or direct cause of plaintiff's injuries. Under such circumstances defendant was not prejudiced by the ruling of the court.

[13, 14] Instructions, given by the court, numbered 12 and 15, are criticized for the reason that by No. 12 "the jury were told that dangerous appliances or a danger in the work did not bar the right of the plaintiff to recover unless the employé 'fully understood, comprehended and appreciated' the danger," and that in No. 15 the instruction "assumes the existence of facts not in evidence." Instruction numbered 12 is the statement of the law as found in section 1970 of the Civil Code, and read in its entirety is not error, and if not applicable, we cannot see that it could have been prejudicial. Instruction numbered 15 appears to us to have been drawn with strict adherence to evidence admitted at the trial. It does not assume the existence of any facts. It stated: "If you believe from evidence that," etc.

We have given the case such attention as its importance seems to have demanded, and, finding no prejudicial error in the record, the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; ELLISON, Judge pro tem.

Ex parte CENCININO. (Cr. 364.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 9, 1916.)

1. FISH $\hookrightarrow$ 8—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS—POLICE POWER—"MAY."

Const. art. 4, § 25½ (see St. 1901, p. 948), declares that the Legislature may provide for the division of the state into fish and game districts, and enact laws for the protection of fish and game, and St. 1911, p. 425, enacted in pursuance thereof and dividing the state into six fish and game districts, was repealed by St. 1915, p. 589, dividing the state into 29 fish and game districts, including part of a county in districts 8 and 9. Const. art. 11, § 11, grants to counties and townships the right to enforce local and police regulations not in conflict with general laws. Pen. Code, § 628f, enacted by St. 1915, p. 112, makes the shipment, offer for shipment, or receipt for shipment of any species of crab taken in districts 8 or 9 a misdemeanor. An ordinance of a county board of supervisors made it unlawful to ship or transport any crabs or clams taken within the county to points outside of the county punishable as a misdemeanor. Held, that the word "may" in article 4, § 25½, was not merely permissive but mandatory, and used in the sense of "shall" or "must"; that the section gave the Legislature exclusive power over the fish and game of the state and took from counties, etc., any right which they might have had under article 11, § 11, so that the ordinance was void, and one arrested for a violation thereof would be discharged.

Petition by Charles Cencinino for a writ of habeas corpus directed against the sheriff of Humboldt county. Petitioner discharged.

J. J. Cairns, of Eureka, and Leon E. Prescott, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

HART, J. [1, 2] The petition alleges that the petitioner is illegally held in restraint of his personal liberty by the sheriff of Humboldt county, and the return of that officer shows that he detains and is detaining the petitioner in custody under the authority of a warrant of arrest issued out of the justice's court of Trinidad township, said county, upon a complaint charging the petitioner with the violation of the provisions of Ordinance No. 118, passed by the board of supervisors of Humboldt county on the 16th day of November, 1912, and which, by virtue of a provision therein contained, went into effect on the 3d day of December, 1912.

Said ordinance reads in part as follows:

Section I. It shall be unlawful at any time to offer for shipment, ship, transport or receive for shipment or transportation from the county of Humboldt, state of California, to any place outside of said county of Humboldt, state of California, any crabs caught in or taken from any of the waters within the limits of the said county of Humboldt, state of California.

"Section II. It shall be unlawful at any time to offer for shipment, ship, transport or receive for shipment or transportation from the county of Humboldt, state of California, to any place outside of said county of Humboldt, state of California, any clams of any kind or character produced or taken from any ground, waters, or territory within the limits of said county of Humboldt, state of California.

"Section III. Every person who shall violate any of the provisions of this ordinance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars or by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months or by both such fine and imprisonment."

The ordinance declares that the true intent and purpose thereof is "solely to secure the better protection of the crabs and clams in the public waters and grounds within the county of Humboldt, state of California, and not for the regulation of the business of dealing in crabs and clams."

The petitioner, in support of his claim that his restraint is illegal, makes this point: That, by the adoption, in the year 1902, of section 25½ of article 4 of the Constitution (see Stat. 1901, p. 948), the people expressly vested in the Legislature of the state the sole and exclusive power over and control of legislation relating to the fish and game of the state. Manifestly, the effect of that construction of said provision is to exclude the legislative bodies of local political subdivisions of the state from any power or right to legislate with respect to those subjects. If this be a sound position, it follows, of course, that the ordinance whose provisions the petitioner has been charged with violating relates to a subject not within the legislative competence of the board of supervisors of Humboldt county, is therefore void, and, as a necessary consequence, under or upon the purported ordinance no complaint stating a public offense can be formulated.

The section of the Constitution in question reads as follows:

"The Legislature may provide for the division of the state into fish and game districts, and may enact such laws for the protection of fish and game as it may deem appropriate to the respective districts."

The Legislature of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 425), in pursuance of the authority vested in it by that provision of the Constitution, passed an act whereby it divided the state into six fish and game districts. By said act the first district was made to embrace, among several other counties, the county of Humboldt. At its session in the year 1915, however (Stats. 1915, p. 589), the Legislature repealed said act and passed in lieu thereof another act, by the provisions of which the state was divided into 29 fish and game districts. By this law that part of Humboldt county constituting Humboldt Bay was placed in districts Nos. 8 and 9. At the same session, the Legislature enacted section 628f the Penal Code (Stats. 1915, p. 112), which, among other provisions, contains an inhibition, on pain of punishment as for a misdemeanor, the shipment or offer for shipment or receipt for shipment or transportation any species of crab taken in fish and game districts 8 and 9.

The ordinance under which the petitioner has been proceeded against, includes, in its inhibitions and penalty, all of Humboldt county, covering, therefore, those portions of Humboldt Bay which form parts of fish and game districts 8 and 9.

The authority vested in the Legislature by section 25½ of article 4 of the Constitution to divide the state into districts for the purposes of legislation affecting fish and game was undoubtedly inspired by the fact, based upon experience in that direction, that, owing to the varied conditions with respect to fish and game existing in different parts of the state, no uniform legislation justly applicable and appropriate to the whole state and the diversified conditions therein existing as to game and fish was practicable or feasible. Regulations necessary and appropriate in one part of the state might be wholly unnecessary and, indeed, unjust, and therefore inappropriate in other parts thereof. This is the only rational explanation of the scheme with respect to the matter of taking fish out of the waters of the state and hunting for game contemplated by the above provision of the Constitution. And experience has demonstrated the necessity and efficacy of that scheme. Prior to the adoption of that amendment, it was within the competence of the boards of supervisors of the several counties to regulate the matter of taking and hunting fish and game within their respective territorial jurisdictions. These local regulations were often harsh and unjust and sometimes inadequate to the proper protection of fish and game, the object of all such legislation merely being to provide against their ultimate extinction, which would inevitably result from an absence of proper legal restraint upon their destruction or, in other words, to provide ample opportunity for their propagation in a degree commensurate with their nature in that respect. And to accomplish this highly important end the people finally conceived that the whole subject could be the better and more justly treated by legislation wholly in the control of the state Legislature and such as is authorized by the provision of the Constitution above quoted herein. So, in considering said provision, keeping in mind the reasons thus suggested as the animating cause of the adoption thereof, and at the same time keeping in view the nature or character of the power with which the Legislature is thus invested, the conclusion seems to be inevitable that, by said provision, it was intended, as the petitioner contends is true, to clothe the state Legislature with sole and exclusive control and power, so far as legislation is concerned, over the fish and game of the state, and therefore to take from local political subdivisions of the state any right which they might have had, prior to the adoption of said provision of the Constitution, legislatively to deal with or regulate the matter of pursuing fish and game. Therefore our opinion is that the language of section 25½ is mandatory and not merely permissive, as the use of the auxiliary verb "may" as among the operative words of the provision might, upon first blush, imply.

The word "may," as used in a statute or Constitution, is often interpreted to mean "shall" or "must". Such interpretation always depends largely, if not altogether, on the object sought to be accomplished by the law in which that word is used. It seems to be the uniform rule that, where the purpose of the law is to clothe public officers with power to be exercised for the benefit of third persons, or for the public at large—that is, where the public interest or private right requires that the thing should be done—then the language, though permissive in form, is peremptory. As was said by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Supervisors v. United States, 4 Wall. 436, 18 L. Ed. 419, construing a statute of the state of Illinois similarly phrased to the provision in question here:

“What they (public officers) are empowered to do for a third person, the law requires shall be done. The power is given, not for their benefit, but for his. * * * It is given as a remedy to those entitled to invoke its aid.”

See, also, Hayes v. County of Los Angeles, 99 Cal. 74, 33 Pac. 766.

But the provision of the Constitution in question has been given by our own courts a construction in accord with the views above expressed. Ex parte Prindle, 7 Cal. Unrep. 223, 94 Pac. 871. In that case, which was decided by the District Court of Appeal of the Second District, so much is said which has a direct bearing upon the question before us here that it would extend this opinion to an unreasonable length to attempt to reproduce herein all that is contained therein which is forcibly pertinent to this case. It will suffice to say that the court in that case held that the provision of the Constitution under consideration is mandatory, notwithstanding the employment of the word “may” therein.

In the case of In re Cole, 12 Cal. App. 290, 107 Pac. 581, while not necessary therein to decide the question, this court, nevertheless, in considering the effect of section 25½ of article 4 of the Constitution, strongly intimated that its language and terms were mandatory. The court had under consideration an ordinance of Sonoma county prohibiting the catching of fish in rivers, streams, or sloughs in said county. The ordinance considered in that case was regularly passed by the board of supervisors previous to the adoption into article 4 of the Constitution section 25½, and the court held that, as the ordinance involved a valid act at the time of its enactment, and, as the constitutional provision was prospective and not retroactive in its operation, said provision could not be held, in view of article 22 of the Constitution, to have effected a repeal of said ordinance or impaired its validity in any respect. The court, however, used this significant language:

“The most that could be urged by the petitioners is that the power to regulate the pursuit of fish and game had been taken away from the board of supervisors and given exclusively to the Legislature.”

In considering the question before us, we have not been unmindful of the fact that by section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution, the people have granted to the counties, cities, towns, and townships of the state the right to make and enforce, within their respective limits, “all such local, police, sanitary and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws.” Nor are we antagonistic to the proposition that, although fish and game constitute the property of the people of the state in their collective capacity, the matter of the regulation of the pursuit of fish and game is within the police power (Ex parte Maier, 103 Cal. 476, 37 Pac. 402, 42 Am. St. Rep. 129), and that it would be within the competence of local legislative boards to regulate that matter under the power granted to them by said section 11 of article 11 in the absence of any limitation placed by the people upon the exercise by them of said power and so long as such legislation did not contravene any general law of the state. But, as has been shown, and as is clearly manifest, the power of local boards to regulate, or legislate upon, the subjects of fish and game has been withdrawn by the people by their expression in section 25½ of the Constitution and subsequent to the delegation by them of the power which such local authorities may exercise under section 11 of article 11.

[3] That the people may, at any time, legally withdraw from local authorities the power of police or any portion thereof which they have by their Constitution granted to such authorities, is a proposition far beyond the realm of all debate. The police power, like the right of eminent domain, is an attribute of sovereignty. In this country it resides or inheres in the sovereignty of the states, and sovereignty, which means all the power inherent in a commonwealth, is generally exercised by the state itself, but it is so exercised because only the power has been delegated to it by the people of the state, in whom, primarily, it resides. It therefore follows as a matter of course that the people may delegate or grant that power to any competent authority, to be exercised exclusively or concurrently with some other authority or to a limited extent, with the residue of the power or its ultimate control in some other body or authority, or in the people themselves. In the case of the fish and game of the state, the people have, as seen, withdrawn or taken from counties, cities, and towns whatever power they might have exercised over those subjects by virtue of section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution. This they had the right to do, and in doing it still left to counties, etc., plenary power to make and enforce proper and necessary police regulations upon a variety of subjects coming within the scope and purview of the power of police. It follows that there cannot be justly claimed to exist any inconsistency or repugnancy between section 11 of article 11 and section 25½ of article 4. It is true, as has been suggested, that the Legislature might not have exercised the authority vested in it by section 25½ of article 4, and it is equally true that had it failed to do so, it could not be compelled by any known legal process to legislate upon the subject of fish and game. But this does not mean that the exclusive power to regulate the pursuit of fish and game is not still in that body under that provision of the Constitution, or that counties and cities, etc., may regulate the matter on the failure of the Legislature to exercise the right and power so conferred upon it. It is, under the terms of the constitutional provision, solely for the Legislature to determine when and how the taking of fish and the killing of game shall be regulated, as well as to determine what portions of the state shall be included within fish and game districts and what portions shall be excluded therefrom and not subject to any regulations upon those subjects.

We conclude, from the reasons herein stated, that counties, cities, towns, and townships are no longer authorized to legislate upon or in any manner or degree interfere in the matter of the pursuit of fish and game, that, consequently, Ordinance No. 118, of Humboldt county, under and by virtue of the provisions of which it is sought to prosecute and punish the petitioner, is void, and that his arrest and restraint are therefore illegal.

The petitioner is accordingly discharged.

BRYAN ELEVATOR CO. v. LAW.
(Civ. 1465.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 8, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 5, 1916.)

CONTRACTS — 282 — PERFORMANCE TO SATISFACTION — RIGHT OF PERSON FOR WHOM WORK IS DONE.

Where plaintiff contracted to install, to defendant's satisfaction, elevators in defendant's building, which was done, defendant expressing dissatisfaction only with the controllers, refusing to be satisfied unless Otis controllers were used, and claiming the right to exercise his refusal of the installation knowing that Otis controllers could not be obtained without purchasing Otis machines at great cost, at no time requesting plaintiff to obtain controllers other than the Otis, several of which were obtainable in the open market, removing plaintiff's machines and controllers without previous notice, and installing Otis machines and controllers, defendant's contract did not permit him so to act, and he was liable to plaintiff for the cost of the installation, less only the cost of the Otis controllers, since a stipulation in a contract to perform to the satisfaction of a party calls only for performance satisfactory to a reasonable person.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by the Bryan Elevator Company against Herbert E. Law. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Edgar C. Chapman, of San Francisco, for appellant. Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. In the first count of the complaint plaintiff seeks to recover the sum of $16,000 upon a written contract entered into by plaintiff and defendant, January 20, 1905, for the construction and installation of an elevator plant and service by plaintiff for the Monadnock Building in San Francisco. The second count was for necessary repairs to the elevators, elevator equipments, and elevator hatchways in said building of the alleged value of $4,604.33. The third count is for elevator parts and supplies alleged to have been sold and delivered to defendant by plaintiff, for which defendant agreed to pay the sum of $2,053.10. Plaintiff had judgment on the first count for the sum of $13,375, with interest from May 1, 1908. The findings and judgment on the second and third counts were in favor of defendant.

Both parties appeal from the judgment. Defendant's appeal is presented in this record and plaintiff's appeal on the same transcript is presented in No. 1466 (160 Pac. 174). Defendant also appeals from the order denying his motion for a new trial. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. The issues tried may be understood from the findings of facts by the court:

"II. That thereafter, and on or about the 1st day of September, 1905, the said plaintiff entered upon and commenced the installation of said elevators, and proceeded with said installation as rapidly as the unfinished condition of said building would permit; that on or about the 18th day of April, 1906, and prior to the completion of the installation of said elevators, said building was injured and almost completely destroyed by earthquake and fire; that by reason of the damage suffered by said building, through said earthquake and fire, plaintiff was unable to continue with the performance of its said agreement for a long time thereafter; that as soon as said building was sufficiently repaired to make the work of installation of said elevators possible, the plaintiff continued the work of such installation; that plaintiff at all times in good faith proceeded with the performance of the obligations imposed upon it by said agreement, and furnished the materials and performed the labor required of it by said contract, and honestly and faithfully performed said contract and completed the performance thereof on or about the 1st day of May, 1908, except as regards the controlling devices furnished by said plaintiff on the five passenger elevators which were not satisfactory to defendant and on account of which said defendant declined to accept the same and removed them from the building, and in this behalf the court finds: That said controlling devices did not operate satisfactorily and defendant was justified in rejecting the same and in removing them from said building and putting in other controlling devices. The court also finds that, although said defendant declined to accept the said controlling devices as furnished by plaintiff, and was justified in removing them from said building and in putting in other controlling devices, said plaintiff substantially performed the said contract.

"III. That the agreement hereinabove referred to was completed by said plaintiff on or about the 1st day of May, 1908, except that the defendant was not satisfied with the controllers on the said five passenger elevators and declined to accept the said controllers; that the length of time in completing said agreement by the said plaintiff was no greater than the amount of time said plaintiff was prevented from performing by the neglect of the said defendant in completing said building and by the earthquake and fire above referred to.

"IV. That in all regards, other than as above set forth, the plaintiff duly and faithfully performed all the conditions of said agreement above referred to on its part to be performed according to the terms of said agreement; that said plaintiff completely installed and equipped the elevators referred to in the said agreement in accordance with the plans and specifications attached to said agreement and made a part thereof, with the exception that the said defendant was not satisfied with said passenger elevator controllers or the elevator machines connected therewith, and he declined to accept the same and removed all of said controllers and all of said elevator machines from said building and replaced the same with other elevator controllers and other elevator machines, and installed said last-mentioned controllers and machines in said building; that the reasonable market value of said elevator controllers and elevator machines so installed by said defendant was and is the sum of $15,156. And in this connection the court finds that the reasonable market value of said controllers so installed by defendant was and is the sum of $2,625. But the court finds that defendant was not justified in rejecting the elevator machines so furnished by plaintiff or any of them, and was not justified in installing other elevator machines in place of them, and that said defendant could and did replace said controllers with controllers of a design, workmanship, and efficiency satisfactory to him for the sum of $525 each, or a total sum of $2,625. * * *

"VI. That the sum of $21,375 is the reasonable value of the work done and the materials furnished by plaintiff in installing elevator machines and equipment for the defendant in said Monadnock Building, and the reasonable value of the materials furnished and accepted and the installation work accepted and used by defendant, and that said defendant has paid plaintiff the sum of $8,000 and has suffered damages on account of plaintiff's failure to furnish controlling devices satisfactory to him in the sum of $2,625, and that, after deducting from the contract price the said payment of $8,000 and the sum of $2,625 to indemnify and compensate the defendant for the damages so suffered by him, there is now due, owing, and unpaid from said defendant to said plaintiff the sum of $13,375, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the 1st day of May, 1908. * * *

"And as conclusions of law from the foregoing facts the court finds the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the said defendant for the sum of $13,375, together with interest on said sum from the 1st day of May, 1908, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, amounting to $4,228.72, and for its costs of suit herein expended."

Plaintiff was properly to install, furnishing all the labor and materials therefor, four passenger elevators and one passenger elevator and safe lifter, and to alter the old passenger elevator then in use in the Bishop Building into a freight elevator, and to install two hydraulic ram sidewalk elevators, together with a flash light signal system in accordance with certain plans and specifications made by Meyer & O'Brien, who were the architects of said building and of said work.

So far as this appeal reaches, the only dispute we are to settle relates to the installation of the five passenger elevators. And as to these the objection raised by defendant was to the unsatisfactory operation of the electrical controllers.

On November 5, 1906, defendant wrote plaintiff as follows:

"In conformity with the provisions of our contract for elevators in the Monadnock Building, I advise you that the controlling devices are unsatisfactory and in my judgment inadequate for the requirements, and therefore request that the control be replaced by that used by the Otis Elevator Company."

Plaintiff replied on November 9th, saying:

"We cannot at this time accept a decision as to the controllers in the Monadnock Building, because in no case are those controllers complete and such as the design of the apparatus which we are to give you contemplates. Moreover, as the writer explained to you some time ago, the present controllers are operating under conditions which are in no way a proper test of them, and, further, that the completion of the controllers is delayed purposely by us in order to keep machines in operation until the balance of the plant is ready to run, when the present controllers can be put into the condition which it is intended that they should be. The work on the permanent controllers is progressing as rapidly as circumstances will permit, and when completed and the present controllers finished and put in proper condition you will have no cause for complaint regarding them."

On June 5, 1907, defendant's manager, Mr. Huntington, wrote plaintiff as follows:

"As Mr. Law has already notified you, we wish the controllers on the elevators now in the Monadnock Building changed to the Otis Elevator Company's controller. You may place it first on No. 2 elevator, and we will try it out."

The matter drifted along, the correspondence and the testimony showing that each party attributed to the other party the alleged failure of the controllers to give proper service, until, October 15, 1907, we find that plaintiff wrote defendant as follows:

"Since writing to you yesterday we learn that you are taking our machines out of the Monadnock Building, and to this we make the most emphatic protest. We demand that we be allowed to demonstrate that these engines are all right by having them put entirely in our charge for sufficient time to prove our claims. All we ask of you is to have doors put on the engine room and have both your employés and all outsiders kept out of it. As our contract at the Monadnock Building is not completed, we desire to know from you at once whether we shall go ahead with this final work? Awaiting your immediate reply, we remain."

Defendant replied on October 17th:

"We have no objection to your completing your contract on the Monadnock Building in so far as it relates to the freight elevator in the back of the building and the two hydraulic ram sidewalk elevators."

On November 29, 1907, defendant wrote plaintiff as follows:

"We have taken out the passenger elevators from the Monadnock Building, and they are now in the basement. What disposition do you desire made of them by us?"

On December 3d, plaintiff replied to this letter, stating:

"We have turned the same over to our attorneys."

It does not appear at what date defendant removed the plaintiff's machines, but Mr. Robbins, manager of Otis Elevator Company, testified:

That the first bill rendered by his company was dated October 12, 1907, "and that was not made until after the Otis machines were put in the building—after they were put in, the machines which they substituted were removed. I don't just remember the date when that was done."

As we understand the evidence, the Otis machines were taken to the building about October 12, 1907, the plaintiff's controllers and machines were then removed from their settings, and the Otis machines and controllers put in their place.

Defendant states in his brief:

"The court found that the real defect in the elevator plant was in the controller, and we think it was justified in reaching this conclusion."

The correspondence as well as the testimony shows that the construction of the elevators, the machinery, and appliances used in operating the plant, except the controllers, was entirely satisfactory to defendant. The contract did not specify any particular type of controller, though doubtless plaintiff contemplated putting in the one it manufactured. The provision of the contract was:

"The contractor agrees that the elevator service going by the machines shall be continuous, and that the control of the car shall be positive, and the operation of elevators shall give satisfaction in every particular. In the event that the elevator machine or the controlling device proves unsatisfactory or inadequate to requirements, the contractor shall replace the machinery or controlling device with other machinery and control satisfactory to the owner. In the event of any dispute of the efficiency of any part of the elevator machinery or control, the decision of the owner is to be final and conclusive."

It appeared from the testimony that the controller was so far independent in its construction that a controller of the Otis or any other design than the Bryan controller could be substituted, and the engines and other machinery connected with and required in operating the completed elevator remain undisturbed. The court found and the evidence was that the Otis controllers had a value each of $525, and the five installed $2,625.

The court found that the reasonable value of all the work done and materials furnished by plaintiff in installing elevators and equipment "and the reasonable value of the materials furnished and accepted and the installation work accepted and used by defendant" was $21,375, from which the court deducted the payment of $8,000 and the value of the five Otis controllers, $2,625, leaving due plaintiff $13,375.

The portion of the findings to which defendant now objects is the following:

"That defendant was not justified in rejecting the elevator machines so furnished by plaintiff or any part of them, and was not justified in installing other elevator machines in place of them, and that said defendant could and did replace said controllers with controllers of a design, workmanship, and efficiency satisfactory to him, for the sum of $525 each, or a total sum of $2,625."

Defendant's position is thus stated in his opening brief:

"These findings which we have just quoted cannot be harmonized in any way; for, if under the evidence defendant was justified in rejecting the controllers, he was equally justified in rejecting the machines, not because the machines were defective in any particular, but because it was impossible to buy any controllers that could be used with these machines. The only proper controllers on the market were those manufactured by the Otis Elevator Company, and these could not be had, as we have pointed out, without the purchase of the Otis Elevator machines. It follows, therefore, that as Mr. Law was compelled to pay $15,156.00 for the Otis elevator controllers and machines that he is entitled to deduct that amount from the contract price."

The testimony was that the Otis Elevator Company would not sell its controllers to plaintiff or to defendant without also selling its machines to go with them. Witness Greenbaum, a mechanical engineer and president of plaintiff company at the time the contract was made and up to 1909, was asked whether there were high-speed controllers in the market other than the Otis controller, and answered:

"I believe one particularly was the Cutler-Hammer. Another was the one sold by the Scheurman people, from whom I did buy one. There were quite a number of different style high-speed controllers at that time. There was a firm in Baltimore whose name I can't remember at the present time; and one in Chicago, and these firms made a specialty of making controllers and nothing else. They were not elevator men at all in any sense of the word. They simply make controller machinery, and in that machinery they make elevator controllers. Q. And they would send those controls to anybody who made application? A. Yes, sir."

On cross-examination he testified that these controllers were all manufactured in the East, and the manufacturers had no agency here, that he did not "tell Mr. Law anything about them," and that he did not believe them any better controls than his own.

The testimony was that during all the time, and up to the day it learned its machines were being removed, plaintiff was endeavoring to bring its elevators up to a standard of efficiency which would be reasonably satisfactory to defendant, and during all this time there was a constant controversy between the parties as to the way the elevators were being run by defendant's employés, plaintiff complaining that they were careless and inattentive to their duties in not properly caring for the machinery and in not properly operating the elevators, defendant complaining that this was not true and pointing out specific defects. And, finally, without previous notice of his intention so to do, defendant removed the machines and controllers and substituted Otis machines and controllers, and notified plaintiff to take its property away, which plaintiff did, under an agreement that in doing so the rights of neither party should be prejudiced. Witness

Greenbaum testified on cross-examination as follows:

"Q. What became of the machines after they were taken out? A. They were taken across the bay and stored. Q. Taken across the bay by yourself? A. We took them over there. Q. Where did you store them? A. In the Van Emon elevator plant. Q. What use was made of them subsequently? A. I junked them. Q. Was there anything the matter with the machinery? A. No; not that I know of. Q. Then why was they junked? A. Because they were secondhand machines, and you can't sell secondhand machines, particularly what you call high-speed secondhand machines, to be installed in the building again. People won't take them."

He testified that the reasonable value of the materials put in by plaintiff and removed from the building by defendant was $10,500,—that is, the value of the controllers and engines and ropes or cables; "$13,500 was the reasonable value of the work we furnished and left in the building at the time our machines were taken out, and that material and that construction were used by Mr. Law when he put in the new machines."

The inquiry seems to us to be narrowed to the question: Was defendant justified in substituting entirely new machines and controllers, entailing a loss to plaintiff of the machines and controllers installed by it? The court made no specific finding of the value of these machines and controllers, but it found the value of all the work done and machinery furnished to be $21,375, from which it deducted the payment made, $8,000, and the value of the controllers furnished by defendant, $2,625. The court found that defendant was justified in putting in the Otis controller, but, in view of the testimony that a controller of other design could have been put in without removing plaintiff's machines, it found that the cost of these controllers, $525 each, was the limit of defendant's damage. And this narrows the inquiry still further to the single question: Was the plaintiff properly chargeable also with the cost of the Otis machines, which was $12,530?

What was the right with which the contract clothed defendant? It is not necessary to discuss the question as applicable to what defendant did in the present case. He decided that the Bryan controller was not satisfactory, and the evidence and the finding of the court sustained him in his decision. Neither is it necessary to discuss his right to have an Otis controller; for he got it, and the court allowed him the cost of it. It is claimed, however, that because he was obliged to take and pay for the Otis machines in order to get the Otis controller, defendant was within his rights in removing plaintiff's machines, although he had made no objection to them, and requiring plaintiff to pay for them. In support of this claim reliance is placed upon the case of Singerly v. Thayer, 108 Pa. 291, 2 Atl. 230, 56 Am. Rep. 207. In that case Thayer made the following proposition to Singerly:

"I proposed to put my patent hydraulic hoist in your new building on Chestnut street (including a duplex pump worth $800.00), according to verbal specifications given by your architect, for $2,300.00, warranted satisfactory in every respect."

Plaintiff in error accepted this proposition, and the elevator was substantially finished, but proved unsatisfactory. He therefore declined to accept it, and gave notice that he desired it to be removed. This Thayer refused to do, and thereupon "Singerly took it down and holds it subject to the order of Thayer, who brought the suit, claiming the contract price." In commenting upon the contract the court said:

"The proposition was made to induce him (Singerly) to purchase a kind of elevator not in general use. The fair inference is that he desired to procure one that would be satisfactory to himself. The manifest import and meaning of the language used is that it should be satisfactory to him. * * * He did not agree to accept what might be satisfactory to others, but what was satisfactory to himself. This was a fact which the contract gave him the right to decide. * * * To justify a refusal to accept the elevator on the ground that it is not satisfactory, the objection should be made in good faith."

The court found from the evidence, though conflicting as to the efficient working of the elevator, that it was sufficient "to show the plaintiff in error acted in good faith and not in mere caprice in refusing to accept it."

As we shall presently see, the authorities do not agree with the rule here stated—that it is sufficient if the purchaser "acts in good faith, and not in mere caprice." It will be observed that in the case cited the contract was for the purchase of an entire machine. In the present case the contract recognized two distinct parts—the machines and the controllers. In the case cited the hoist was regarded as a novelty in design, and the objection was to the working of the entire machine, which may have influenced the decision. It is possible the opinion would have been different had Singerly objected only to the duplex pump which could have been supplied in the open market if the one furnished had been objected to. In the case here the specifications carefully described all the various parts of the elevators which were to be furnished constituting the plant; the controllers being separately described.

"The rule very generally adopted," as was stated in Dodge v. Kimball, 203 Mass. 364, 89 N. E. 542, 133 Am. St. Rep. 302, "is that, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, he needs to show only that he proceeded in good faith in an effort to perform the contract, and that the result was a substantial performance of it, although there may be various imperfections or omissions that call for a considerable diminution of the contract price. The reason for this construction of such contracts is in part the difficulty of attaining perfection in the quality of the materials and workmanship, and of entirely correcting the effect of a slight inadvertence, and the injustice of allowing the owner to retain without compensation the benefit of a costly building upon his real estate, that is substantially, but not exactly, such as he agreed to pay for. In none of the courts of this country, so far as we know, is the contractor left remediless under conditions like those above stated. The recovery permitted is generally upon the basis of the contract, with a deduction for the difference between the value of the substantial performance shown and the complete performance which would be paid for at the contract price." Harlan v. Stuffelebeem, 87 Cal. 508, 25 Pac. 686; Seebach v. Kuhn, 9 Cal. App. 485, 99 Pac. 723; Hill v. Clark, 7 Cal. App. 609, 95 Pac. 382.

In Shepard v. Mills, 173 Ill. 223, 50 N. E. 709, the contract was for the building of a heating apparatus. Among other things, the court said:

"A literal compliance with such contracts is not necessary to a recovery, but it will be sufficient that there has been an honest and faithful performance of the contract in all its material and substantial particulars, and no omission in essential points, or willful departure from the contract; and mere technical or unimportant omissions will not defeat a recovery of the contract price, less any damages, however, requisite to indemnify the owner." Otis Elevator Company v. Flanders Realty Co. (Pa.) 90 Atl. 624; Page on Contracts, § 1387.

The evidence showed an honest and faithful endeavor to install an efficient controller. It is true this part of the elevator can hardly be said to be of slight importance, and an omission to supply a controller reasonably satisfactory would not have fallen within the category of a slight deviation. But, slight or otherwise, the failure of the controllers first placed by plaintiff to prove themselves efficient was met and the cost allowed to defendant; in other words, the defendant got what he demanded and for the damage he was indemnified. If the cases cited do not apply strictly, the principle underlying them would seem to be applicable. We think, without doubt, had the Otis people allowed their controller to be used without compelling the purchase of their machines, defendant would have no ground of complaint.

The rule, as we understand it, found in Singerly v. Thayer, supra, that where the contract requires work to be done to the satisfaction of the person contracting for the work, his rejection of it cannot be called in question "if he acted in good faith and not in mere caprice in refusing to accept it," we think it too broad and is not in harmony with the generally accepted rule. It was said in Gladding, McBean & Co. v. Montgomery, 20 Cal. App. 276, 279, 128 Pac. 790, 792:

"A stipulation in a contract to perform to the satisfaction of one of the parties only calls for such performance as should be satisfactory to a reasonable person"—citing cases.

In Keeler v. Clifford, 165 Ill. 544, 46 N. E. 248, the action was to recover for certain grading and leveling done under a contract which provided that all grading was to be done to the satisfaction of said Keeler. The court said:

"Where a contract is required to be done to the satisfaction of one of the parties, the meaning necessarily is that it must be done in a manner satisfactory to the mind of a reasonable man. The plain construction of the contract in this regard is that the work was to be completed in accordance with the contract, in such a manner that appellant, as a reasonable man, ought to be satisfied with it." Hawkins v. Graham, 149 Mass. 284, 21 N. E. 312, 14 Am. St. Rep. 422; Richison v. Mead, 11 S. D. 639, 80 N. W. 131, and cases cited in the opinion.

Under the rule contended for by appellant it would be difficult, if not impossible, to show that the party was not acting in good faith and his right to say he was not satisfied would be practically arbitrary, excluding all question of its exercise being reasonable or unreasonable.

In the present case appellant not only refused to be satisfied unless Otis controllers were used, but he claimed the right to exercise this refusal, knowing that these controllers could not be obtained without purchasing machines, at great cost, which were not essential to their use. He at no time requested plaintiff to obtain controllers other than the Otis controllers, several of which were obtainable in the open market. Without previous notice to plaintiff or its consent, he removed plaintiff's machines and controllers and installed the Otis machines and controllers. Under the existing circumstances we think it would be unreasonable to hold that the contract permitted him to exercise what was little short of an arbitrary power.

The judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

BRYAN ELEVATOR CO. v. LAW.

(Civ. 1466.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Aug. 8, 1916.)

SALES ⇐199—PASSING OF TITLE—RISK OF LOSS.

Where defendant sold and delivered to plaintiff certain elevator parts and supplies, the contract providing that defendant agreed "to sell for the sum of $1.00 here in hand paid * * * all old elevator machinery now installed in the Bishop Block," plaintiff taking possession of the machinery and removing it to its shops, where it was destroyed by an earthquake and fire, title to the machinery was in plaintiff when destroyed, and the loss was upon it, and not upon defendant, though plaintiff intended to use the parts in defendant's new building in fulfillment of its contract to install elevators.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by the Bryan Elevator Company against Herbert E. Law. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed.

Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, of San Francisco, for appellant. Edgar C. Chapman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The appeal in this case is from the third cause of action set forth in the complaint. The transcript appears to be in all respects the same as the same case, No. 1465 (160 Pac. 170), this day decided. Why plaintiff's appeal was not urged in that case instead of making it the subject of a different number does not appear and is perhaps immaterial.

As a cause of action it is alleged that "plaintiff sold and delivered to defendant, at his request, certain goods, to wit, elevator parts and supplies," for which defendant agreed to pay the sum of $2,053.10. The claim of plaintiff is that it is entitled to recover the sum of $2,053.10, in addition to what it claimed in the first cause of action, which was disposed of in the case numbered 1465, for certain parts of the old elevator machinery formerly in the Bishop Building, and that when it was destroyed by the disaster of April 18, 1906, it belonged to defendant, and the loss was his. Among the provisions of the contract was the following:

"The owner agrees to sell for the sum of $1.00 here in hand paid to the contractor all old elevator machinery now installed in the Bishop Block, situated as described heretofore, and hereby acknowledges and constitutes this his receipt for same."

Plaintiff took possession of this machinery and removed it to its shops, where it was when destroyed. We think it clear that the title to the machinery was in plaintiff when it was destroyed, and we find nothing in the contract that would fix the loss upon defendant by such casualty. Indeed, the provision intended to cover losses by act of God would seem to relieve defendant from such loss. It is true that Mr. Greenbaum, president of plaintiff company, testified that because of having received this old machinery which was to be altered and reinstalled in the Monadnock Building plaintiff reduced its bid in the contract $1,600 "for the privilege of using that freight machine for installation in the building." But, if it was the property of plaintiff when destroyed, the use which plaintiff intended to make of it is immaterial. We cannot see that the loss was the less to it than it would have been had it purchased the machinery from some other person.

Plaintiff's claim is that the parts thus lost it had to supply, for which defendant should pay. The court, in its ninth finding, recites the facts and finds:

"That there is not now due, owing, and unpaid from the defendant to the plaintiff the sum of $2,053.10 or any part thereof."

We think the finding supported by the evidence, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

(Civ. 1826.)

1. BROKERS ⇨43(1)—COMPENSATION—NECESSITY OF WRITTEN CONTRACT—STATUTE.

Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6, providing that an agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to purchase or sell real estate for a commission shall be invalid unless it or some note or memorandum is in writing subscribed by the party to be charged or his agent, does not apply to an oral contract between brokers whereby one secures the co-operation of another to sell realty.

2. BROKERS ⇨43(1)—EMPLOYMENT—NECESSITY OF WRITTEN CONTRACT—STATUTES.

Under such provision, and section 2039, requiring an oral authority to enter a contract required by law to be in writing to be given by an instrument in writing, a contract by the agent of an agent or broker stating the price asked for certain land, the terms of payment, and that he would pay a commission on such price to the party effecting a sale, in view of the fact that the broker employed had no knowledge that his employer was in fact an agent, and the absence of any agreement looking toward a division of the commission, was a direct contract of employment, so that where the authority of defendant's agent to employ plaintiff was not in writing, it was invalid and unenforceable.

4. BROKERS ⇨43(1)—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—NECESSITY OF WRITING—ESTOPPEL.

In an action for a commission for the sale of realty under a direct contract with defendant's agent, not authorized thereto in writing, which under Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 6, and section 2309, was invalid, the defendant copartnership which knowingly held out its agent, the manager of its land department who handled all its correspondence in that department, and who was authorized, though not in writing, to consult and deal with agents in regard to a sale of the defendant's lands, and which knew the plaintiff's efforts to sell the land, his expenses in procuring a purchaser, that the purchaser was first interested by the plaintiff, and which said nothing to the purchaser concerning the plaintiff's participation in the matter, was not estopped from pleading the bar of the statute of frauds.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; A. E. Graupner, Judge.

Action by George Sellers against the Solway Land Company and Balfour, Guthrie & Co., copartners, etc., and others. Dismissed as to defendant Solway Land Company, and judgment for defendants Balfour, Guthrie & Co. and others, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Rodgers and A. F. Bray, both of Martinez, and Sterling Carr, of San Francisco, for appellant. McCutchen, Olney & Willard, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. In this action the plaintiff sued the defendants for the sum of $6,250, alleged to be due as a commission upon the sale of a large ranch in Contra Costa county, the complaint alleging that said sale was made through the efforts of the plaintiff under the contract hereafter set out. The land was the property of the defendant Solway Land Company, and was being managed and handled by the defendants Balfour, Guthrie & Co., a copartnership, consisting of a number of individuals, some of whom are named as defendants, and upon the sale referred to the copartnership received a commission of two and one-half per cent. upon its sale price of $130,000, to wit, the sum of $3,250, as compensation for the care of the ranch during a certain period and for its sale. The agency of the defendants Balfour, Guthrie & Co. was, however, unknown to the plaintiff, and the complaint charges them as owners. At the conclusion of the evidence a motion of defendant Solway Land Company to dismiss as to it was granted, and no question is raised as to the correctness of the court's action in this regard. Hereafter in this opinion the term defendants will refer only to Balfour, Guthrie & Co.

The negotiations between the plaintiff and the defendants for his contract were conducted by him with one R. F. McLeod, an employé of the defendants and the manager of a department of their business known as the land and loan department. The contract was signed by McLeod on behalf of the defendants, and is in the following terms:

"San Francisco, 22d Sept., 1909.

"Mr. Geo. Sellers, Oakley, Cal.—Dear Sir: Replying to your letter of 21st inst., the price we are asking for the Solway ranch is $125,000, including stock and implements and interest in the pumping plant. We would be willing to accept one-half cash and carry the balance at 6 per cent. net for a reasonable time. We will pay 5 per cent. commission on the above price to the party effecting a sale.

"You are no doubt aware that part of the ranch is rented to Japanese for potatoes, etc., and possession of same cannot be given until expiry of the lease this fall.

"Yours truly, Balfour, Guthrie & Co.,

"Per [Signed] R. F. McLeod."

"P. S.—There is about 1,700 acres all together." (It may be said parenthetically that at the time of the sale the price of the property had been increased.)

It is an established fact in the case and not disputed that the authority from the defendants to McLeod to enter into this contract was not conferred in writing. The action having been dismissed as to the defendant Solway Land Company the remaining defendants at the conclusion of the trial moved that the jury be directed to return a verdict in their favor upon the ground of the lack of written authority to McLeod; section 2309 of the Civil Code requiring that an authorization to an agent to enter into a contract required to be in writing must itself be evidenced by a written instrument. This motion was also granted, and the jury thereupon returned its verdict in favor of the defendants. From the judgment entered thereon the plaintiff takes this appeal.

In support of his appeal plaintiff urges that the court erred in directing the jury to find in defendants' favor for two principal reasons, viz.: First, that the plaintiff's contract being one between broker and broker, is not governed by section 1624, subd. 6, of the Civil Code, and that therefore McLeod's authority to enter into it was not required to be in writing; and, second, even if the contract sued upon be one that is governed by said section, the conduct of the defendants in reference thereto estops them from availing themselves of the bar of the statute.

[1] The authorities in this state, holding that an oral contract between brokers, whereby one employs or secures the co-operation of another to sell real estate, is valid and enforceable, may be roughly divided into three classes. The first class comprises cases where the brokers' agreement was purely and simply one of partnership, such as Coward v. Clanton, 79 Cal. 23, 21 Pac. 359; Gorham v. Heiman, 90 Cal. 346, 27 Pac. 289; Bates v. Babcock, 95 Cal. 479, 30 Pac. 605, 16 L. R. A. 745, 29 Am. St. Rep. 133; and Baker v. Thompson, 14 Cal. App. 175, 111 Pac. 373; the second comprises cases where the agreement of the brokers was to divide between them, either equally or in a stated proportion, a commission or compensation to be received by one of them from the owner of the land to be sold, such as Casey v. Richards, 10 Cal. App. 57, 101 Pac. 36; Hageman v. O'Brien, 24 Cal. App. 270, 141 Pac. 33; Reynolds v. Jackson, 25 Cal. App. 490, 144 Pac. 305; Hellings v. Wright, 156 Pac. 365; Jenkins v. Locke-Paddon Co., 157 Pac. 537; and the third class consists of cases, two in number, in which one broker, having a contract from the owner to sell real property, has agreed with a second broker to pay him for his services either in procuring a buyer for the property or assisting in that end—those cases being Saunders v. Yoakum, 12 Cal. App. 543, 107 Pac. 1007, and Johnston v. Porter et al., 21 Cal. App. 97, 131 Pac. 69.

In the case at bar the contract, as we have seen, is one to pay a specific amount, viz. 5 per cent. on the purchase price, for the procuring of a purchaser, and would fall within the last-named classification and be governed by the authority of those cases, unless it contains elements differentiating it from them and making inapplicable the rule therein followed.

The leading case in this state upon the question is Gorham v. Heiman, supra, and which has been cited in practically every decision upon the subject which has since been rendered. The agreement there was between brokers to co-operate in the selling of a mine and to divide commissions, and the court referring thereto used this language (page 358 of 90 Cal., page 292 of 27 Pac.):

"Counsel seem to rely on section 1624 of the Civil Code, subdivision 6. But, clearly, that provision was only designed to protect owners of real estate against unfounded claims of brokers. It does not extend to agreements between brokers to co-operate in making sales for a share of the commissions."

It will be seen upon examination that all the cases in the first and second classification made above dealt with agreements between brokers to co-operate in the common object of procuring a purchaser for real property, and come squarely within the authority of Gorham v. Heiman.

With regard to the remaining two cases, it appears that in Saunders v. Yoakum, supra—

"defendant agreed with plaintiff that if he would procure a purchaser for any or all of the property he would pay to the plaintiff a commission in the event of a sale."

Plaintiff performed his agreement, and the defendant received a commission of $1,200, and refused to pay plaintiff for his services. The latter thereupon brought suit, and recovered $400 as the value thereof. Upon appeal the contention of the defendant that the contract was void because not in writing was overruled upon the authority of the leading case above cited, the court construing the agreement to be one between brokers to co-operate in making a sale for a share of the commission, and referring to the services of the plaintiff as being rendered "in assisting the defendant to earn his commission."

In the second case (Johnston v. Porter et al.) it appears that Johnston, the plaintiff, introduced the purchaser of the property to the defendant Morey, who was acting as the agent of the owner, and also assisted in conducting the negotiations which resulted in a sale. Morey orally agreed to compensate Johnston for his services. Upon the conclusion of the sale Morey received a commission of $2,250, out of which he offered to pay Johnston $250. Johnston being dissatisfied with the amount tendered by Morey, brought suit upon the oral agreement for the reasonable value of his services. The court allowed a recovery of $1,500 out of $2,250 received by Morey. Upon appeal the judgment was sustained, this court construing the agreement between Morey and Johnston as being one between two brokers to co-operate in the sale of real estate, using this language:

"Subdivision 6 of section 1624 of the Civil Code, which declares an agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to sell real estate for a compensation or commission to be invalid unless reduced to writing was designed only for the protection of real estate owners against the unfounded claims of brokers; and it was never intended to be applied to contracts between brokers co-operating in the sale of real property and agreeing to share commissions earned as the result of such sale"—citing Gorham v. Heiman, supra.

If it be the law in this state, as stated in Gorham v. Heiman, that the section of the Code under consideration "was only designed to protect owners of real estate against unfounded claims of brokers," then the authorization to the employé of the defendants McLeod did not need to be in writing. But, as was said in the later case of Aldis v. Schleicher, 9 Cal. App. 372, 99 Pac. 526, that section is—

"equally applicable to any contract whereby one, whether owner or not, employs another to effect a sale of real estate, and agrees unconditionally to pay a stipulated sum for the performance of such services."

It will be observed that in Gorham v. Heiman, in which the rule was first laid down that the provisions of subdivision 6 of section 1624, Civil Code, apply only to contracts between the owners of real estate and brokers, the contract there being considered was literally an agreement between brokers, dealing with each other as such, to unite their efforts in the disposal of a mine, and to divide the compensation to be earned in the event of success, and that there was no employment by one of the other. Evidently such a contract was one of partnership, and did not come within the terms of the section, whether the legislative intent in enacting it was merely to protect owners of real estate, or its scope was much broader. As already pointed out, the cases following Gorham v. Helman with the exception of the two noted all dealt with agreements between brokers to divide commissions to be received as the result of their joint efforts; and even in those two, while the agreement as to the compensation of the complaining broker was more in the nature of a direct promise by the other to compensate him for services already or thereafter to be rendered, it is still apparent that they dealt with each other as agents, that they were both interested in the result of their common efforts, and that the compensation agreed to be paid, or allowed by the court, was a part only of the compensation of the employing broker, thus preserving in some degree the idea of co-operation between broker and broker for a division of the fee, and enabling the court in its desire to prevent the defeat of an equitable claim to construe the agreement as one for the division between brokers of a compensation jointly earned.

[2] In the case at bar there is no such partnership between the brokers, nor any agreement to divide compensation, and no effort on the part of the plaintiff to obtain a division of the commission received by the defendants. On the contrary, the amount sued for is almost double the sum which the employing brokers received as their compensation for the share of the property and its sale. There was, moreover, no knowledge on the part of the broker employed that his employers were in fact agents, and the contract is one of employment for a specific compensation. In the complaint the employing brokers are charged as the owners of the property; and it was only during the progress of the trial that the plaintiff discovered that they were not such owners, and when such discovery was made there was no amendment of the complaint requested. If we hold this case not to come within the provisions of section 1624 of the Civil Code we must ignore the careful insistence to be discerned in the cases upon the existence of a partnership, or of an agreement to divide commissions, or of the existence of a fund received by one broker in which the second broker may be allotted a share—and lay down the rule that all these things are immaterial, and that a direct contract of employment to sell real estate for a specific compensation is invalid if made by the owner of the property with a broker, but is valid if made between two brokers—contrary to the rule declared in Aldis v. Schleicher, supra, and which appears to us to be plainly applicable to the case at bar.

We are therefore constrained to hold that the plaintiff neither by the allegations of his complaint nor his proof upon the trial brought his case within the authority of those holding that a contract between brokers to co-operate in the sale of real estate for a division of the compensation to be thereby earned is valid and enforceable, although not in writing. The first contention of the appellant must accordingly be disallowed.

[3-5] The second contention of the appellant is that even if the contract sued upon be one that is required to be in writing, the conduct of the defendants in reference thereto estops them from availing themselves of the bar of the statute for three reasons, viz.: First, because the defendants knowingly held McLeod out to the world as having the authority he assumed; second, because the defendants knew that McLeod was dealing with the plaintiff; and, third, because the defendants accepted the benefits of McLeod's acts.

The principle of estoppel is one of equity; and whether in a given case the facts and circumstances shown are sufficient to create it is a question for the court. It is also well settled that estoppels are not favored, their effect being to prevent the truth being shown.

The facts on which the plaintiff's plea of estoppel is based are, briefly, that McLeod was the manager of the department of the defendants' business known as the land and loan department; that as such manager he answered all correspondence addressed to the defendants on matters relating to that department; that he had authority, though not in writing, to consult and deal with agents in regard to a sale of the defendants' lands; that a contract similar to the one given to the plaintiff was subsequently entered into by him on behalf of the defendants with a person other than the plaintiff; that the efforts of the plaintiff to sell the ranch were known to McLeod and to the foreman and superintendent of the ranch, which the plaintiff visited a number of times in the company of prospective buyers; that plaintiff expended money in advertising the ranch in his endeavor to procure a purchaser; and, finally, that the persons to whom the ranch was sold were first interested in its purchase by the plaintiff, who sent them to McLeod for the purpose of arranging terms and closing up the transaction, but without advising McLeod that he had done so.

It further appears, however, that the negotiations were conducted by the purchasers with McLeod, and that nothing was said by them concerning the plaintiff's participation in the matter, and that the sale was made to them without knowledge on the part of McLeod that the plaintiff was interested in it other than a verbal notification made some time previously that he was endeavoring to sell the land to these people.

We are of the opinion that the court correctly held that the above facts were insufficient to constitute an estoppel as against the plea of the statute of frauds.

It has long been held in this state that an agent having sold real property under a contract of employment invalid because not in writing can recover neither upon the contract nor upon quantum meruit. McCarthy v. Loupe, 62 Cal. 299; Myres v. Surryhne, 67 Cal. 657, 8 Pac. 523; Zeimer v. Antisell, 75 Cal. 509, 17 Pac. 642; McPhail v. Buell, 87 Cal. 115, 25 Pac. 266; Shanklin v. Hall, 100 Cal. 26, 34 Pac. 636; McGeary v. Satchwell, 129 Cal. 389, 62 Pac. 58; Jamison v. Hyde, 141 Cal. 109, 74 Pac. 695. Although in these cases no question of estoppel is considered, they offer a strong analogy to the case at bar, for all the facts present here and claimed by the plaintiff to constitute an estoppel were necessarily present in those cases, viz. an invalid employment, knowledge of its invalidity, knowledge of rendition of services under the contract, and acceptance of the benefits arising from the performance of the contract by the agent. The statute of frauds, however, was held to bar the agent's recovery.

In the case of McRae v. Ross, 170 Cal. 74, 148 Pac. 215, the question of estoppel under circumstances somewhat similar to those in the case at bar was considered. In that case a ranch in Solano county had been sold. A. T. Ross and three other respondents (sisters and brother of A. T. Ross) were owners. McRae claimed to have found the purchaser, and relied upon a broker's note from A. T. Ross alone. There was no written authority from the other respondents to A. T. Ross, but McRae claimed that they had held him out as their agent and that they were stopped from raising the defense of the statute of frauds, particularly Civil Code, § 2309. This alleged holding out (one of the elements claimed in the estoppel in the case at bar) consisted of statements claimed to have been made to McRae by the respondents to the effect that A. T. Ross was authorized to act for them, and that he was in charge of the ranch. It was held that there was no estoppel, the court saying (Mr. Justice Sloss writing the opinion):

"It is clear that the findings in favor of the defendants Raymond H. Ross, Mabel I. Ross, and Mrs. Henry are in accord with the undisputed evidence. A contract for the sale of real estate, or for the employment of a broker to sell real estate, must be in writing. Civ. Code, § 1624; Code Civ. Proc. § 1973. None of these three defendants ever made any written contract with plaintiff or even had any written communication with him. Plaintiff attempted to show that each of them had referred him to a brother, their codefendant, Albert T. Ross, as the person in charge of the ranch. But the testimony was that Albert did not have any written authority to bind them, and this was necessary to empower him to make a contract, on their behalf, to sell real estate or employ an agent to sell it. Civ. Code, § 2309. Even if the making of the oral statements had been shown without contradiction—which is not the case—such statements would not have bound these defendants. There is no ground for the contention that the alleged declarations raised an estoppel against the three defendants. To so hold would destroy the statutory requirement that authority to sell real property must be in writing."

The appellant strongly relies on the case of Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 106 Pac. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154. In that case the plaintiff Seymour sued for damages for breach of a contract of employment; his employment to cover a period of ten years. The contract was not in writing, and therefore void under the statute of frauds. The claim of estoppel was based upon the ground that the defendants when negotiating for his employment promised him a written contract, and had induced him, in order to permit him to accept the employment, to resign a life position carrying a good salary with a right to a pension upon retirement. Through circumstances arising subsequent to his entering upon his employment the written contract was not given to Seymour, and after rendering services under the verbal contract for a period of three years he was dismissed. In holding the defendants estopped to set up the statute of frauds the Supreme Court laid emphasis upon the fact that it was not because of the rendition of services under the contract that the estoppel was allowed, but because of the change of position suffered by the plaintiff through having resigned a lucrative position—and which he could not now regain—in order to accept the employment. It was held that it would be a fraud upon the plaintiff if the defendants after having induced him to resign from his position upon the promise of a ten-year written contract, and having failed to reduce the contract to writing, were permitted to set up the invalidity of the oral contract to defeat recovery. The court emphasized the fact that the plaintiff was not helped by the performance of services. On this subject it says:

"Under this claim, the fact of part performance by plaintiff plays no part whatever. * * * Plaintiff's case, in this regard, would be just as strong if after his resignation he had been prevented by defendants from beginning to perform."

Thus far we have considered the question of estoppel only so far as it is affected by the evidence offered by the plaintiff; but since plaintiff's claim is based upon the alleged holding out by the defendants of their employé McLeod as having authority to enter into the contract, upon their knowledge of the plaintiff's activity in the performance of the contract, and upon their accepting the benefit of the results of his labors, we think it plain that the court in considering whether the estoppel claimed had been established was bound to consider all of the evidence offered upon those matters whether by the plaintiff or the defendants. In that view of the case the plaintiff's position becomes still more untenable, for the defendants offered evidence tending to show that the plaintiff's contract had expired long before the sale took place, that he had been warned to desist from his efforts to sell the ranch, and that the plaintiff recognized by his acts that his contract was no longer in effect; and that even if the sale of the property was made to persons who were first interested in it by the plaintiff, the latter was guilty of gross negligence in failing to report to the defendants that he had brought the property to the attention of its ultimate buyers, thus allowing the defendants to deal with them in ignorance of their liability to pay to the plaintiff a commission. These facts would have a strong bearing upon the question of whether the defendants received any benefit from the contract made by this agent, and consequently upon the potency of the plaintiff's appeal to the equitable jurisdiction of the court for the application of the principle of estoppel in his favor.

[6] There is no merit in the final point urged by the appellant that the court having at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case denied defendants' motion for a nonsuit, the invalidity of the contract and the facts adduced by the plaintiff in support of his plea of estoppel at that time appearing, it was error to subsequently grant the motion of the defendants to direct the jury to return a verdict in their favor.

For the foregoing reason the judgment is affirmed.

1. MECHANICS' LIENS $\S$ 271(1) — FORECLOSURE—PLEADING—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.
Complaint of subcontractor claiming mechanic's lien held sufficient to state a cause of action.

2. MECHANICS' LIENS $\S$ 271(10)—FORECLOSURE—PLEADING—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

Complaint of subcontractor claiming mechanic's lien, alleging that the building was completed according to the terms of the contract, "on or about October 26th," and that lien claim was filed November 19th, is sufficient to warrant proof of exact date of completion, though it may not specifically show that completion took place within 30 days prior to November 19th; nor is such allegation objectionable for alleging completion of building rather than completion of contract, since it sufficiently shows the latter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 504; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 271(10).]

3. MECHANICS' LIENS $\S$ 96 — SUBCONTRACTORS—FAILURE TO REQUIRE CONTRACTOR'S BOND.

Under Const. art. 20, § 15, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, in pursuance thereof, providing a lien for mechanics for labor and materials furnished, and that one in charge of construction shall be regarded as the owner's agent, and providing for filing of bond of contractor to protect other claimants, if the owner fails to require such bond, he is liable to pay all liens to the value of the work done and materials furnished.

4. MECHANICS' LIENS $\S$ 132(7)—NOTICE OF COMPLETION — STATUTORY COMPLETION — EFFECT ON LIEN CLAIM.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, providing that every person, save the original contractor, claiming a lien, within 30 days after he has ceased to labor or furnish materials, or both, or at his option, within 30 days after the completion of the original contract under which he was employed, must file for record a claim of lien, and that any of the following shall be deemed equivalent to a completion; the occupation or use of a building by the owner, or his representative, or the acceptance by owner or agent, or cessation from labor for 30 days upon any contract or building, or the filing of the notice provided for; and that the owner may, within 10 days after completion of any contract, or 40 days after cessation from labor thereon, file for record notice setting forth the date of completion or cessation from labor with his name and nature of his title, and description of the property, and that if such notice is not filed, the owner and all persons derailing title from him shall be estopped in proceedings for foreclosure of lien from maintaining any defense on the ground that lien was not filed in time, but that all claims of lien must be filed within 90 days after completion of any building; the requirement as to notice of completion applies to statutory completion by occupation, and the owner who fails to file such notice is estopped to defend for failure to file lien in time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 198, 199; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 132(7).]

5. PLEADING $\S$ 129(1)—ANSWER—FAILURE TO MAKE DENIAL—EFFECT.

An averment of the complaint not denied in the answer stands as an admitted fact.

6. MECHANICS' LIENS $\S$ 281(2)—COMPLETION OF CONTRACT—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Finding that building was completed on October 26th is justified by the owner's statement that the last work was that of the painter who on that date worked two hours, especially in view of averment, undenied by the owner, that such date was the date of completion.

7. MECHANICS' LIENS $\S$ 290(2)—COMPLETION OF CONTRACT—"ON OR ABOUT."

Finding that building was completed "on or about October 26th" is sufficiently definite, in view of record, admission that such was the date; "on or about" meaning the day mentioned or one in close proximity thereto; one or two days either before or after being implied.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Marcel E. Cerf, Judge.

Action by John M. Boscus and another, individually and as copartners under the firm name of Boscus Bros., against Charles H. Waldmann, wife, and Felix Marcuse. From the judgment for plaintiffs, Waldmann and wife appeal. Affirmed.

Alexander D. Keyes, of San Francisco, for appellants. A. P. Dessouslavy and P. A. Bergerot, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an action of foreclosure under the mechanic's lien law.

On the 11th day of April, 1912, the appellants, the Waldmanns, and the defendant Marcuse entered into an agreement in writing whereby the latter agreed to erect upon certain real property of the first-named parties, situated in the city of San Francisco, a three-story frame building, for the sum of $18,915, which sum was to be paid in certain specified installments at specified times, the last installment ($4,728.75) being made payable 35 days after the completion of said building. Said contract was filed for record in the office of the county recorder of the city and county of San Francisco on said 11th day of April, 1912, but there was not filed with said contract, before the work was commenced, or at any other time, the bond provided by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or any bond whatever.

Immediately after the 11th day of April, 1912, the defendant Felix Marcuse commenced the erection of said building upon the real property described in the complaint, in pursuance of the terms of said contract between him and the Waldmanns, and the complaint alleges that he completed the same "on or about October 26, 1912; that no notice of the completion of said building or contract was ever filed in the office of the county recorder of said city and county of San Francisco; that all the terms and conditions of said contract to be by said Felix Marcuse kept and performed have been by him duly kept and performed." It is averred that of the contract price for said building not more than the sum of $10,000 has been paid by the Waldmanns to said Marcuse, and that:

"There ever since has remained and still remains due and unpaid from defendants (the Waldmanns) * * * to said Felix Marcuse, under said contract, and for said extra work and materials, a sum exceeding $10,000."

On the 6th day of May, 1912, said Marcuse, as such contractor, entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs by which the latter undertook and promised to do all the plumbing work for said building and to install the steam heating plant and the radiators therein, in accordance with the plans and specifications adopted by the Waldmanns and said Marcuse, said plans and specifications being attached to and forming a part of the contract for the erection of the building; that plaintiffs by said agreement agreed to furnish all the materials and necessary labor, to commence said work at once, to prosecute the same without delay, and to have said work finished as soon as possible; that said Marcuse agreed to pay the plaintiffs therefor $2,190, as follows: 75 per cent. of the work done as the same should progress, and the remaining 25 per cent. 35 days after the completion of the building.

It is alleged that, during the course of the erection of the building, the plaintiffs, at the request of said Marcuse, performed certain extra work and furnished certain extra materials. The various and several items of extra work and materials so performed and furnished are separately set out and described in the complaint and the total amount thereof, stated in money, is $315.65. There are eleven of these items of extra work performed and extra materials furnished, and the complaint alleges that as to the first six items of such extras in the order in which they are set forth in that pleading, the prices therefor were fixed and agreed upon between plaintiffs and the said Marcuse; that as to the remaining five items thereof, no price was fixed or agreed upon for the same, but that the amounts claimed for the said last five items constitute the reasonable value thereof. It is alleged that no time within which said extra work was to be done was fixed or agreed upon, except that it was agreed that the same was to be done during the course of the erection of the building and as soon as possible, and that no time was fixed for the payment to the plaintiffs for said extra work; "that plaintiffs have further performed all the conditions of said agreement of May 6, 1912, to be by them performed; that said extra work was agreed to be done and was actually done, and that said extra materials were furnished to be used and were actually used in the construction of said building." It is further averred that all said extra work was done and the extra materials were furnished by the plaintiffs upon the order of said Marcuse and with the consent of the said defendants Charles H. and Nellie V. Waldmann; "that the said price of $2,190 is and was the reasonable value of the work provided by the said agreement of May 6, 1912, to be done by plaintiffs."

It is alleged that the sum of $750 only has been paid on the price fixed in the agreement of May 6, 1912, and that nothing has been paid the plaintiffs on account of the extras aforesaid, and that, with the sum due on account of said extras added to the balance remaining unpaid and due under the said written agreement of May 6, 1912, there is now due the plaintiffs from the appellants the total sum of $1,755.65.

The complaint is in two counts. The first alleges that the plaintiffs on the 19th day of November, 1912 (admitted by all the parties to have been the 20th instead of the 19th of November as alleged), filed their claim of lien, duly verified, in the office of the county recorder of the city and county of San Francisco. In the second count it is alleged:

"That, on November 30, 1912, defendants Charles H. Waldmann and Nellie V. Waldmann filed for record in the office of the county recorder of said city and county of San Francisco their notice wherein it was stated that a cessation of labor on said building had occurred October 26, 1912, and that, on November 25, 1912, there had been a cessation of labor for 30 days; that on December 10, 1912, plaintiffs, for the purpose of securing a lien for the amount due them as aforesaid, filed in said recorder's office their claim of lien, duly verified by the oath of John M. Boscus, one of said plaintiffs," etc.

A demurrer on both general and special grounds interposed by the defendants Waldmann was overruled, and said defendants thereupon answered the complaint, specifically denying all the averments of the same, with the exception, however, of paragraph 6 thereof, relating to the extra work done and the extra materials furnished by the plaintiffs, and as to said extras they admitted that they were done and furnished by the plaintiffs, but, it is alleged, upon an express agreement that there would be no extra charges therefor, some of them merely involving the correction of work which was called for by the building contract but which was defectively executed.

As separate and distinct defenses the answer in substance alleges: (1) That the plaintiffs ceased to labor and ceased to furnish materials in the construction of said building prior to the 8th day of October, 1912, and that the claim of lien set forth in each of the causes of action declared upon was filed for record more than 30 days after the plaintiffs ceased to labor and ceased to furnish materials to be used in the construction of said building; (2) that the defendants Waldmann, as owners, began the occupation and use of said building on the 17th day of October, 1912, "and that the claims of lien of the said plaintiffs were filed more than 30 days after such occupation and use commenced, to wit, on the 20th day of November, 1912, and on the 10th day of November, 1912, respectively, and were therefore filed for record after the time allowed by law, and these defendants allege that such occupation and use by these defendants as such owners was open, notorious, and continuous."

Finally, answering both causes of action relied upon by the plaintiffs, the answer points out the requirements as to plumbing prescribed by the specifications, and then charges that the plaintiffs failed to comply with those requirements in a number of specifically mentioned material particulars.

The court's findings are in substance as follows: That the building, except as to certain trivial imperfection, involving items, aggregating, in money, the sum of $17, for which credit was allowed the appellants, was completed by Marcuse "on or about October 26, 1912, and subsequent to October 20, 1912"; that, barring the trivial imperfection referred to in the construction of said building, all the terms and conditions of the contract to be by said Marcuse kept and performed have been by him duly kept and performed; "that ever since on or about October 20, 1912, there remained, and now remains, due and unpaid from defendants Charles H. Waldmann and Nellie V. Waldmann to said Marcuse under said contract a sum exceeding $6,500." It is further found that all the terms of the contract of May 6, 1912, between Marcuse, as agent of the defendants, and the plaintiffs, whereby the latter were to do the plumbing work in and upon said building, and provide the labor and materials therefor, were duly performed by the plaintiffs, and that the latter performed the extra work and furnished the extra materials alleged in the complaint and above referred to, the said agreement of May 6, 1912, and the extra work all being executed and performed according to the specifications forming part of the building contract. It is also found:

"That, on October 17, 1912, defendants Charles H. Waldmann and Nellie V. Waldmann entered into, and ever since have been in, the actual and exclusive use and occupation of said building."

It was alleged in the answer and, as seen, admitted to be true by counsel for both parties, that the first claim of lien by the plaintiffs was filed on the 20th day of November, 1912, and not on the 19th day of November, 1912, as the complaint alleges.

It was also admitted by the appellants that no notice of completion of the building was ever filed by them, but that (so the plaintiffs allege and admit) a notice of cessation of labor was filed on November 30, 1912, stating that, on November 25, 1912, there had been a cessation of labor for 30 days.

It is alleged by the complaint and not denied by the answer that the bond mentioned in section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure was not filed with the original contract in the office of the county recorder, and thus the failure to file such bond was admitted.

Upon the findings and the admissions mentioned the court entered its decree, awarding the plaintiff the sum of $1,738.65, or the sum of $1,755.65, minus the said sum of $17 allowed for the "trivial imperfection," decreed that the plaintiffs were entitled to a lien on the real property described in the complaint and the building thereon and a foreclosure thereof and a sale of said property at public auction to satisfy their claim. The Waldmanns have appealed from said judgment under the alternative method.

The findings and the judgment are, as is obvious, based upon the first count of the complaint—that is, the decree, in accordance with the findings, adjudged the plaintiffs to be entitled to the lien and the benefits thereof filed on the 20th day of November, 1912, upon the theory that the building was completed on the 26th day of October, 1912.

The contract between the plaintiffs and the original contractor, Marcuse, was made and filed and the work performed and the materials furnished thereunder after the existing law providing for the enforcement of mechanics' and laborers' liens was passed by the Legislature of 1911, and hence by the provisions of that law must the questions presented by this appeal be tested.

[1, 2] The complaint, which is not to be indorsed as a perfect pleading in a case of this character, is, nevertheless, sufficient and states a cause of action in the first count, upon which the judgment is based. We shall not consider all the objections to which it is urged that it is amenable. One of these objections may be noticed, however. It is that the allegation that the building was completed according to the terms of the contract "on or about October 26, 1912," and that the claim of lien was filed on the 19th day of November, 1912, is too indefinite, and is not equivalent to the statement that completion took place within 30 days before November 19, 1912, citing Cohn v. Wright, 89 Cal. 86, 26 Pac. 643. The case cited has reference particularly to a finding in the criticized language of the complaint. We think, however, that the language may and should be held sufficient in a complaint in a case of this character to warrant proof of the exact date, and that no substantial injury to the appellants could have followed from the ruling on the demurrer, so far as that language of the pleading is concerned. It is further insisted that the complaint was defective in that it alleged that the building rather than the contract was completed. The complaint, as we have seen, declares that the building was completed according to the terms of the contract, and this sufficiently showed that the contract was completed, assuming that there is any substantial merit to the distinction sought to be drawn by appellants. We think the court made no error in overruling the demurrer.

[3] The most important objection to the judgment, however, is that certain of the vital findings upon which it is founded are not supported by the evidence, and this involves the principal question around which the controversy submitted here revolves and upon which its solution hinges, viz. whether the plaintiffs filed their claim of lien—that of November 20, 1912—within the time prescribed by the statute; and, furthermore, whether said finding is sufficiently definite to constitute a clear and distinct finding of the fact to which it is addressed. The appellants also attack the finding respecting the extra work and materials above spoken of.

Section 1183 provides for a lien in favor of all persons for labor performed upon or for material used in the construction of any building, etc., for the value of the labor so done and the materials so furnished. This provision is only declaratory of the right expressly guaranteed by our Constitution to artisans, mechanics, laborers and materialmen to a lien upon property upon which they have bestowed labor and materials in the improvement thereof or the erection of a building thereon. Article 20, § 15, Constitution. The same section, however, further provides that any person having charge of the construction, etc., of the building or other improvement "shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of this chapter," thus binding the owner to any subcontracts with other persons in the construction or repair of the building or other improvements, provided, of course, such subcontracts are within the scope or the terms, conditions, and specifications of the original contract. A bond (heretofore referred to) is also provided by this section. It is the duty of the owner to exact this from the contractor and file the same in the office of the county recorder with the contract if he would restrict his liability to laborers and materialmen or subcontractors for their claims to the contract price. If he fails to require such bond to be executed and filed and none is filed, there is then imposed upon him "the penalty of paying all the liens to the extent of the value of the work done and materials furnished." Roystone Co. v. Darling & American Surety Co., 171 Cal. 526, 154 Pac. 15.

[4] But the provisions with which the principal question here is concerned are in section 1187. Said section, among other things, provides that:

"Every person save the original contractor claiming the benefit of this chapter, within thirty days after he has ceased to labor or has ceased to furnish materials, or both; or at his option, within thirty days after the completion of the original contract, if any, under which he was employed, must file for record with the county recorder * * * a claim of lien containing."

Then follows a specification of the facts which the lien must contain and recite. Said section proceeds:

"Any trivial imperfection in the said work, or in the completion of any contract by any lien claimant, or in the construction of any building, improvement or structure, or of the alteration, addition to, or repair thereof, shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of any lien; and, in all cases, any of the following shall be deemed equivalent to a completion for all the purposes of this chapter: The occupation or use of a building * * * by the owner, or his representative; or the acceptance by said owner or said agent, of said building * * * or cessation from labor for thirty days upon any contract or upon any building; * * * the filing of the notice hereinafter provided for. The owner may within ten days after completion of any contract, or within forty days after cessation from labor thereon, file for record in the office of the county recorder * * * a notice setting forth the date when the same was completed, or on which cessation from labor occurred, together with his name and the nature of his title, and a description of the property sufficient for identification, which notice shall be verified by himself or some other person on his behalf. * * * In case such notice be not so filed then the said owner and all persons de-raigning title from or claiming any interest through him shall be estopped in any proceedings for the foreclosure of any lien provided for in this chapter from maintaining any defense therein based on the ground that said lien was not filed within the time provided in this chapter: Provided, that all claims of lien must be filed within ninety days after the completion of any building," etc.

It is not contended, nor could it be successfully, that under section 1187 a lien claimant, other than the original contractor, may not file his lien within 30 days after the happening of any one of two events, viz.: (1) After he has ceased to labor or ceased to furnish materials, as the case may be, or both, if he has both performed the labor and furnished the materials; (2) after the completion of the original contract. The appellants do contend, however, that the plaintiffs should have filed their lien within 30 days after the 17th day of October, 1912, the date upon which it is found by the court that the Waldmanns, owners of the property, entered into the occupation of the building. The argument is that a lien claimant, other than the original contractor, must file his claim of lien within 30 days after the first act constituting a completion of the building, whether it be an actual or only a statutory completion, and that if he fails to do so, then his right to a lien is lost. To be more explicit, the argument is: That, if a completion is effected, either by occupation or a cessation from labor or by acceptance, the time for the filing of the lien begins to run on that day, and the claimant cannot then claim the right to file his lien within 30 days after the building has actually been completed if such actual completion occurs on a date subsequent to the completion by occupation or by acceptance or by cessation from labor, as the case may be.

In reply to the proposition so advanced, the plaintiffs say that, even if it be true that in this case the occupation and use of the building constituted a statutory or constructive and not an actual completion of the building, the defendants were, nevertheless, required to file the notice of completion required by section 1187, and, having failed to file such notice, they are now estopped under the terms of said section, from maintaining any defense in this action "based on the ground that said lien was not filed within the time provided in this chapter." The defendants argue, however, that the provision with regard to the notice of completion to be given applies solely to an actual completion and not to the statutory or constructive completion.

In the case of Roystone v. Darling & American Surety Co., supra, the Supreme Court, for the first time because it was the first case calling for it, elaborately reviewed the lien law of 1911, which constitutes a general revision of the law theretofore existing upon that subject in this state. In that case, through Mr. Justice Shaw, the scope, the intent, and the meaning of the several provisions of that statute were thoroughly explored and lucidly exposed and explained.

The question as to the application of the requirement of the statute that notice shall be given of the completion of the building to the several events constituting the equivalents of completion, when actual completion has not been effected, did not arise in that case. And, since the amendment of section 1187 (Stats. 1897, p. 202), whereby, for the first time, provision for notices of completion and cessation from labor were incorporated into that section, the proposition has been touched upon in but one case (Meyer v. Street Improvement Co., 164 Cal. 645, 648, 130 Pac. 215, 216), which was decided before the revision of 1911, whereby, however, no change was made in respect of the requirement of notices prescribed by the 1897 amendment. In that case the court uses language strongly intimating, if not directly deciding, that notices should be filed in all cases. The precise language of the court is:

"The first paragraph requires a notice of completion to be filed by the owner in every case in which a lien may be filed under section 1183."

And no sound reason has been suggested in the briefs, and none has occurred to us, for holding that the requirement as to notice was not intended as well to apply to the statutory completion of a building as to the actual completion thereof.

"The words 'shall be deemed equivalent to a completion' mean shall be equal in legal effect to a completion; that is, shall be treated, for the purpose of filing a lien, as an actual completion." Mill & Lumber Co. v. Olmstead, 85 Cal. 80, 84, 24 Pac. 648.

The object of the statute in requiring notice to be given in any case is not only to prevent the filing of premature liens, and thus the unseasonable and unnecessary embarrassment of the property of the owner, but, principally, to protect the claimant from losing his right to a lien or suffering it to lapse by default, due to his want of knowledge of some sort of the date on which the time within which he is required to file his lien has commenced to run so that he may preserve and have the benefit of the remedy granted to him by the Constitution. The Legislature certainly could not have intended that lien claimants, in the cases of statutory completion, other than those where the owner is required to file a notice, should be compelled to exercise constant vigil over the movements of the owner to see whether he had commenced occupation of the building or had accepted it before its actual completion. Indeed, it would be impossible for the claimant to know whether occupation before actual completion had taken place, since clearly "occupation," within the meaning of the statute, involves not a question of fact alone, but also a question of law. An owner, for reasons of convenience, might enter into the occupation of a building while it is still in course of completion, with the understanding that it is not then to be accepted and that the work of completion shall be proceeded with. Hence occupation is a question of law to be determined upon the circumstances under which it occurs. The argument that, following out to its logical conclusion that the provision as to notice applies to all the events constituting a constructive completion, would lead to the absurdity of requiring notice to be given of the filing of the notice of the completion of a contract or of the cessation from labor, is far-fetched and fallacious. The notice of the completion of the building, or of the cessation from labor, is itself notice of the event. The effect of filing a notice of the completion of a building in the office of the county recorder is, it is true, only to give constructive notice of that fact, but it is the legal and common method for giving such notice and by it parties whose rights in the subject to which the notice relates are affected are, according to the legislative judgment, the more likely to obtain actual knowledge of the facts which the notice must contain. But, whether they do or do not acquire actual knowledge of the fact or facts which the notice must contain, there should be, as a matter of public policy, some legal foundation for charging them with notice, which cannot be done where the act as to which some kind of notice should be had is left to the capriciously exercised option of an individual.

It follows from the views thus ventured that, conceding it to be true that lien claimants must file their claims of lien within 30 days after the happening of the first act which constitutes a completion, whether the same be actual or statutory, or, in other words, that they cannot exercise the option of filing their liens within 30 days after any one of several events of completion which have occurred on different dates, the plaintiffs were not bound by the fact of the occupation of the building on the 17th of October, assuming that such occupation amounted to the completion of the building within the contemplation of the statute in such case. They, in other words, could not be charged with notice of such completion, and even if they had been shown to have had actual knowledge of the fact, the defendants, under the express and mandatory terms of the statute, would have been estopped from basing any defense against the assertion of their right to the lien on the ground of the failure to file the same within time.

It further follows from the views above expressed that the finding that "on October 17, 1912, defendants Charles H. Waldmann and Nellie V. Waldmann entered into, and ever since have been in the actual and exclusive use and occupation of said building" was wholly unnecessary, and, indeed, supererogatory, and is therefore immaterial, assuming that the finding was intended to declare as a fact that the building or contract had been constructively completed by occupation.

[5, 6] The lien upon which the plaintiffs rely, however, has reference to the actual completion of the building on the 26th day of October, 1912. This lien, as we have seen, was filed on the 20th day of November, 1912, and is the lien pleaded in the first count of the complaint and the one to which the court found the plaintiffs to be entitled.

As above stated, it is contended by the appellants that the evidence does not support the finding that the building was actually completed on the 26th day of October, 1912. The record does not support the contention.

The defendant C. H. Waldmann testified that the last work done on the building was by the painter on the 26th day of October, 1912. On that day he did some work of painting on the house. It required him about two hours to do the work. This work was done, it is to be assumed, in pursuance of the building contract or the specifications attached thereto as a part thereof. The court was justified from this testimony in finding, as it did, that the building was completed on the 26th day of October. So long as the work performed was called for by the contract and essential to the completion of the building, the extent of the work or the length of time required to do it is wholly immaterial, for in such case the last stroke of the painter's brush marked the time of the completion. It may be true that if, when the lien was filed and it was sought to enforce it through a judicial decree, the two hours' work of the painter was still unfinished, and such work constituted all that was necessary to complete the building according to the terms and conditions of the contract and specifications, the omission to do that work might justly be treated as a "trivial imperfection" in the work of completion; but this argues nothing against the proposition above stated that the finishing of the work of painting marked the date of the actual completion of the building, said work being all that was necessary actually to complete it.

But there is some other testimony, or, strictly speaking, an admission by the appellants, which tends to support the finding that the building was actually completed on the 26th day of October. The complaint, in the second cause of action therein stated, alleges that the appellants, on the 30th day of November, 1912, filed for record in the office of the county recorder of the city and county of San Francisco their notice "wherein it was stated that a cessation of labor on said building had occurred October 26, 1912," etc. This averment is not denied by the answer, and it therefore stands in the record as an admitted fact. It matters not what the purpose of the filing of said notice by appellants or the pleading of the fact by the plaintiffs was, the fact is consistent with and supports the finding that the building was actually completed on October 26th, and it constituted a fact in the case which it was competent and proper for the court to consider in reaching a conclusion upon the question of actual completion.

[7] But it is further insisted, with respect to the finding of actual completion, that it constitutes no finding at all upon that question, inasmuch as the finding does not definitely fix the date upon which the actual completion occurred. The finding is, as seen, that the building "was duly completed and constructed, except for a trivial imperfection in such construction, by Felix Marcuse, according to the terms of the contract * * * on or about October 26, 1912, and subsequent to October 20, 1912."

The finding would, ordinarily, be held to be rather indefinite and, perhaps, would, standing alone, be insufficient to support the judgment. But, as has been shown, the appellants admitted that there was a cessation from labor on October 26th, and this admission must be viewed as a part of the findings. And viewed as a part of the findings and considered with the finding above referred to, it becomes reasonably clear and certain from the findings that the actual completion of the building occurred on the 26th day of October. But we think that the phrase "on or about" should be held to mean either the day mentioned or a day in very near proximity thereto. It cannot reasonably be held to mean, in other words, if not the day designated, a day 10, 15, or 20 days therefrom. Ordinarily, it is understood to refer to a day or two before or subsequent to the day specifically named. The lien of the plaintiffs was filed on the 20th day of November, 1912; the finding declares that the building was completed subsequent to the 20th day of October and "on or about" or within a day or two of the 26th day of October. In this view, the finding makes it reasonably clear and definite that the lien was filed within 30 days after the completion of the building.

The next objection is that the finding as to the extra work done and extra materials furnished by the plaintiffs and as to the reasonableness of the value of the same does not derive sufficient support from the evidence.

We cannot, at the expense of extending this opinion beyond its present length, reproduce herein testimony or the substance thereof which we think sustains the finding referred to. It must suffice for us to say that we have carefully examined the testimony and therefrom have been convinced that the court was amply justified in making said finding. There are no other points requiring special notice.

The judgment is affirmed.

BANK OF CALIFORNIA, NATIONAL ASS'N, v. ROBERTS, State Treasurer. (S. F. 6602.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Oct. 20, 1916.)

1. TAXATION — 127, 128 — PERSONS LIABLE — BANK STOCK — DOUBLE TAXATION.

Under Const. art. 13, § 14, as to taxation of personalty and bank stock, the proper procedure is to tax the stock in the hands of the holder, and it may also be taxed against the bank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 230-232, 233, 234; Dec. Dig. — 127, 128.]

2. TAXATION — 47(1) — DOUBLE TAXATION — VALIDITY.

In the absence of express constitutional provision, there is no necessary or inherent objection to taxing the same property twice to different persons, so long as there is some kind of estate or right in both persons taxed to the taxed property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 104, 111, 112, 114; Dec. Dig. — 47(1).]

3. TAXATION — 47(6) — DOUBLE TAXATION — BANK STOCK.

Although Const. art. 13, § 1, originally provided that all property must be taxed in proportion to its value, it does not, as it now stands, providing that it must be taxed according to its value except as otherwise provided, limit the power under art. 13, § 14, to tax bank stock against the holders thereof and against the bank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 110; Dec. Dig. — 47(6).]

4. TAXATION — 10 — POWER TO TAX — NATIONAL BANKS.

Rev. St. U. S. § 5219 (U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 9784), authorizing states to include all the shares of national banks in the valuation and assessment of personal property of the owner of such shares subject to restrictions, one of which is that the tax shall not be at a greater rate than on other moneyed capital, contemplates taxation of shares in state banks owned by national banks.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the Bank of California, National Association, against E. D. Roberts, Treasurer of State. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Raymond Benjamin, Chief Dep. Atty. Gen., for appellants. Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro, A. E. Roth, and A. D. Plaw, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover taxes paid under protest, and recovered judgment for $7,479.68. The defendant appeals from the judgment, which was rendered on the pleadings. The plaintiff is a banking corporation organized under the National Banking Act of the United States. It has a capital stock of 85,000 shares, of the par value of $100 each. In the year 1911, the state board of equalization assessed these 85,000 shares at the sum of $15,531,588, and assessed and levied a tax of 1 per centum thereon. During the year 1911, the plaintiff was the owner of 2,501 shares of the capital stock of the National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co., likewise a corporation organized under said National Bank Act. It was also the owner of 1,049 shares of the capital stock of the Mission Bank, a banking corporation organized under the laws of the state of California. The board of equalization, in assessing the 85,000 shares of the capital stock of the plaintiff, included in its valuation the value of the 2,501 shares of stock in the National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. and the value of the 1,049 shares of stock in the Mission Bank. The shares of stock of the National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. and of the Mission Bank were assessed in like manner by the state board of equalization, and the tax was levied upon all of the shares of these banks, including those owned by the plaintiff. The plaintiff claimed that this course of procedure resulted in a double taxation of the shares of stock in the two banks owned by it, and applied to the board of equalization to exclude from the assessment of its shares the value of the said shares of the two other banks. This application having been denied, the plaintiff paid its tax under protest. The tax on the 2,501 shares of the stock of the National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. amounted to $6,278.67. The tax upon the 1,049 shares of the Mission Bank came to $1,201.01. These sums having been paid under protest, the plaintiff brought this action to recover them.

[1] The taxes here involved were levied in accordance with the provisions added to the Constitution by the amendments adopted in November, 1910. Article 13, § 14. As we have heretofore said, these amendments—"worked a radical change in the system of taxation in this state. Broadly speaking, the purpose of the change, as is well known, was to divide the subjects of state and local taxation by imposing upon persons and corporations engaged in certain callings—those of public service corporations, insurance companies, banks, and trust companies—the obligation to pay certain taxes, to be applied exclusively to state purposes. At the same time, the persons engaged and the property employed in these callings were, to a greater or less degree, to be free from the burden of local taxation. * * * Under the old system, the property and franchises of the corporations above referred to were taxed for both state and local purposes. The amendment creates a new mode of taxing such property and franchises, and appropriates the revenue so raised to state purposes solely." City and County of San Francisco v. Pacific Tel. & Telegraph Co., 166 Cal. 244, 247, 135 Pac. 971, 973.

Subdivision (c) of section 14, thus added to the Constitution, provides in detail for the method of assessing and taxing banks. It is provided that the shares of the capital stock of all banks incorporated under the laws of any state or of the United States and located in this state shall be assessed and taxed to the owners or holders thereof by the state board of equalization, and that there shall be levied and assessed upon such shares an annual tax, payable to the state, of 1 per centum upon the value thereof. The value of each share of stock is to be taken to be the amount paid in thereon, together with its pro rata of the accumulated surplus and undivided profits. In reaching this result, deduction is to be made of the value of real estate owned by the bank and taxed for county purposes. It is provided that the banks shall pay the tax to the state on behalf of the stockholders and shall have a lien upon the shares and any dividends to secure the amount so paid.

This subdivision contains a detailed and comprehensive scheme for the valuation of the shares of stock of banks. It declares that the value shall be taken to be the amount paid in on the stock, together with the pro rata of the accumulated surplus and undivided profits. Provision is made for the deduction of one item of property, to wit, real estate taxed for county purposes. No other deduction is directed to be made, and it seems clear, under the most familiar rules of interpretation, that none other was contemplated. So far as the face of the constitutional provision goes, the value of the shares is to be computed by including, in addition to the amount paid in on the stock, every item of property embraced within accumulated surplus and undivided profits, with the single exception of real estate taxed for county purposes. The board of equalization acted, therefore, in strict compliance with the constitutional method when it fixed the value of the shares of stock in the plaintiff bank by taking the amount paid in, together with the pro rata of the accumulated surplus and undivided profits, subject to a deduction of the value of the designated real estate alone. The shares of stock in other corporations, whether engaged in banking or other business, were necessarily included in determining the amount on which this pro rata was to be reckoned. Similarly, in fixing the value of the shares of stock in the National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. and in the Mission Bank, the board was required to follow the same course. Its ascertainment of the value of the shares of stock in those banks, by whomsoever owned or held, was reached by adding to the amount paid in the pro rata of the accumulated surplus and undivided profits of the respective banks after making the deduction of real estate.

The respondent claims that by a long line of decisions beginning with Burke v. Badlam, 57 Cal. 594, this court has established the doctrine that the sum total of the value of the shares of stock in a corporation is the equivalent of the value of all of the property of every kind, including franchises, owned by the corporation. Spring Valley Water Works v. Schottler, 62 Cal. 69, 115, et seq.; City and County of San Francisco v. Anderson, 103 Cal. 69, 36 Pac. 1034, 42 Am. St. Rep. 98; People v. National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co., 123 Cal. 53, 60, 55 Pac. 685, 45 L.

R. A. 747, 69 Am. St. Rep. 32; Bank of California v. San Francisco, 142 Cal. 276, 75 Pac. 832, 64 L. R. A. 918, 100 Am. St. Rep. 130; Crocker v. Scott, 149 Cal. 575, 87 Pac. 102. It was upon this theory that the court held that section 3608 of the Political Code, prohibiting any assessment of the shares of stock of state corporations, was not in conflict with section 1, art. 13, of the Constitution, which declared that all property should be taxed in proportion to its value, and defined the word "property" as including, among other things, "stocks." Burke v. Badlam, supra. The cases have, for their foundation, the proposition that an assessment and taxation of every item and element of property owned by the corporation and giving value to its stock is, in effect, an assessment and taxation of the stock itself. And, basing its argument upon this proposition, the plaintiff bank contends that, when the shares of stock issued by it are assessed and taxed upon a valuation which includes the value of shares of stock owned by it in other banks, and those shares are again assessed upon a separate ascertainment of their value, the state is undertaking to tax the same property twice. On the other hand, the appellant argues that there is not, in reality, any question of double taxation here. In assessing the shares of stock in the plaintiff a tax is imposed upon the owners and holders of those shares. The plaintiff pays the tax only on behalf of the holders. In assessing the shares of stock in the National Bank of D. O. Mills & Co. and the Mission Bank, the tax is imposed, not upon those banks, but upon the holders of the shares, whoever they may be. The plaintiff as one of such holders is, so the appellant contends, no more entitled to exemption from the tax than is any other shareholder. The Supreme Court of the United States has consistently held that a tax upon the shares is not the equivalent of a tax upon the capital of the bank (see Owensboro N. B. v. Owensboro, 173 U. S. 677, 19 Sup. Ct. 537, 43 L. Ed. 850, and cases cited), and that the state may properly impose a tax upon the full value of the shares of stock in a national bank, regardless of the fact that the property of the bank, which gives those shares their value, may be in part composed of bonds of the United States or other property exempt from taxation (Van Allen v. Assessors, 3 Wall. 573, 18 L. Ed. 229; People v. Tax Com'rs, 4 Wall. 244, 18 L. Ed. 344).

[2] We need not stop to inquire whether these decisions proceed upon a theory in conflict with the views announced by this court in Burke v. Badlam and subsequent decisions to like effect. Let it be assumed that the assessment here complained of did result in double taxation. In the absence of express constitutional provision, there is, however, no necessary or inherent objection to taxing the same property twice to different persons "so long, at least, as there is some kind of estate or right, in both persons taxed, to the taxed property." Gray on Limitation of Taxing Power, §§ 1361, 1363; Cooley on Taxation (3d Ed.) p. 389 et seq.

Such taxation does not contravene any provision of the federal Constitution. "It is no doubt within the power of a state, when not restrained by constitutional limitations, to assess taxes upon them [i. e., property of the corporation and shares of stock in the hands of the individual stockholders], in a way to subject the corporation or the stockholders to double taxation." Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 129, 136, 137, 6 Sup. Ct. 645, 29 L. Ed. 830.

[3] Does the Constitution of California prohibit such double taxation as may be involved in the assessment here complained of? No doubt our Constitution, as it stood prior to the amendments of 1910, did contain such prohibition. Section 1, art. 13, as it originally read, provided that: "All property in the state, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law." This is the language which was held, in the cases above cited, to forbid double taxation. "All property" is not taxed in proportion to its value if some of it is taxed once and some of it more than once upon the ascertained value. Burke v. Badlam, supra. But when the new system of taxing certain corporations for state purposes was embodied in the Constitution, section 1 was also amended. That section was made to read as follows:

"All property in the state except as otherwise in this Constitution provided, not exempt under the laws of the United States, shall be taxed in proportion to its value, to be ascertained as provided by law, or as hereinafter provided."

The change consisted in the addition of the italicized words. Here is an express declaration that the general rule, requiring property to be taxed in proportion to its value, shall be subject to the qualification that such proportionate method of taxation shall not apply where the Constitution makes other provision. It has, as we have seen, made other provision for the assessment of bank property. The respondent claims that the words "except as otherwise in this Constitution provided" qualify merely the subject of the sentence, to wit, "all property in the state." In other words, the contention is that this qualifying clause was meant to cover only the exemptions specifically provided for in section 1 and subsequent sections of article 13. This is a strained interpretation of the language. The amendments to section 1 and to section 14 were proposed and adopted at the same time, and there can be no doubt that the changes formed parts of a single comprehensive scheme. The plan of section 14 is in various respects inconsistent with the idea that the property therein described shall be assessed in proportion to its value.

The taxes levied, while described as taxes upon the property of corporations, are not based upon any mode of ascertaining either the proportionate or the absolute value of such property. Thus, in subdivision "a," railroad, telegraph, telephone, gas or electric and certain other companies are subjected to a tax of a certain percentage of their gross receipts from operations within this state. Subdivision "b" imposes upon insurance companies a tax of 1½ per cent. upon the amount of the gross premiums received. Such taxes cannot, upon any fair construction, be said to comply with a requirement that all property shall be taxed in proportion to its value. Surely it was not believed, when section 14 was adopted, that the method of taxation therein provided for should be limited or controlled by any general provision such as that theretofore contained in section 1. The amendment of section 1 was designed to avoid any possible conflict with section 14. Even if, however, there should be any opposition between the general terms of section 1 and the provisions of section 14, the latter, as the more specific and particular enactment, would prevail.

[4] The respondent makes a further point. Since national banks constitute an agency of the United States, created for the carrying out of governmental purposes, property of such banks and shares of stock in the same cannot be taxed by a state except in so far as such taxation is permitted by act of Congress. The requisite permission is granted by section 5219 of the Revised Statutes. That section authorizes the several states to include all the shares of national banks in the valuation and assessment of personal property of the owner or holder of such shares, subject to the restrictions: (1) That the tax shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital, and (2) that shares owned by nonresidents of the state shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located. The claim is made that this statute does not authorize the assessment of the personal property of national banks to the banks, and that the state is not therefore authorized to assess to the plaintiff, through the Mission Bank, the plaintiff's shares in that bank. In Bank of Redemption v. Boston, 125 U. S. 60, 8 Sup. Ct. 772, 31 L. Ed. 689, it was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that section 5219 of the Revised Statutes does not prevent the taxation of the shares of a national bank in the hands of another national bank. No different rule could be applied to the taxation of shares in a state bank owned by a national bank without violating the provision of section 5219 requiring "other moneyed capital" to be assessed at a rate equal to that imposed upon shares in national banks. If the section authorizes the taxation of shares owned by a national bank in another national bank, it must necessarily contemplate a like taxation of shares in states banks similarly owned.

The judgment is reversed.

PALERMO LAND & WATER CO. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Sac. 2383.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Oct. 20, 1916.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⚡257(1)—WATER COMPANIES—"PUBLIC UTILITY."

Relative to a company, which sold land with covenant to furnish water for irrigating it, being a public utility, and so subject to the jurisdiction of the Railroad Commission, the provision of the covenant, that the water was to be supplied "at such rates as may be fixed by law in the district in which said lands are situated," shows that the parties contemplated that the rates should be fixed by public authority; and the fixing of rates by public authority implies that the service is to be that of a public utility, the right to regulate a service existing only when such service is one affected by a public interest.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Public Utility.]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⚡257(1)—WATER COMPANIES—PUBLIC UTILITY—SUBMISSION TO COMMISSION.

The submission to the Railroad Commission, by a company selling land with covenant to supply water for irrigating it, of the establishment of its rates for water, makes the use a public one, and it a public utility, subject to jurisdiction of the Commission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 312; Dec. Dig. ⚡257(1).]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⚡256 — WATER COMPANIES—JURISDICTION OF RAILROAD COMMISSION.

Under Public Utilities Act (St. 1911, Extra Sess. p. 35) § 31, empowering the Railroad Commission to regulate every public utility, and to do, in addition to everything specifically designated, anything necessary in the exercise of such power, and St. 1913, p. 84, authorizing it to regulate water companies and require them to serve additional consumers, on application for an order requiring service, it has jurisdiction to determine the disputed fact whether applicant is within the class of those entitled to the service.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. ⚡256.]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⚡156(9)—WATER RIGHTS—COVENANTS—FORFEITURE.

The covenants, in deeds of land, that the grantor will furnish water for irrigation, if the grantee shall at any time plant trees or vines, or otherwise cultivate the lands, being the consideration for the payment of prices for the lands above their value without water, are a present grant of a water right, constituting a burden or servitude on the grantor's water system, and not a mere agreement to sell personal property in the future, so that the grantees, being the owners of an interest in the water right, do not lose their right to water by mere failure to cultivate and to demand water, or by cessation of cultivation and of demand for water after cultivation was begun and water was furnished; but there must be notice of forfeiture and lapse thereafter of the period of limitation.

In Bank. Certiorari by the Palermo Land & Water Company against the Railroad Commission of the State of California and its members to review its order. Order affirmed.

McCutchen, Olney & Willard, of San Francisco, for petitioner. Norman A. Eisner, of San Francisco, for Security Inv. Co. Douglas Brookman, of San Francisco (Max Thelen, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Certiorari to review an order of the Railroad Commission. The Palermo Land & Water Company (hereinafter termed the "Palermo Company") was incorporated in 1888. It acquired a tract of land, known as the "Palermo Colony," situate in Butte county, and also the right to divert water from the South fork of the Feather river. It acquired or constructed canals, ditches, and the necessary appurtenances for conducting such water upon the lands in said Palermo Colony for purposes of irrigation. It has offered for sale and sold certain lands in said Palermo Colony, the conveyance in each case containing a provision for supplying water. The Security Investment Company, a corporation (which, for brevity, we shall call "Investment Company"), is the successor in interest of purchasers of three lots thus sold by the Palermo Company. Said Investment Company demanded of the Palermo Company that it furnish water for said lots. The demand was refused. Thereupon the Investment Company applied to the Railroad Commission for an order requiring the Palermo Company to furnish said water. The application was resisted, and after a hearing an order was made requiring said Palermo Company to supply the water as demanded. It is this order which is brought under review by the present proceeding.

The land owned by the Investment Company is described as lots 1 and 8 of block 88, and lot 1 of block 87, of subdivision No. 1 of the Palermo Citrus Tract; said tract being within the Palermo Colony. Lot 1 of block 87, containing 7.17 acres, and lot 1 of block 88, containing 8.43 acres, were conveyed to the predecessors of the Investment Company by the Palermo Company on November 30, 1891. The deed of conveyance (in which the grantor was the party of the first part) contained the following covenant:

"And it is further agreed that if the party of the second part, or his heirs or assigns, shall at any time plant trees or vines, or otherwise cultivate said lands, or any part thereof, the party of the first part will furnish from its ditches, up to the line of said land nearest to the main or branch ditch, pipe, or flume of said party of the first part, such water as may be necessary to irrigate such trees, vines, or cultivated crops, not exceeding one miner's inch for every seven acres so improved or cultivated, at such rates as may be fixed by law in the district in which said lands are situated. * * *

Lot 8 of block 88, containing 8.36 acres, was conveyed to the predecessor of the Investment Company on May 25, 1888. The deed in this instance contained a covenant like the one above quoted, except that it made the right to water conditional upon the planting of trees or vines or the cultivation of the lands at any time prior to July 1, 1889, and provided for the furnishing of water without charge for four years after the commencement of cultivation.

A portion of lot 1 in block 88, containing 4.78 acres of land, has received water for many years, and the right to water for this parcel is not in controversy. The remainder of this lot was planted to olive trees in 1913. When the Investment Company demanded water for its irrigation, the demand was refused. No water has ever been delivered to this part of lot 1 of block 88. Lot 1 of block 87 has never received water from the Palermo Company. It was planted to olive and peach trees in 1914, and a demand then made for water was refused. Lot 8 of block 88 was planted to olive trees prior to July 1, 1889, the date named in the deed conveying this lot, and water was furnished up to 1892. Some new trees were planted by the Investment Company in 1912 and 1913, and demand for water for this lot was made in 1911 or 1912, and refused. The ground upon which the Palermo Company refused to furnish the water was that lot 1 of block 87 and the portion of lot 1, block 88, which had not received water, had lost the right to be so supplied, for the reason that there had been no planting or cultivation of said lands and no demand for water for over 20 years after the conveyance of said lots by the Palermo Company to the predecessors of the Investment Company. With respect to lot 8 of block 88 the claim was that, while the right to have water had once attached by the planting of trees and the delivery of water, such right had been lost by a cessation of cultivation and demand for water, extending over a like period of about 20 years.

The Commission found that the Palermo Company had a sufficient supply of water to enable it to supply the lands of the Investment Company in addition to all of the other lands in the Palermo Colony which were then being irrigated. It found further that the complainant, the Investment Company, was entitled to receive water from the system of the Palermo Company, and directed that such water be supplied.

[1] The petitioner contends that it is not a public utility, and is, therefore, not subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission. The Palermo Company, it is claimed, has not offered its water to the public, but has merely entered into "private contractual obligations * * * to deliver water to certain lots which it has sold with a water right." Burr v. Maclay R. W. Co., 160 Cal. 268, 280, 116 Pac. 715, 721. Attention is directed to several decisions of this court holding that such disposition of water "is essentially a matter of private contract and it shows no intent to create a public use." Thayer v. California D. Co., 164 Cal. 117, 128 Pac. 21; Burr v. Maclay R. W. Co., supra; Hildreth v. Montecito, etc., Co., 139 Cal. 22, 72 Pac. 395; Barton v. Riverside W. Co., 155 Cal. 518, 101 Pac. 790. It is further argued that, if our statutory provisions (St. 1913, p. 84; St. 1915, p. 1273) are to be construed as declaring that water companies of this character are public utilities, such statutes are in violation of both the federal and state Constitutions. We do not, however, feel called upon to go into the constitutional questions thus suggested, for the reason that we feel satisfied that, without regard to statutory provisions, the conduct of the Palermo Company was such as to take its operations out of the category of a private use as defined by Thayer v. Development Co. and like cases.

In the first place, the covenants providing for the furnishing of water to land sold by the Palermo Company provided that the water was to be supplied "at such rates as may be fixed by law in the district in which said lands are situated." In the very inception of the right, therefore, it appears that the parties contemplated that the rates to be charged should be those fixed by public authority. The fixing of rates by public authority in itself implies that the service is to be that of a public utility. The right to regulate the price of a service exists only when such service is one affected by a public interest.

[2] But, apart from this consideration, it appears that in December, 1912, the Palermo Company applied to the Railroad Commission to have its rates for water established and that the Commission made its order allowing an increase in the rates theretofore in effect. Vol. III, Opinions and Orders of the Railroad Commission, p. 1247. The case, therefore, falls directly within the doctrine of Franscioni v. Soledad Land & Water Co., 170 Cal. 221, 149 Pac. 161, where we held that as against the water company such submission to the authority of the regulating body was effective to "change the use from a private and particular use to a public use, so as to make the service and terms of delivery subject to regulation and control by public authority." No valid distinction can be drawn between the Franscioni Case and the one before us.

[3] The petitioner's next contention is that the Railroad Commission was without jurisdiction, because the Palermo Company was in good faith disputing the right of the Investment Company to have water supplied to its lands. The argument is that the Railroad Commission is primarily an administrative body, and that it has no authority to act judicially in determining the existence of a disputed right. We see no force in this contention. By the Public Utilities Act (St. 1911, Extra Sess., p. 18) the Commission is vested with power and jurisdiction "to supervise and regulate every public utility in the state and to do all things, whether herein specifically designated or in addition thereto, which are necessary and convenient in the exercise of such power and jurisdiction." Section 31. The act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 84) expressly authorizes the Commission to regulate water companies and to require them to serve additional consumers. We may concede, for the purposes of the discussion, that the authority to order service does not include authority to compel a water company to supply water to persons or lands not within the scope of the dedication which has been made. Nevertheless, on an application for an order requiring service, the Commission must necessarily determine, as a preliminary issue, whether the applicant is within the class of those entitled to the service. Whenever a court or board is authorized to act upon the existence of a certain state of facts, it has jurisdiction to determine the existence or non-existence of the requisite facts. 11 Cyc. 701; In re Grove Street, 61 Cal. 438, 453. Its jurisdiction cannot be affected by the circumstance that these facts are denied.

[4] We come to the final contention of the petitioner, which is that the Investment Company was not, in law and fact, entitled to have water supplied to its lands. The argument is that the only dedication to public use was one limited by the terms of the covenant contained in the deeds executed by the Palermo Company. The deeds conveying lot 1 of block 87 and lot 1 of block 88 provide that "water shall be furnished if the grantee, his heirs or assigns, shall at any time plant trees or vines or otherwise cultivate said lands." The position taken with respect to the effect of this clause is thus stated in the opening brief:

"Petitioner's offer that, if at any time the land is placed under cultivation, petitioner will supply it with water, cannot be construed as running in perpetuity. It must be held to be limited to a reasonable time."

Cases are cited declaring that where no time is specified the law implies a reasonable time, and that the use of the phrase "at any time" will not prevent the implication. The soundness of the rule thus declared is not open to question. We think, however, that it is not applicable to the situation here presented. The cases cited had to do with contracts giving a party the right, at his election, to claim a privilege. Here we have something more. The findings of the Commission show that the Palermo Company sold its land at prices ranging from $50 to $100 per acre in excess of the value of the land without water, and that the additional price was paid in reliance on the agreement of the company to supply the necessary water. It can hardly be supposed to have been in the contemplation of a grantee taking land under these conditions that the water right for which he had thus paid would be forfeited to the grantor because of his failure to make use of it within any given time. The covenants in the deeds were not a mere agreement to sell personal property in the future. They were a present grant of a water right, which constituted a burden or servitude upon the water system of the grantor. Stanislaus Water Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 725, 93 Pac. 858, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 359; Southern Pacific v. Spring Valley Water Co. (S. F. No. 6846, decided August 22, 1916) 159 Pac. 865. The grantees thus being the owners of an interest in the water right, the case falls directly under the authority of Copeland v. Fairview Land Co., 165 Cal. 148, 131 Pac. 119. As is there pointed out, an easement acquired by grant is not lost by mere disuse. Smith v. Worn, 93 Cal. 212, 28 Pac. 944; Currier v. Howes, 103 Cal. 431, 37 Pac. 521; People v. Southern P. Co., 172 Cal. —, 158 Pac. 180. In the Copeland Case the court says that where one acquiring a water right sells an interest in it to another, and thereafter continues to divert the water himself for the vendee, the fact that the vendee does not demand or use the water he has bought will not—

"forfeit his right thereto to the vendor, who has in the meantime continued the diversion, unless such vendor in some manner informs the vendee that such forfeiture will be claimed because of nonuse, or asserts it against him by some hostile act. Mere failure to take and use the water for which he has, at the time, no need, will not forfeit the right to the vendor, in such a case." 165 Cal. 166, 131 Pac. 126.

The Palermo Company never gave the Investment Company or its predecessors any notice that it regarded the right to water as terminated until 1912, about 2 years before the proceeding was instituted before the Railroad Commission. The right was, of course, not lost by limitation during that period. We conclude, therefore, that there is no merit in the claim that the Investment Company lost its right to demand water, either by reason of its failure to plant trees and demand water for lot 1, block 87, and lot 1, block 88, or by reason of its cessation of cultivation and of demand for water for lot 8 of block 88.

The order is affirmed.

TAXATION 909—STATE AND LOCAL TAXES—
REIMBURSEMENT—"DISTRICT."

A city is not a "district" within Const. art. 13, § 14, providing that the Legislature shall reimburse districts for loss by withdrawal of property from local taxation, when taxed for state purposes only, or within Stats. 1911, p. 556, § 32, effectuating such provision.

In Bank. Application for writ of mandate by the City of San Bernardino against S. V. Horton and others, as the Board of Supervisors of San Bernardino County. Application denied.

Byron Waters and Willis & Guthrie, all of San Bernardino, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of mandate. The sole question presented is whether a municipality, the city of San Bernardino in this instance, is a "district" within the meaning of that word as used in that part of subdivision "f" of section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution reading as follows: "The Legislature shall provide for reimbursement from the general funds of any county to districts therein where loss is occasioned in such districts by the withdrawal from local taxation of property taxed for state purposes only"—and in section 32 of an act of the Legislature to carry into effect the provisions of section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution, approved April 1, 1911 (Stats. 1911, pp. 530, 556).

The court is unanimously of the view that it is not a district within the meaning of the word as used in these provisions.

The application for a writ of mandate is denied.

MOLERA v. COOPER. (S. F. 7619.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 4, 1916.)

1. PLEADING 8(7)—FACTS AND CONCLUSIONS
OF LAW.

Where defense to action on note by executor was that defendant agreed, in 1911, in consideration of release by testator of obligation on the note, to hold the amount of the note and interest in trust for and during the minority of two beneficiaries, but did not allege that defendant then had in her possession or under her control the money owing on the note, or that she had at any time since devoted it to the trust, or that she was then and had been since solvent, the allegation that the defendant had, ever since that agreement, "held and does now hold said amount of money upon the trust proposed" was not to be construed as meaning that the defendant then had the money in hand, or had at any time since then possessed the same and devoted it to said trust, but was a conclusion of the pleader upon the facts previously stated in the endeavor to allege a valid trust.

2. TRUSTS 35(1)—CREATION—EXISTENCE OF RES.

A mere promise to obtain money and thereupon hold it in trust does not create a trust until it is at least so far executed that the money has been obtained in accordance with the promise.

3. BILLS AND NOTES 437 — EXTINGUISHMENT—CREATION OF TRUST.

A parol agreement by maker of note with the payee, in consideration of release of note, to hold the amount thereof in trust for minor beneficiaries, which agreement did not appear to have been carried out by the appropriation of any specific sum for that purpose, was ineffectual to extinguish the note, since it was an attempt to alter a written agreement by an unexecuted parol agreement, contrary to Civ. Code, § 1698, providing that a contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise.

4. NOVATION 7 — SUBSTITUTION OF NEW CREDITOR.

Under Civ. Code, § 1531, defining a novation, agreement by the maker of a note with the payee to hold the amount thereof in trust for minor beneficiaries in consideration of release of the note was not effective as a novation, where the minor beneficiaries did not accept the arrangement or agree to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Novation, Cent. Dig. § 7; Dec. Dig. 7.]

5. NOVATION 6—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Agreement by maker of note with the payee to hold the amount thereof in trust for beneficiaries named does not constitute a novation under Civ. Code, § 1531; no new obligation being created and no new creditor being substituted.

6. INTEREST 50—TENDER OF INTEREST—EFFECT.

Under Civ. Code, § 1504, providing that an offer of payment duly made stops the running of interest on the obligation, the tender of interest due after maturity of a note, on which both principal and interest were owing, did not stop the running of interest upon the principal, but only on the interest tendered.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Eusebius J. Molera, as executor of the last will of Ana M. Wohler, deceased, against Mabel Ellsworth Cooper. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Carlton W. Greene, of Paso Robles, for appellant. Chas. W. Slack and Chauncey S. Goodrich, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff sued upon a promissory note for $1,000 executed to the testatrix, Ana M. Wohler, by the defendant. A demurrer to the third amended answer was sustained, and judgment was thereupon given for the plaintiff. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

The note sued on was dated July 2, 1909, and was payable two years after date. The first count of said answer alleges that on April 10, 1911, it was agreed between the defendant and Mrs. Wohler that in consideration of the extinguishment of said note by Mrs. Wohler and the release by her of all obligation of the defendant upon said note, the defendant would thereupon hold said amount of $1,000 and interest from the date of said note, in trust, and would thenceforth apply and pay the same to the joint use and benefit of Isabel Ellsworth Cooper and Gladys Greene Cooper, in equal shares; that during the minority of said two beneficiaries the defendant would apply said moneys according to the discretion of her, said defendant; that said Ana M. Wohler accepted said agreement and declaration of trust of the defendant in full satisfaction and extinction of said note and then and there verbally released the defendant from the obligation thereof, and that the defendant has ever since April 10, 1911, held said amount of money upon the said trust, and that said Isabel and Gladys own the entire beneficial interest in said sum of money, subject to the trust stated.

[1] It is not alleged that the defendant then had in her possession or under her control the money owing upon said note, or that she has at any time since procured the same and devoted the same to said trust, or that she was then, or has been since, solvent and able to do so. One ground of demurrer was that the answer was uncertain, in that it cannot be ascertained therefrom what particular moneys the defendant held in trust as set forth therein, or whether or not any specific amount of money was held in trust. In view of this ground of demurrer the allegation that the defendant has ever since April 10, 1911, "held and does now hold said amount of money upon the trust proposed" is not to be construed as meaning that the defendant then had the money in hand, or has at any time since then possessed the same and devoted it to said trust. If she had desired to allege these facts, she should have done so more specifically. The agreement is to be taken as a conclusion of the pleader upon the facts previously stated in the endeavor to allege a valid trust. The case must be considered upon the theory that all she did in regard to the creation of a trust was to agree that she would thenceforth hold the sum of money specified in the note in trust for the two children mentioned. It is alleged that these two children were minors, then of the age of eight and four years, respectively, and that the defendant and their father were joint guardians of the estates of said minors, and it is not alleged that either of them as guardian has agreed to the said arrangement with Mrs. Wohler.

[2, 3] It is clear that no trust was created by the aforesaid arrangement. There never was any property in existence which could be the subject of the trust. The debt owing from the defendant to Mrs. Wohler was a property right vested in Mrs. Wohler, but no property or estate therein was vested in the defendant which could be the subject of any trust. A mere promise to obtain money and thereupon hold it in trust does not create a trust until it is at least so far executed that the money has been obtained in accordance with the promise. Considered in that light, the agreement between the payor and the payee was ineffectual to alter or extinguish the note, since it was an attempt to alter a written agreement by an unexecuted parol agreement. Civ. Code, § 1698.

The decision in Booth v. Oakland Bank of Savings, 122 Cal. 19, 54 Pac. 370, is not authority for the proposition that a trust can be created by the mere promise of a debtor to the creditor to obtain money and hold it in trust for a third person. The subject-matter involved in that case was money on deposit in the bank. It is clear from a reading of the decision that the money was considered by the court as money actually in possession of the bank belonging to the depositor, and that the effect of the transaction was that the bank thereupon agreed to hold the money so on deposit in trust for the benefit of sisters of the depositor. In the present case, as we have said, there is no sufficient allegation that there was anything on hand to be made the subject of a trust.

[4, 5] Considered as a novation, it was ineffectual for the reason that the persons to whom the obligation was to run, the two children, did not accept the same or agree thereto. Under section 1531 of the Civil Code a novation is made—

"1. By the substitution of a new obligation between the same parties, with intent to extinguish the old obligation;

"2. By the substitution of a new debtor in place of the old one, with intent to release the latter; or,

"3. By the substitution of a new creditor in place of the old one, with intent to transfer the rights of the latter to the former."

The second mode is not involved. It is not claimed that any new debtor was substituted. It was ineffectual as a novation under the first mode and under the third mode because no new obligation was created and no new creditor was substituted. The proposal was to create a new obligation in favor of the two children. A novation whereby a new obligation to a third party is substituted cannot be made unless all agree. As is said in 3 Elliott on Contracts, § 1867:

"All must agree, for it requires the consent of the original parties to change the old contract or their relations to it and extinguish the liability, and of the parties to the new contract to create it."

The following cases announce the same doctrine: McKinney v. Alvis, 14 Ill. 33; Reid v. Degener, 82 Ill. 508; Commercial Bank v. Kirkwood, 172 Ill. 568, 50 N. E. 219; Kirchman v. Standard Coal Co., 112 Iowa, 673, 84 N. W. 939, 52 Am. St. Rep. 318; Darling v. Rutherford, 125 Mich. 70, 83 N. W. 999; Hanson v. Nelson, 82 Minn. 220, 84 N. W. 742. There was no new obligation created to the children, for neither they nor their guardians consented to it or accepted it. For the same reason there was no transfer to them of the rights of the original obligee. The arrangement lacked these essential elements of a novation.

[6] In the second count of the answer defendant alleged that on August 19, 1911, which was after the maturity of the note, she had tendered to the payee the amount of interest due upon the note which the payee refused to accept. This, it is claimed, stops the running of interest upon the note. Civ. Code, § 1504. At that date the defendant owed not only the interest but the principal of the note. The tender of the interest alone could not stop the running of further interest upon the principal, but at most only the running of interest upon the interest then tendered and refused. As no compound interest is demanded, this count is insufficient as a defense.

Addition to Opinion.

PER CURIAM. It appears from the record herein that the judgment entered in the superior court is erroneous in the matter of interest. In view of the provisions of the note, the plaintiff was entitled to interest at 5 per cent. per annum only to the date of judgment, while the judgment as entered awarded interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the maturity of the note to the date of judgment.

The judgment heretofore given by this court is modified to read as follows:

The portion of the judgment of the superior court commencing: "Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said plaintiff have judgment herein," etc., be and the same is hereby modified to read as follows, viz.: "Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said plaintiff have judgment herein against the said defendant for the sum of one thousand ($1,000) dollars, in gold coin of the United States, with interest thereon at the rate of five (5) per cent. per annum, from the 2d day of July, A. D. 1910, to the date hereof, and for his costs herein, amounting to the sum of $14.75. Dated this 25th day of March, A. D. 1914"—and, as so modified, is hereby affirmed. Appellant shall not recover her costs.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1916.)

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER — TRUTH OF ASSERTION—FELONIOUS ALTERING OF RECORD.

As regards truth of the assertion of an alleged libel that plaintiff was accused of a felony in altering a public record, it is enough that at his request the judgment book clerk marked out a satisfaction of judgment though for the purpose of bringing about justice and preventing a fraud; the intent in defacing the record being, under Pen. Code, §§ 113, 114, immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 152; Dec. Dig. 54.]

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER — PRIVILEGE—POLITICS.

A libelous newspaper article is not privileged within Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3, merely because about a person active in promoting his own political views.

3. LIBEL AND SLANDER — DEFENSE — PRIVILEGED OCCASION.

A libelous newspaper article cannot be excused on the ground that the occasion is privileged.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 148; Dec. Dig. 49.]

4. LIBEL AND SLANDER — JUSTIFICATION—HUMOROUS ARTICLE.

That a libelous newspaper article tends to cause merriment or is a facetious rejoinder to adverse criticism by others does not justify it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 154; Dec. Dig. 56(1).]

5. LIBEL AND SLANDER — CHARGING HYPOCRISY.

It is libelous per se to falsely charge that a person is a hypocrite.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. 6(1).]

6. TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO ISSUES.

An instruction authorizing verdict for defendant if it was proved true that plaintiff was a hypocrite was not within the issues; the answer merely denying that the published cartoon was susceptible of the imputation that he was a hypocrite.

9. LIBEL AND SLANDER — TRUTH — EVIDENCE.

Evidence in libel that at plaintiff's request to frustrate fraud of a party, satisfaction of judgment against whom plaintiff had just entered, the clerk marked out the satisfaction, is insufficient to sustain any implied finding that plaintiff was a hypocrite or in the habit of altering public records, but merely shows he was in error as to the lawful method of correcting the attempted fraud.

10. LIBEL AND SLANDER ☞ 19 — IMPLICATION FROM CARTOON.

An implied finding that a newspaper cartoon would not to an ordinary reader bear the meaning that plaintiff in libel was a hypocrite posing as a reformer is unwarranted, it being headed, "And These are Our Leading 'Reformers,'" below it being, "All hypocrites are sinners, but, thank God, all sinners are not hypocrites," and the persons, other than plaintiff, shown, being portrayed as engaged in transactions disreputable, dishonest, or ridiculous, and plaintiff with a sinister expression.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Dooling, Judge. Action by Nathan Newby against the Times-Mirror Company. From an adverse judgment and order, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. A. Meserve, Lewis R. Works, and William F. Palmer, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Hunsaker & Britt, Denis & Loewenthal and John A. Powell, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying him a new trial. The action is in damages for libel. The complaint contains six counts, each setting forth a different publication claimed to be libelous. The defendant is the publisher of the Los Angeles Times, a daily newspaper, of large and general circulation, published in the city of Los Angeles. The alleged libels consist of articles published in that newspaper. There was a trial by jury, resulting in a verdict for the defendant.

There was no substantial conflict in the evidence nor any serious dispute concerning the facts. The following are the facts to which the articles complained of relate and upon which they were founded:

Nathan Newby, at the time of the publications, in September, October and November, 1909, had been practicing law in Los Angeles for the preceding 14 years. He was a man of good character and reputation, and was a well-known lawyer in active practice and in good standing, being one of a firm of lawyers practicing as Valentine and Newby. Prior to July, 1909, one Blumer had obtained a judgment by default in the superior court of Los Angeles county against Felix Mayhew for the recovery of $8,750. An execution had been duly issued thereon to the sheriff of Los Angeles county. A motion by Mayhew to set aside the judgment was pending. Valentine and Newby were attorneys for the plaintiff in the judgment and Percy R. Wilson was the attorney for Mayhew. On or about July 23, 1909, the parties agreed on a settlement whereby the plaintiff was to accept $5,000 in money in full satisfaction of the judgment. Mayhew procured a check on the National Bank of California for $5,000, payable to himself and duly certified by the cashier for that sum, and Newby, for the plaintiff, agreed to accept this check, properly indorsed, in lieu of the money, upon the settlement. Pursuant to this agreement, and by arrangement, on the following day, July 24, 1909, Newby, Mayhew, Wilson, and McCabe, a lawyer, also acting for Mayhew, went together to the office of the county clerk in order that Mayhew might there deliver the check to Newby, and Newby there enter satisfaction of the judgment, and thereupon deliver to Wilson an order to the sheriff to release any property held by him under the execution. In the meantime the check had been duly indorsed by Mayhew to Valentine & Newby, and Mayhew, in collusion with McCabe, but without Wilson's knowledge, had surreptitiously prepared, ready for filing, a complaint in his own name against Blumer, the National Bank of California, Newby, and others, to enjoin payment of the check about to be delivered, together with a restraining order to the same effect ready for the signature of the judge on presentation. None of the other parties had any knowledge of the preparation or existence of these papers or of the design to enjoin the payment of the check after its delivery.

At the clerk's office, which was in the courthouse, Ross, the judgment book clerk, produced the judgment book, and with a rubber stamp impressed on the margin of the entry of the judgment of Blumer v. Mayhew an entry of satisfaction thereof. Mayhew then delivered the $5,000 check to Newby, who thereupon signed the firm name, "Valentine & Newby, attorneys for plaintiff," to the entry of satisfaction, handed to Wilson the order to the sheriff for the release of property levied on, and passed to the deputy clerk $1 to pay the fee of 25 cents for the entry. The deputy then went back to the cash drawer for change, and Newby stood awaiting it. McCabe and Mayhew, saying that they supposed they were through, hurriedly left the room. Wilson also left the room with the order of release for the sheriff. While the deputy was getting the change and Newby was waiting for it, Mayhew and McCabe proceeded to the chambers of a judge of the superior court, presented to him the complaint and order for the injunction against payment of the check just delivered, and the judge signed the order and delivered it to them. All this occupied but two or three minutes. While Newby was still awaiting change, the injunction aforesaid, together with a summons in the injunction suit, which had been begun by the filing of the papers in that short space of time, were served upon him by some person other than McCabe or Mayhew.

Quickly examining the papers served on him, Newby perceived the gross fraud attempted, and at once called out to the clerk that he had been "flim-flammed" in the satisfaction of judgment, and that he desired immediately to mark it out, showing the deputy the said injunction order. The deputy thereupon turned to the entry of satisfaction, took a pen, and drew several cancelling lines across it and wrote beneath it the words: "Marked out at my request." Newby then signed the name "Valentine & Newby" under said words. He then left the room, intercepted Wilson before he had delivered the release to the sheriff, and told him of the injunction. Wilson expressed his indignation, and he and Newby then went together to the bank. There they found a person serving the injunction papers on the officers of the bank. Newby presented the check, the bank declined to pay it, and it never has been paid.

All this occurred on Saturday. On the following Monday Wilson withdrew his name as attorney for Mayhew in the case of Blumer v. Mayhew, and Newby procured from the judge an order denying Mayhew's motion to vacate the judgment. Newby afterwards began proceedings by motion for a formal order by the court setting aside the said entry of satisfaction. This motion came on for hearing on September 21, 1909. At that time an attorney in the interest of Mayhew called the matter to the attention of the defendant's city editor, who immediately detailed a reporter of that paper to get the facts and write up the "story." He proceeded to do so, and the article set forth in the first count of the complaint published in the Times on September 22, 1909, was the result. It states the facts substantially as above related, but added that Newby was accused of a felony in altering a public record, that the district attorney was considering the facts, and that Mayhew was willing to swear to a complaint charging Newby with such offense. Although not material to our consideration of the case, it is but just to add that the court, after investigation, granted the motion to set aside the entry of satisfaction, and that it does not appear that Newby was ever prosecuted for having it "marked out."

The second count is based on a publication in the issue of the Times of October 4, 1909. This consisted of a cartoon picturing Newby and several other citizens of Los Angeles, all caricatures and obviously intended to subject the persons to ridicule and obloquy. Above the cartoon were the words: "And These are Our Leading 'Reformers.'" Below it were the words: "All hypocrites are sinners, but, thank God, all sinners are not hypocrites." Newby was portrayed with a large open book in front of him, labeled "Public Records," a pen in his hand in the act of writing or marking in the book, and a sinister leer in his eyes, and was represented as saying: "I'll Change 'Em." The complaint alleged that by this the defendant intended to bring him into public discredit and obloquy and to convey the meaning that the plaintiff was in the habit of changing public records, that he was not sincere in his political activities, but was a hypocrite, and that it was so understood by those who saw the cartoon.

The third count is based on two publications in the Times of October 5, 1909. The first related the evidence given in court the day before on the hearing of the motion to set aside the aforesaid satisfaction of judgment. It is not materially different from the facts related in the publication of September 22d. The second article was the following paragraph in the editorial columns:

"If it were not for court records and newspaper files and the like of that, there are some Los Angeles 'reformers' who would exude de cologne instead of the familiar stench that now accompanies them on their devious peregrinations."

These, it is alleged, were intended, and were understood by those who read the articles, to mean that plaintiff was unworthy of confidence and could not be trusted, and that his record, when exposed, was a stench in the nostrils of all decent citizens.

The fourth publication complained of was made on October 29, 1909. It referred to an initiative petition filed with the city clerk of Los Angeles by Newby on behalf of the Church Federation for the passage of an ordinance to prohibit gaming, and which, the article suggested, would forbid the shaking of dice for cigars and all forms of gambling. The article referred to Newby as "the arch-reformer, Nathan Newby," and stated that he and others had "volubly and defiantly expressed to the counsel a desire to stop humble citizens from shaking dice for cigars," "before it was found Newby had been tampering with the county records." It was alleged that this was intended and understood to mean that Newby was insincere in his efforts to better moral conditions in Los Angeles and was unworthy of confidence.

The fifth publication, on November 16, 1909, referred to the same matter, and was as follows:

"Then Nathan Newby's anti-gambling ordinance will have place in the question box. It aims to prevent smokers from joining in a friendly game of dice with the cigar store clerk with the cigars at stake. This so shocked Nathan that he forgot to alter any more public records."

This, it is alleged, was meant and understood to mean that Newby was in the habit of altering public records.

The sixth count is based on a publication of November 25, 1909. It is not important to our discussion.

[1] It would perhaps puzzle a person not familiar with the Penal Code to discover in the conduct of Mr. Newby, as detailed above, anything immoral or reprehensible, or other than a commendable zeal to protect his client against palpable fraud. But sections 113 and 114 of the Penal Code declare that it is a felony for any person to deface or alter a record or any part thereof kept officially in any public office. The marking out of the entry of satisfaction by drawing lines across it with a pen was done by the deputy clerk at the request of Newby, who is, consequently, equally responsible therefor with said deputy. It was a defacement of a public record. It is clear from the facts stated that Newby was actuated solely by the praiseworthy purpose of frustrating the fraudulent acts of Mayhew in procuring the entry of satisfaction to be made without consideration, and that his intent was not in anywise criminal in character. It was but an irregular method of effecting a righteous result. Nevertheless, so great is the care of the state that the public records shall remain unchanged except when changed in an authorized manner, the statute is so drawn as to make even such laudable defacement a felony. The intent is immaterial. The act itself, without intent other than that of doing it, constitutes the offense, regardless of the object. This has been expressly decided in this state, and is the general rule in respect to statutory offences of that kind. People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 175, 31 Pac. 45; People v. Tomalty, 14 Cal. App. 229, 111 Pac. 513. Therefore, although the plaintiff was guilty of no moral wrong or bad intent in the matter, it was technically true that he was accused of the commission of a felony. The answer alleges as a defense to the first count that the several matters complained of therein as libels upon the plaintiff were and are true, setting forth the particular facts which it is claimed establish the truth of that charge. In so far as the publications assert that the plaintiff was accused of the commission of a felony, confined as they all are to the act of crossing out the entry of satisfaction of the judgment in Blumer v. Mayhew, the defense of truth is established by the evidence, although the offense was entirely technical, was without moral guilt, and was intended to bring about justice.

[2-5] The truth of this part of the matter complained of, however, does not establish a defense to the other libelous publications concerning plaintiff. With reference to the cartoon or caricature of plaintiff and others with certain inscriptions upon it published in the Times of October 4, 1909, the defendant in its answer alleged it was made in the midst of a strenuous local political campaign in which the plaintiff was identified with and prominent in the party opposed by the Times newspaper, and known as the Good Government League, or Reformers; that cartoons were frequently published by or in behalf of the respective parties in the conduct of the campaign; that in carrying on its part of the campaign the Times published said cartoon as "a merry and harmless pictorial allusion to the leaders of said reformers as a political class, and not as private individuals, and merely by way of facetious rejoinder to many political criticisms and censures" of the party supported by the Times, made by said reformers in public speeches and newspapers. These facts could only be considered in mitigation of damages. They do not constitute a defense. The case does not come within the rule as to privileged communications, as laid down in subdivision 3 of section 47 of the Civil Code. In Wilson v. Fitch, 41 Cal. 382, the court said:

"Nor can a defamatory publication in a public journal be said to be privileged simply because it relates to a subject of public interest, and was published in good faith, without malice, and from laudable motives." Edwards v. San Jose, etc., Soc., 99 Cal. 438, 34 Pac. 128, 37 Am. St. Rep. 70; Gilman v. McClatchy, 111 Cal. 614, 44 Pac. 241.

The duty of a newspaper to the public does not justify the publication of false and defamatory matter concerning a private citizen merely because he is active in promoting his own political views. A publication concerning such person, if libelous in its nature, cannot be excused on the ground that the occasion is privileged, and can be justified only by pleading and proving that it is true. And the fact that the matter published tends to cause merriment, or is a "facetious rejoinder" to adverse criticisms made by other persons, does not justify the wrong. It is libelous per se to falsely charge that a person is a hypocrite.

[6-8] The answer does not allege that the imputation of hypocrisy to Newby, or the imputation that he was in the habit of altering public records, alleged to be the purport of said cartoon, were true, but denied that it was susceptible of that meaning. The court below, at the request of the plaintiff, instructed the jury that it should determine whether or not said cartoon would fairly represent to the ordinary reader that the plaintiff was a hypocrite and was in the habit of changing public records, and that, if it was found to have that meaning, the plaintiff would be entitled to recover on the second count, unless it was proved to be true that plaintiff was a hypocrite and was in the habit of changing public records. The verdict in favor of the defendant necessarily implies that the jury either found that the cartoon was not susceptible of the meaning imputed to it, or found that plaintiff was a hypocrite and was in the habit of changing public records. The plaintiff insists that the evidence does not support either of these findings, and this insufficiency is assigned as cause for a new trial.

The instruction that the jury might find for the defendant if the imputation to Newby of hypocrisy and the habit of altering public records were proven was not properly within the issues, inasmuch as the answer does not aver the truth of these charges. As the plaintiff requested the instruction, he cannot complain that it was given, but he may make the point that the implied findings are not supported by the evidence.

[9, 10] There was no evidence whatever to the effect that Newby was a hypocrite, or that he was in the habit of altering public records. The act of altering the entry in the case of Blumer v. Mayhew, when considered in the light of circumstances under which it was done, does not tend to show hypocrisy, or any sort of depravity in the character of Newby. It only shows that he was in error as to the lawful method of correcting the wrong attempted by Mayhew. Any finding that the charge of hypocrisy was true would be contrary to the evidence. It is therefore to be presumed that the jury did not find that charge to be true. The verdict can only be supported, so far as this count is concerned, on the theory that the jury concluded that the cartoon would not, to an ordinary reader, bear the meaning that the plaintiff was a hypocrite or was in the habit of changing public records. The evidence does not justify such conclusion. The heading to the cartoon, consisting of the phrase, "And These are Our Leading 'Reformers,'" in itself implied that the persons pictured were not worthy to be called reformers and were claiming a virtue they did not possess. The statement below, "All hypocrites are sinners, but, thank God, all sinners are not hypocrites," taken in connection with the admitted fact that these persons were generally known as "Reformers" in the pending political campaign, was nothing less than an indirect assertion that the persons whose pictures appeared above were both sinners and hypocrites, while their opponents might be sinners, but were not hypocrites. This meaning was also indicated by the fact that the four persons, other than Newby, shown in the cartoon, were each portrayed as engaged in transactions either disreputable, dishonest, or ridiculous, and, further, by the sinister expression on the face of Newby as given in the cartoon. All these circumstances may be considered. Bettner v. Holt, 70 Cal. 274, 11 Pac. 713. Newby was not named in the cartoon, but it is practically conceded that the picture was sufficiently like him to be readily recognized by all who knew him. No person of ordinary intelligence could fail to perceive that the cartoon was intended to suggest that the plaintiff was a hypocrite posing as a reformer. The verdict on this point is therefore contrary to the evidence. The plaintiff was entitled to recover on this count, regardless of the weakness of his case on other counts.

We do not mean to intimate that the other publications set forth in the complaint do not, in effect, assert that the plaintiff was addicted to the changing of public records and impute to him a moral obliquity or depravity which was not established by his conduct in the case of Blumer v. Mayhew, and which was no part of his character, or that they do not also impute to him hypocrisy and insincerity. These are, for the most part, questions of fact as to which, upon another trial, the result may be different. Our conclusion with regard to the second count makes it unnecessary to consider them further upon this appeal.

The judgment and order are reversed.

In re FRIEDMAN'S ESTATE.

HEBREW HOME FOR THE AGED DISABLED v. FRIEDMAN et al.

(S. F. 7838.)

APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐796—MOTION TO DISMISS APPEAL — PARTY IN INTEREST — PROCEEDING TO DETERMINE HEIRSHIP.

Each of the defendants in a proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, to determine heirship to and succession to the estate of deceased, claiming by heirship wholly distinct from, independent of, and antagonistic to the claims of the other defendants, has an interest in defeating the claim of each of the other defendants, and so on separate appeals being taken by defendants from the decree for plaintiff, declaring that deceased died without heirs, one of them may move for dismissal of the appeals of the others.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3146-3148; Dec. Dig. ⇐796.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, in the matter of the estate of Julius Friedman, deceased. There was judgment for the plaintiff, Hebrew Home for the Aged Disabled, and defendants Liebe Friedman and others took separate appeals. Certain of the defendants move to dismiss the appeals of the other defendants. Appeals dismissed. See, also, 171 Cal. 431, 153 Pac. 918.

Marcus Rosenthal, Rothchild, Golden & Rothchild and Edgar D. Peixotto, all of San Francisco, for appellants. Houghton & Houghton, of San Francisco (Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo J. Roche, all of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure to determine the heirship and succession to the estate of Julius Friedman, deceased. Upon the filing of the petition the Hebrew Home for Aged Disabled filed a complaint claiming the entire residue of the estate, in the absence of legal heirs, under a charitable bequest contained in the will of the decedent. Answers were filed by several groups of persons, each group claiming to be heirs and next of kin of the decedent. These groups may be designated as the Kagan claimants, the Grunwaldt claimants, the Bernstein claimants, and the Liebe Friedman claimants. Issues were formed, the cause was tried by the court, and a decree given declaring that the decedent died without heirs, and that none of the claimants is or ever was an heir or next of kin of the deceased, and that the Hebrew Home for Aged Disabled was entitled to the entire estate. Each group of claimants above named separately moved for a new trial, and the motions were denied. Separate appeals were taken by each of these groups from the decree, and also from the order denying their respective motions for new trial. Each of these groups claims by an asserted kinship to the decedent, wholly distinct from, independent of, and antagonistic to the claims of each and all of the other groups. The Kagan claimants have filed in this court a transcript of the record as required by the rules of this court. None of the other claimants has filed such transcript, and the time for filing the same allowed by the rules has expired. The Kagan claimants move to dismiss the several appeals of the other groups on the ground of the failure to file transcripts in support of their separate appeals.

The Grunwaldt claimants oppose the motion on various grounds, the only one necessary to mention here being their claim that the Kagan claimants have no right to prosecute a motion to dismiss the appeals of the other claimants. If they have that right their case is complete, for the failure of the other groups of appellants to file transcripts within the time prescribed is sufficient ground for the dismissal of the appeal under our rules.

Each person filing a complaint or answer in the proceeding and setting up title to the whole estate by a distinct line of kinship is necessarily an actor for himself and against all other persons who also claim the entire estate. His claim is antagonistic to that of all the others and the claim of each of the others is antagonistic to him. With respect to every other claimant so alleging an interest, the case stands precisely the same as if the contest was between him and that person alone. "His hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him." If any claimant does not appeal from a judgment against him, that judgment, at the end of 60 days, becomes final and forever thereafter remains final. Such claimant cannot revive it and no other claimant is further interested in it. If any claimant takes an appeal, such appeal continues the litigation until it is determined, so far as he is concerned and so far as the successful claimant is concerned, but it does not and cannot continue the litigation, nor the cause, with respect to the defeated parties who do not appeal. They are put out of the case by the judgment and must remain out. It must follow from these propositions that if two or more claimants, who are in hostility to each other, each appeal, the litigation between all of them and the successful claimant continues while such appeals are pending. Each appellant is interested primarily in defeating the claims of the successful party and in establishing his own claim, and secondarily in defeating the claim of every other unsuccessful claimant who has kept himself in the litigation by an appeal. As the one thing in controversy, the succession to the estate, is sought by all and is the only thing sought by all or either, it must be that each is the opponent of every other. As was said in Blythe v. Ayres, 102 Cal. 254, 36 Pac. 522, section 1664 was "intended to provide the means by which, where there are hostile claimants to an estate, all the conflicting rights thereto may be summarily and finally determined in one proceeding," and "the alleged right of each party, whether nominally a plaintiff or defendant, is as much before the court for determination as is the alleged right of either of the other parties." It is not correct to say that the judgment declaring that the deceased, Friedman, died without heirs, does not purport to determine the relative rights of the Kagan claimants on the one hand and of the other claimants on the other. Such judgment determines that each unsuccessful claimant is without right. As the claims are wholly separate, this is equivalent to a determination against each appellant, and in favor of every other appellant, in the controversy as between them. The fact that all are alike put out of the case by the single judgment does not alter the logical result of the judgment. It must follow that each appellant may dispute the right of any other person to take an appeal, and may attack the proceedings by which such person has appealed and obtain the dismissal thereof if cause therefor exists.

If these views are correct, and we can see no escape from them, it must follow that the Kagan claimants who have taken an appeal from the decree have the right, and a sufficient interest, to move to dismiss any appeal from that decree taken by any other claimant to the estate. They are interested in having each one of the other parties defeated, including the successful party. A dismissal of another appeal is equivalent to an affirmation of the judgment against that appellant. If the Kagan claimants succeed in their appeal and the decree is affirmed with respect to the other claimants taking separate appeals, either by a decision on the merits on such separate appeals or by a dismissal thereof, the result would be that the case would go back to the superior court for a trial de novo between the Kagan claimants and the successful claimants only, and all the other parties will be eliminated. The Kagans would thus secure to themselves exemption from further attack upon or attack by the other unsuccessful claimants. The case does not stand precisely in the same position as an ordinary case where the defeat of one necessarily results in a victory for the other. In cases of the kind here presented the defeat of one claimant merely eliminates him from the contest, leaving the others to fight it out to the finish, but none the less, each is an adverse party to the other and is entitled to attack the appeal of the other.

The appeals of the so-called Grunwaldt claimants, the Bernstein claimants, and Liebe Friedman claimants are each dismissed.

CONNOLLY v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(S. F. 7645.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT — 405(2) — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — RELATION OF PARTIES.

There is no force, as determining whether deceased was an employé or an independent contractor, in the mere fact that the work was such that the alleged contract price was inadequate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. — 405(2).]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT — 404 — RELATION OF PARTIES — EVIDENCE.

Hearsay testimony is not admissible to prove the relation of master and servant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. — 404.]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT — 405(2) — RELATION OF PARTIES — EVIDENCE.

The mere fact that defendant was to furnish lumber for a building to be erected by deceased is not conclusive that his relation with deceased was not that of owner and independent contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. — 405(2).]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT — 405(2) — RELATION OF PARTIES — EVIDENCE.

The mere fact that defendant requested a workman to construct a building in a certain way is not conclusive that his relation with deceased was not that of owner and independent contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. — 405(2).]

5. EVIDENCE — 67(1) — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — RELATION OF PARTIES — PRESUMPTIONS.

Although Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32, states the rebuttable presumption that a thing once proved to exist continues, the fact that deceased worked for defendant as a day laborer at other places and times for over a year, would not raise the presumption that he was so working when injured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Dec. Dig. § 87; Dec. Dig. — 67(1).]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT — 403 — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — JURISDICTION — BURDEN OF PROOF.

The burden of showing jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission rests on the claimant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. — 403.]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT — 405(1) — WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION — JURISDICTION — EVIDENCE.

Where the only evidence of jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission admitted is hearsay, it has no jurisdiction to make an award.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. — 405(1).]

In Bank. Proceedings by Louise Connolly for workmen's compensation for the death of her husband, Edward H. Connolly, opposed by Patrick Connolly. Certiorari to review action of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation. Award annulled.

St. Sure, Callaghan & Rose, of Oakland, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents. Harry F. Davis, of San Francisco, for applicant.

MELVIN, J. Certiorari to review the action of the Industrial Accident Commission in awarding to Louise Connolly compensation for the death of her husband, Edward H. Connolly.

The deceased was very remotely, if at all, related to Patrick Connolly. Edward H. Connolly was doing work as a carpenter on the ranch of said Patrick Connolly when he stepped on a nail and injured his foot. As a result he died of lockjaw. The findings of the Industrial Accident Commission were to the effect that Edward H. Connolly died as the result of an injury which arose out of and happened in the course of his employment; and that at the time of the accident both Edward and Patrick Connolly were subject, as employé and employer, respectively, to the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act. St. 1913, p. 279.

Petitioner makes the point that all of the competent evidence is to the effect that Edward H. Connolly was an independent contractor, and that petitioner was therefore not liable for his injury and death. Carstens v. Pillsbury, 158 Pac. 218; Western Indemnity Co. v. State Industrial Accident Commission, 158 Pac. 1033. Patrick Connolly testified that Edward H. Connolly "took a job to move a granary and put up a wagon shed and do the porch on the house and a few other things"; that he agreed to do all of this for $42 and to furnish his own board. This testimony was corroborated by that of Patrick J. Connolly, a son of petitioner, who recited the terms of the alleged verbal contract in substantial agreement with the testimony of his father. Mrs. Moy testified to statements made by Edward H. Connolly that he was working on "a contract job," that he was his "own boss," and that he would have to pay board for himself and his helper. A man named Lee was hired to assist Edward Connolly on the work, but left the employment before the structures were completed. The latter borrowed money to pay Lee from John Sweeny, and according to the testimony of Sweeny a statement was made by Edward Connolly at that time that he wanted the money "to pay a man off that he hired to do this job." Dan Moy told of a conversation with Edward Connolly in which the latter said he had a contract to do the work for an agreed price of either $42 or $42.50. Witness could not remember which sum was named.

Opposed to this testimony was that of Mrs. Louise Connolly, who said that her husband had told her of figuring on a contract with Patrick Connolly, but failing to make the latter understand and accept his figures, of agreeing to work by the day. Lee, who had been selected by Edward Connolly as his helper, also testified that said Connolly had told him of an unsuccessful attempt to get a contract from Patrick Connolly and his final arrangement to work by the day. Lee also said that Edward Connolly had told him, when hiring him, that he (Lee) was to work for Patrick Connolly, and he was corroborated in this statement by another witness named Madsen. There was also some testimony tending to impeach Mrs. Moy's statements, but it is true, as petitioner contends, that all of the testimony offered by Mrs. Connolly before the Industrial Accident Commission relating to the terms upon which her husband went to work for Patrick Connolly was hearsay.

In the opinion of the Industrial Accident Commission the following comment is made regarding the evidence:

"The evidence in this case is conflicting and difficult. A considerable portion of that admitted into the record on behalf of applicant was hearsay and not in relation to the happening of the injury. Some of the evidence on the part of the defendant was direct but self-serving and questionable. For these reasons the commission is turned back upon inferences to be drawn from collateral facts and some direct evidence, not from the parties in interest."

The learned commissioners then concluded that there was no contract because the work was "indefinite in quantity and not readily subject to specific contract," and not of such nature as to "warrant a contractor undertaking it for a lump sum"; yet the petitioner before the commission had herself testified that her husband had endeavored to get a contract for the work.

[1] Another ground for the determination of the commissioners was that the work was so extensive that it would not pay a contractor for performing it at $42.50. There is no force in this reason, as it is a matter of common knowledge that contractors are frequently disappointed in the financial return from work done for a stipulated sum.

[2] It was found that Edward H. Connolly had been paid before his death $45, a sum greater than the alleged contract price, but admittedly $10 of this amount was paid by the wife of Patrick Connolly after the accident, and she swore that she gave it to Mrs. Louise Connolly to enable the latter to take her injured husband to the hospital and not as a payment for work done. Of the evidence regarding the payment of $45 we may say that if there had been any competent testimony that Edward H. Connolly was working by the day, the proof of the payment of so large a sum would have had some corroborative force, but we are here confronted with a condition involving a total lack of competent evidence regarding the status of the claimant's decedent. His status as an employé is sought to be proven by hearsay testimony which may not be considered. Englebreton v. Industrial Accident Commission, 170 Cal. 793, 151 Pac. 421; Employers' Assurance Corporation v. Industrial Accident Commission, 170 Cal. 800, 151 Pac. 423.

[3, 4] Attention is also called to the circumstance that Patrick Connolly gave directions to Lee with special reference to the construction of the implement shed—such directions (to quote from the opinion) "as one could properly give to an employé but not such as could be given to a contractor who had undertaken to perform a specified task for a specified sum of money." Examining Lee's testimony we find that he said he never saw Patrick Connolly but once. He was asked if Patrick Connolly ever gave him any instructions. He replied:

"Not a great deal, only a little about the overhang. He said he would like to have it eight feet if he could, but that would make the front too low to drive in, so he said, 'Do the best you can.' Six feet was all I could get the overhang to come right, and he said that would do."

We fail to see how this one incident proves that Edward Connolly was not an independent contractor, particularly in view of the fact that the lumber was furnished by Patrick Connolly. It does not appear that the "overhang" which Mr. Connolly wanted on the implement house involved more labor on the part of the carpenters than a shorter one. Nor is there any force in the suggestion that because the owner of the real property was to furnish the lumber, there was probably no contract except that for labor by the day. Contracts are often made for sufficient labor to accomplish specific results with materials furnished by the person on whose property those results are to be produced.

[5] Finally, it is argued by learned counsel for the Industrial Accident Commission that a presumption of law (disputable but not successfully overcome) fixes the status of Edward Connolly as that of a day laborer because both Patrick Connolly and his son testified that Edward H. Connolly had worked "on and off" for Patrick Connolly, as a day laborer for more than a year prior to the time when he went to work on the ranch where the accident occurred, and that he was employed at a daily wage during the week immediately preceding the one in which he went to work on the ranch. It is insisted that under the authority of subdivision 32 of section 1963 of the Code of Civil Procedure and such decisions as Kidder v. Stevens, 60 Cal. 414, Eltzroth v. Ryan, 89 Cal. 135, 26 Pac. 647, and Metteer v. Smith, 156 Cal. 572, 105 Pac. 735, the status thus proved to exist continues until overturned by proof of a different arrangement. But a proven status is only presumed to exist "as long as is usual with things of that nature" and employment by the day, in the nature of things, may be presumed to exist only so many days as the services of the workman are desired by his employer. The former employment of Edward Connolly by Patrick Connolly at other places and other times by the day raises no presumption that when he went to work at the ranch he was similarly hired. Moreover the testimony regarding the admissions against interest made by Edward Connolly all shows that at least he had attempted to secure an independent contract for the work upon which he was employed when he met with the accident which caused his death.

[6, 7] It will be seen from the foregoing that the jurisdiction of the Industrial Accident Commission to hear and determine the claim of Louise Connolly was not established. The burden rested upon her to prove the jurisdictional facts as well as the circumstances of her husband's death. Western Grain & Sugar Products Co. v. Pillsbury, 159 Pac. 423; Rideout v. Pillsbury, 159 Pac. 435. This she sought to do by hearsay evidence which was then inadmissible and which, although admitted, was not considered by the Industrial Accident Commission and by proof of certain negative circumstances which standing by themselves or taken together were by no means sufficient to fix the asserted relations between Patrick and Edward Connolly. The award was therefore erroneously made.

Petitioner also contends that Edward Connolly was not under the provisions and protection of the statute, even if he were an employé, because the very nature of the work upon which he was engaged at the time of the accident would, in that case, make him one whose employment was both "casual and not in the usual course of the business of his employer," who was a farmer. There is much force in this contention (see Maryland Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 158 Pac. 1031), but in view of the conclusion which we have reached on the other branch of the case we need not enter into an extended discussion of this point.

The award is annulled.

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 28, 1916.)

SALES — 124—RESCISSON—ACTION TO ENFORCE—RETURN OF ARTICLES.

For the buyer of an agent's contract and articles of merchandise to maintain an action to enforce a rescission for fraud, and recover the note she had given in payment, and the security therefor, instead of affirming the contract, and suing for damages, she must have returned, tendered, or given notice of abandonment of such articles; she, though never having received actual possession of them, having at the time of the sale been given credit therefor on the seller's books, and they having been crated and set aside in its warehouse subject to her disposal; and she having transferred all her rights therein and thereto to her husband, and the same being retained by him; and the note received by her from him therefor being retained by her; and this though the seller induced her to make the transfer, its reason given her therefor being true, though its motives may have been evil, they alone not constituting fraud; and the buyer's husband not having acted as the seller's agent, so that his possession cannot be regarded as its possession; all this at least where the husband is not made a party to the action, so that it is impossible to adjust the equities between all the parties.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by Mary S. Lupton against the Domestic Utilities Manufacturing Company and others. From an adverse judgment and order, defendants appeal. Reversed.

G. M. Steele, of Lodi, and R. W. Kemp, of Los Angeles, for appellants. L. S. Channell, of Lodi, and H. R. McNoble and Ben Berry, both of Stockton (Warren H. Atherton and Lawrence Edwards, both of Stockton, and M. E. Haggerty, of Los Angeles, of counsel) for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an action for the rescission of a contract for the purchase of a certain agent's contract and a quantity of washing machines, to cancel a promissory note given in payment thereof, and to obtain the reconveyance of certain real property given as security for the note. The relief is sought principally upon the ground of false and fraudulent representations by which the plaintiff was induced to enter into the contract. The defendants, excepting the Domestic Utilities Manufacturing Company, which was not served with summons, answered, denying the fraud and the other material allegations of the complaint, and at the trial, after the close of the plaintiff's case, moved for a nonsuit, which was denied. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiff as prayed. The defendants appeal from the judgment, alleging as error, among other things, the refusal of the court to order a nonsuit. An appeal is also taken from the order denying the motion for a new trial.

The alleged false and fraudulent representations, and the general operations of the defendant company and its agents in their efforts to dispose of the "tin vacuum clothes washers or clothes pounders" and certain "so called 'valuable' agent's contracts," which the plaintiff was induced to buy, are substantially similar and in many respects identical with the frauds shown in the case of Brown v. Domestic Utilities Manufacturing Company, 159 Pac. 163. In considering that case this court declared the frauds established by the evidence to be "so gross that equity would lend all of its legitimate powers to relieve plaintiff from the effects of them." We must be no less vigilant here. It appears from the record that there was an exhaustive inquiry into the merits of the case. The evidence is full and complete, and convinces us that the entire scheme of the company is founded in fraud. The tenor of the circulars distributed at its instance, the spurious methods employed in the demonstrations, and the studiously drawn form of contract, all reveal a plan of the company for the alleged disposal of its wares which involved fraud in its every aspect—contemplating an endless chain of victims, each one in turn to recoup his own loss and make a profit by victimizing others. This is the meaning which must be attached to what is termed in the company's form of contract "the line of succession," especially when studied in the light of the evidence. For instance, William Lupton, one of the plaintiff's witnesses, testified:

"Mr. Ensminger told me like this: I said, 'It looks like a kind of a skin game,' he said, 'You skin this man, he skins the other one, and he has then to skin the other one;' there would be nobody hurt only the last man; he says, 'What is that to us?' he says, 'We may be under the ground at that time.'"

But it will not be necessary to enumerate in detail the particulars wherein it appears that the plaintiff was defrauded. It is sufficient to state that the court found that plaintiff, who "is a woman ignorant of business and its methods," became interested in the sale of the "tin vacuum clothes washers or clothes pounders" and the "so-called 'valuable' agent's contracts," issued and sold by the Domestic Utilities Manufacturing Company; that she had various conversations with the defendants Ensmingers, who represented the company as its agents, in regard to the efficiency and value of the washers, and the advisability of investing her money in the venture; that she was also encouraged by the Ensmingers to attend certain public demonstrations, held under the auspices of the company, as to "the manner in which it was claimed said tin vacuum clothes washers or clothes pounders would wash all articles generally found in a general family wash as thoroughly and as quickly as the articles the said demonstrators, so called, used for their demonstrations"; that, as a matter of fact, such demonstrations were "false and fake demonstrations, and were not in good faith"; that at these demonstrations large wall charts were used in order to explain the manner in which an investment in the washers and an agent's contract would realize large and profitable returns; that these representations, made "as to the ability of the plaintiff to make large sums of money greatly to exceed her original investment, were highly colored and distorted by reference to 'prospects,' 'lines of succession,' 'deals to be turned,' 'new territory to be opened,' 'transfers of bills of goods,'" all of which "were designed to prey upon the ignorance of the plaintiff, were false, and were made in a manner fitted to deceive plaintiff"; that plaintiff, believing and relying upon what was told her, purchased of defendants Ensmingers, as agents of the company, one of the agent's contracts and 1,667 washers, with the privilege of appointing other agents, transferring to them the washers she had purchased, and receiving certain commissions therefor; that in payment for these alleged privileges the plaintiff gave her promissory note in the sum of $5,000, and executed a deed of trust to a certain house and lot to the defendants Sam H. Zimmerman and William Siegalkoff, as trustees, which property was of the value of about $8,000. As above stated, it is to cancel this note and to regain the property given as security that plaintiff brings this action.

The court also found that the agent's contract, in fact, "is and was valueless and worth nothing to the plaintiff or to any one else," while the "tin vacuum clothes washers or clothes pounders are of no value for the doing of general family washing, or for any other purpose." These findings are attacked upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain them. It is also contended that the judgment is erroneous because the representations made were merely matters of opinion; that, in any event, plaintiff was not entitled to relief, for the reason that she had failed to investigate the truth of the representations; and that she had no right to rely upon the statements made by the defendants, as they did not occupy confidential relations with her, were interested parties, and had only recently invested in the business themselves. We have carefully examined all these contentions, and the evidence appertaining thereto, and find they have no merit. The representations, for the most part, were more than mere matters of opinion, and were made in such positive terms that the plaintiff was justified in relying upon them without making an independent investigation.

We must, however, reverse the judgment on the ground that the plaintiff had failed to effect a rescission of the contract prior to the commencement of the action. This was one of the grounds of the motion for a nonsuit. The other grounds were that the testimony of the plaintiff showed that she had waived the fraud after discovering the facts which entitled her to rescind, and that she was guilty of laches in not having used reasonable diligence in rescinding promptly upon becoming aware of her right of rescission. In our opinion, there is no force to either of these contentions. The sole question to be determined, therefore, is whether the "notice, tender and demand," which the plaintiff served upon the defendants, was sufficient to constitute a proper rescission of the contract and entitle her to the relief she seeks. The defendants contend that it was not, for the reason that she did not tender or offer to return the 1,667 washers, but, on the contrary, had conveyed the title thereto to her husband. As regards the other portions of the contract, it is not questioned that her notice of rescission and demand was sufficient.

It was found by the court:

"That upon the discovery by plaintiff of the falseness of said representations and of her right of rescission, and prior to the commencement of this action, said plaintiff elected to rescind her contract for the purchase of said so-called 'valuable' agent's contract, and the 1,667 tin vacuum clothes washers or clothes pounders therewith, and served a notice of her election to rescind upon said defendants Ensmingers, and offered to return to said Domestic Utilities Manufacturing Company, a corporation, and Josie A. Ensminger and John W. Ensminger, said so-called agent's contract and all rights that plaintiff herein had in and to the same, or the territory mentioned in the same, or the rights to create agencies or any other right conferred by said so-called agent's contract; that she did not tender a return of the 1,667 vacuum clothes washers above mentioned, because she never received the same; that said notice of election to rescind and tender of return also contained a demand upon said defendants, Ensmingers that they surrender to plaintiff said promissory note, and reconvey, or cause said defendants' trustees to reconvey, to plaintiff the said real property so conveyed by deed of trust, but they, and each of them, refused so to do."

This finding corresponds with the language used in the notice of rescission:

"With this notice, tender and demand there is no delivery to you or any of you of any vacuum clothes washers as none have been received by the undersigned."

It cannot be disputed that plaintiff never received actual possession of the 1,667 washers, or any of them. The evidence shows, however, that upon the close of her deal with the Ensmingers she was given credit upon the company's books for the washers, and the entire quantity was crated and set aside in its warehouse at Los Angeles subject to her disposal. It is admitted by plaintiff's counsel, as indeed it must be, that the defendants actually sold to her the 1,667 washers which became her property, and that she had the right to the possession thereof. In the absence of other circumstances, it would therefore have been necessary for the plaintiff, in order to accomplish a rescission of the contract of sale, to have abandoned or offered to restore to the defendants everything of value which she had received under the contract. Civ. Code, § 1691. This is a familiar principle of equity. When one has a right of rescission and exercises that right he must restore the other party to the same condition that he would have been in if no contract had been made. As is said in Collins v. Townsend, 58 Cal. 608, 615:

"If the vendor has retained possession of the property sold, as security or otherwise, the purchaser may indicate his intention to rescind and notify the seller that he abandons all right or claim to the property. If he fails to do this under such circumstances he is equally at fault as if, having received the property, he should refuse or neglect to return or tender it." Approved in Kelley v. Owens, 120 Cal. 500, 47 Pac. 369, 52 Pac. 797.

But at the trial plaintiff attempted to justify her action in having failed to abandon all claim or right to the washers by introducing evidence to show that the Ensmingers had induced her to transfer all the washers to her husband, William Lupton, and that he still retained title and right of possession, and for that reason the plaintiff had no power to restore the washers or the title thereof to the defendants. The findings of the court on this point are as follows:

"That on or about the 15th day of April, 1912, plaintiff transferred all her right, title, and interest in and to said 1,667 washers, which she was entitled to receive with said agent's contract purchased from Josie A. Ensminger, to William Lupton without any consideration whatever, and at the special instance and request of defendants Ensmingers, and upon their representations to plaintiff that that was the proper course to pursue in order to make the most money from said so-called valuable agent's contract. That defendants Ensmingers induced plaintiff to make said transfer to William Lupton, and defendants Ensmingers made said representations, and induced said transfer as a part of the scheme to injure and destroy plaintiff's right to rescission and to prevent plaintiff from escaping from the fraud which they, defendants Ensmingers, had perpetrated against plaintiff."

The rule is well established that, in passing upon a motion for a nonsuit, the evidence must be interpreted most strongly against the defendant, and every favorable inference of fact that can be legitimately drawn in support of the action should be made. O'Connor v. Mennie, 169 Cal. 217, 146 Pac. 674; Boyle v. Coast Improvement Co., 27 Cal. App. 714, 151 Pac. 25. But we are unable to find in the evidence any indication that defendants induced the transfer of the washers to Lupton through misrepresentations or other fraudulent means. There is testimony to the effect that, during the negotiations with the plaintiff, John W. Ensminger suggested to her that such a transfer should be made, giving as a reason therefor that, because of her husband's personality and wide, worldly experience, he would make a better agent in the field. Neither of the Luptons was very well fitted for the business, but it does not appear that the reasons advanced by Ensminger were false. Notwithstanding the sinister motives which may be imputed to the Ensmingers in advising such an arrangement, it can scarcely be said that plaintiff was induced to make the transfer on account of any frauds practiced upon her. Evil motives alone do not constitute fraud. Her husband's conduct in the premises, it is true, is not above question. The evidence tends to show that while she was contemplating the purchase of the contract and washers, he was apparently acting in conjunction with the Ensmingers to induce her to enter into the contract so that he would be appointed agent. He admittedly knew of the fraudulent character of the operations which were then being carried on by the company and the Ensmingers. His testimony, in this behalf, is significant:

"Well, my wife didn't know anything about it. All I knew about it was from what Mr. Ensminger and several of the others had told me, that there was really no harm in it, because the very first time the next man you had skinned got a chance to skin another man he played even, and then if he got another opportunity he made a percentage."

Regarding the promissory note he had given his wife in exchange for the contract and the washers, he testified:

"I did not expect to pay that note; just gave it to fulfill the contract and make the company believe that I had paid value."

But there is no suggestion in the evidence, nor is it contended, that Lupton acted as agent for the Ensmingers, or that he resorted to fraudulent methods, or exerted any undue influence upon the plaintiff, to induce his appointment as agent and the transfer of the washers which was incidental to such appointment. As testified by plaintiff:

"He said he thought it was a good thing. If he couldn't get one, he would go in with somebody else. He said when I concluded to buy it that I could use my own pleasure about it. He didn't say not to buy it, because whenever I talk of doing anything that way, he doesn't tell me not to do anything."

It cannot be held under such circumstances that the husband's possession must, in the eyes of the law, be regarded as the possession of the Ensmingers. Nor can it be said that the washers were valueless and worth nothing to the extent that it was not necessary to return them in order to accomplish a rescission. While the evidence as to the actual value is conflicting, and shows conclusively that they were not as valuable as represented, it cannot be questioned that they were of substantial value.

Conceding that the evidence amply supports the finding that it was upon the advice of Ensminger, and at his special instance, that the transfer was made, we are unable to see how this circumstance, alone, excuses the failure of the plaintiff to make a complete rescission. None of the cases relied upon by plaintiff is opposed to this conclusion. While certain language, in several of the authorities referred to, is to the effect that a rescission by the buyer of an executed contract of sale induced by fraud cannot be defeated by the seller upon the ground that the buyer has parted with the possession of the property sold, when he parts with it upon the advice of the seller, in none of them, nor in any others that we have found, was a situation presented in which it was impossible to adjust the equities between all the parties. It is a general rule that a buyer cannot rescind if he has sold the goods or any part thereof. 35 Cyc. 147. In such a case he must affirm the contract and claim compensation or damages for the injury he has sustained by reason of the fraud.

"The rule is well settled, that where the party complaining has parted with the thing purchased, he cannot rescind; but must resort to an action for damages." Bailey v. Fox, 78 Cal. 389, 20 Pac. 868.

This principle rests upon the doctrine that equity will not relieve where it is utterly impossible to place all the parties in statu quo. That is precisely the situation presented in this case. William^o Lupton, who it cannot be questioned holds the title to the washers, is not a party to the action. If the plaintiff should be granted judgment as prayed, her note to the defendants would be canceled, and she would be entitled to recover from them the realty which she gave as security. But Lupton, her husband, would still retain the property in the 1,667 washers, and the right to demand immediate possession at any time. Moreover, the plaintiff would retain the note which the evidence shows she received from Lupton as the price of the agent's contract and washers. In this aspect it matters not that Lupton had neither the ability nor the intention to pay the note, or that under the circumstances of the transaction it was apparent to the court that it amounted to no consideration whatever. As long as it remained uncanceled and in the hands of the plaintiff it constituted a chose in action against William Lupton. Potentially, at least, it represented a sum of $5,000, the face value of the note. It requires no extended argument to show that a judgment in plaintiff's favor would be inequitable, and fall short of restoring the parties to the statu quo. Were Lupton a party to the suit, or were the situation of the parties such that he could be regarded merely as an agent for the plaintiff, having no interest in himself, the trial court might have been enabled to adjust the equities between the parties, and, if it had not done so, this court might have afforded relief. But as the case was presented to the lower court there was no showing by the plaintiff of a complete restitution of the property, or any means by which the court could relieve her of the omission. Accordingly, the motion for nonsuit should have been granted.

Judgment and order reversed.

1. ELECTIONS $\S$ 126(4)—NOMINATION—STATUTE.

Primary Act (St. 1913, p. 1390) $\S$ 5, subd. 8, provides that nothing therein shall prohibit the independent nomination of candidates as provided by Pol. Code, $\S$ 1188, enacted at the 1913 session of the Legislature, except that a candidate who has filed nomination papers as a candidate for any office on the ballots of any political party at a primary election held under the act, and who is defeated for such nomination, shall be ineligible for nomination to the same office at the ensuing general election, either as an independent candidate or as the candidate of any other party, held not to render ineligible to the Progressive party's nomination for the office of Representative to Congress, made by writing the person's name in the blank space left for the purpose in the ticket of the Progressive party, a person who was a candidate at the same election for the Republican nomination, having been proposed under Primary Act, $\S$ 5, subd. 2, but being defeated for such nomination.

2. ELECTIONS $\S$ 141 — NOMINATIONS — STATUTE.

Primary Act, $\S$ 5, subd. 8, providing that nothing therein shall be construed as prohibiting the independent nomination of candidates, with an exception, has reference, in the exception, only to attempted nominations under Pol. Code, $\S$ 1188, providing how and when a candidate may be nominated subsequent to a primary election or in lieu of any primary election, meaning that a candidate for a party nomination, who was defeated at the primary, may not have his name placed on the general election ballot as a candidate for the office under the provisions of section 1188.

Application for writ of mandate by David C. Narver, petitioner, against Frank C. Jordan, Secretary of State. Alternative writ discharged, and proceeding dismissed.

Samuel M. Shortridge and John C. Catlin, both of San Francisco, and W. M. Bowen and Frank P. Doherty, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This proceeding is one to obtain a writ compelling the secretary of state, in sending to the county clerks and registrars in the Tenth congressional district his certificate of candidates to be placed on the ballot for the general election, to omit the name of Henry Stanley Benedict as the Progressive party candidate for the office of Representative in Congress from the Tenth congressional district.

At the August primary neither the name of Mr. Benedict nor any other person was printed upon the ballot as a candidate for the Progressive party nomination. The ticket of that party had as to that office simply the blank space in which any elector was authorized to write in the name of any person for such nomination. His name was so written in for such nomination by many electors, and he received in this way a sufficient number of votes to make him the Progressive nominee for the office, if he was eligible to be such.

It is claimed that by virtue of certain provisions of the Primary Act of 1913, the law in force at this time, he is ineligible to be such Progressive party nominee. The material facts upon which this claim is based may be stated in a very few words. Mr. Benedict was a candidate at such primary for the Republican party nomination for such office, having been proposed as such candidate by a committee in accord with the provisions of subdivision 2b of section 5 of the Primary Act, and his nomination papers, prepared in accord with such provisions and accompanied by his own affidavit consenting to be such a candidate, having been duly filed in the office of the secretary of state. He was defeated for such Republican party nomination.

Under the Primary Act any person is entitled to be a candidate for all the party nominations for an office, and the act expressly provides that nothing therein contained "shall be construed to limit the rights of any person to become the candidate of more than one political party for the same office upon complying with" its requirements. Subdivision 4 of section 5. Section 25 provides that if as a result of any primary election a person receives a nomination without first having filed nomination papers and having his name printed on the primary election ballot, he may cause his name to be withdrawn from nomination. It then provides:

"The vacancy created by the withdrawal of such person as aforesaid, or on account of the ineligibility of such person to qualify as a candidate because of the inhibitions of subdivision 8 of section 5 of this act, shall not be filled."

Subdivision 8 of section 5, so far as material, provides:

"Nothing herein shall be construed as prohibiting the independent nomination of candidates as provided by section 1188 of the Political Code, as said section was enacted at the fortieth session (the session of 1913) of the Legislature of the state of California, except that a candidate who has filed nomination papers as one of the candidates for nomination to any office on the ballots of any political party at a primary election held under the provisions of this act, and who is defeated for such party nomination at such primary election, shall be ineligible for nomination to the same office at the ensuing general election, either as an independent candidate or as the candidate of any other party."

Section 1188 of the Political Code, as enacted at the fortieth session of the Legislature, provides simply how and when a candidate "may be nominated subsequent to" a primary election, "or in lieu of any primary election." Its language is such as to preclude the idea that a nomination by any party can be made under its provisions.

[1] The claim is that by reason of the language of subdivision 8, section 5, which we have quoted, Mr. Benedict is ineligible to the Progressive party nomination that he received at the primary election. It must be held that he filed nomination papers as a candidate for the Republican party nomination, and he was defeated for such party nomination at the primary election, which, it is claimed, brings him squarely within the language of the subdivision. It must be confessed that there is much force in this contention if the words of the provision commencing with the word "except" be construed as an independent provision, and not merely as an exception to and a limitation of the preceding language guaranteeing the right, notwithstanding any other provision of the act, of independent nomination of candidates as provided in section 1188 of the Political Code. The effect of the construction contended for would be somewhat anomalous, we may here say, in view of the other provisions of the act. Although a person might properly be, so far as the law is concerned, a candidate for nomination at the hands of each of the four parties participating in the primary, if he was defeated for any one of the nominations, he would be rendered ineligible for the nomination he had received at the hands of the other three parties. Of course, in the present state of the law no plausible reason can be given for any such provision.

[2] It seems clear to us that the only reasonable construction that can be given to this provision is that it has reference only to attempted nominations under section 1188 of the Political Code "subsequent to" or "in lieu of any primary election." It simply means that a candidate for a party nomination who was defeated at the primary may not have his name placed on the general election ballot as a candidate for the office under the provisions of said section 1188. In other words, the provision as a whole is simply a declaration that nothing in the act shall be construed as prohibiting the independent nomination of candidates subsequent to or in lieu of any primary election, as provided in said section 1188, except that no candidate defeated for a party nomination for such office at the primary may be so nominated. The only reasonable argument against this conclusion is the apparent consequent lack of necessity for the words "or as the candidate of any other party" in the exception, in the light of the fact that the exception is applicable only to candidates at the primary for nomination on the ballots of political parties, and that section 1188, as amended in 1913, apparently has no application to the matter of "party" nominations. The same is true as to the portion of section 25 that we have italicized in our quotation thereof. The provisions just referred to are apparently the merest surplusage, without any possible force or application. But this consideration we do not deem sufficient to warrant us departing from what we believe to be the clear intent of the provision as a whole. It may properly be noted that these provisions which are apparently without meaning or application in the Primary Act of 1913 were contained in the earlier Primary Act of 1911, when section 1188 of the Political Code did permit "party" nominations, and when a candidate could file nomination papers only for nomination at the hands of the party with which he was affiliated. It is very probable that they were simply copied into the act of 1913 from the old law, without consideration of any question of their necessity in view of the changes otherwise made. But, however this may be, we are of the opinion that the provision as a whole may reasonably be construed only as we have indicated.

The alternative writ heretofore issued is discharged, and the proceeding dismissed.

5. MECHANICS' LIENS $\hookrightarrow$ 78—MATERIALMEN AND LABORERS—NOTICE OF NONRESPONSIBILITY.

To secure the protection given by Code Civ. Proc. § 1200, repealed by Act May 1, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 1319), limiting the amount for which materialmen and laborers could have lien where the contract was abandoned by the contractor, the contract being recorded as required by the statute, it was not necessary for the owner to give the notice of nonresponsibility provided for by section 1192, that being to defeat liability where the owner learns of work being done on his property without his authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 111; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 78.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Manufacturing Company and others against R. A. Perry and others. From adverse judgment and order, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Snook & Church, of Oakland (C. Irving Wright, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellants. W. B. Rinehart, C. L. Colvin, and Ezra W. Decoto, all of Oakland, and Robert B. Gaylord, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action is to foreclose laborers' and materialmen's liens for work performed and materials furnished in the construction of a residence and garage in the city of Oakland. With the action by Pacific Manufacturing Company were consolidated ten other actions. The following findings of fact were found by the court:

That defendant R. A. Perry was the reputed owner, defendant Winifred A. Perry the real owner, of the premises; that on June 10, 1910, the said R. A. Perry and defendant Magneson entered into a written contract whereby the latter agreed "to construct and complete certain buildings, to wit, a certain brick veneered and frame residence and garage appurtenant thereto upon the above-described land and premises and to furnish the labor and materials" therefor, according to certain plans, drawings, and specifications, which said plans, drawings, and specifications were attached to and made part of said contract, and the same was duly recorded on June 13, 1910; that the agreed price for said work and materials was $23,567, payable in progressive installments, the sum of $6,000 to be paid 35 days after the date of acceptance by architect and owner. Among other provisions, the contract contained the following:

"Third. Should the owner at any time during the progress of said buildings request any alterations, deviations, additions, or omissions from said contract, specifications, or plans, he shall be at liberty to do so, and the same shall in no way affect or make void the contract but will be added to or deducted from the amount of said contract price, as the case may be, by a fair and reasonable valuation.

"Fourth. Should the contractor at any time during the progress of said work refuse or neglect to supply a sufficiency of materials or workmen, the owner shall have the power to provide materials and workmen (after three days' notice in writing given) to finish the said works, and the expenses shall be deducted from the amount of said contract price. * * *

"Ninth. No extras will be allowed except agreed on in writing at time of making same, and signed by both interested parties.

"Tenth. It is hereby agreed by both interested parties that the said party of the second part shall enter into contracts with the following subcontractors for their portion of the work at prices mentioned:

Pacific Mfg. Co. for millwork, sash, doors, and glass	$3,385.00
Burtchael & Crowley, plumbing	1,895.00
P. N. Kuss Co. (or acceptable to owner), painting	950.00
Century Electric Co., electric work and wiring	650.00
Inlaid Floor Co., hardened floors	940.00
Schmitt & Co., hot-air heating	470.00"

It was further found: That the contractor, Magneson, commenced work about June 13, 1910, in the construction of said residence and garage and so continued said work until February 11, 1911, when he "abandoned the construction of said buildings and all work and labor ceased thereon," and no labor was performed nor any materials furnished to be used, nor was any used, in the construction thereof, for a period of 30 days next immediately thereafter; that on March 22, 1911, defendants R. A. and Winifred made and filed for record in the office of the county recorder of Alameda county, and there was recorded on that day, a notice of abandonment of said contract by said Magneson on February 11, 1911; that no notice in writing requiring said Magneson to finish said works was ever given to said Magneson nor any demand made upon him as required by said contract, "to wit, the fourth subdivision thereof hereinbefore specifically quoted and set forth."

It is further found: That the said defendant Winifred A. Perry never entered into any contract in writing with said defendants Magneson and R. A. Perry, or either of them, relating to the construction of said buildings; that said Winifred A. Perry never at any time gave notice pursuant to section 1192, Code of Civil Procedure, or otherwise that she would not be responsible for the labor performed or materials furnished in the construction of said buildings, but during all the time said Magneson was engaged in the construction of said buildings by the said R. A. Perry he was so engaged with the knowledge and consent of said Winifred, and all the materials furnished for said buildings were furnished with her knowledge and consent; that after said Magneson had abandoned said work, to wit, on March 22, 1911, said defendants R. A. and Winifred commenced to complete said buildings, and completed the same on or about September 6, 1911, and on that day notice of completion was duly filed by the said Winifred and defendants R. A. and Winifred that they had expended the sum of $18,359.59 in the said completion; that said buildings were not constructed nor were they completed according to the plans and specifications and original contract, but "were actually constructed in such a manner that the said buildings greatly exceeded in value the original contract price as agreed upon between the said parties defendant, to wit, the said R. A. and Winifred Perry and said Magneson"; that "no extras were ever agreed upon in writing nor any writing signed with relation to extras by any persons interested or by any of the parties, to wit, the said Perry and Magneson, in pursuance of subdivision 9 of the contract for said building, between the said defendant Magneson and said defendant R. A. Perry, hereinbefore specifically set forth"; "that during the course of the construction of said buildings and prior to the abandonment thereof by the defendant Magneson, said defendant R. A. Perry paid the said Magneson" certain stated sums at different stages of the work amounting in all to $10,000, "paid on account of the contract price and no more"; that the said defendants Magneson and Perry never at any time, nor did the said defendant Winifred A. Perry ever at any time, fix or attempt to fix, according to the provisions of said contract, or otherwise, by a fair and reasonable valuation or at all, the amount or values of said alterations of, deviations from, additions to, or omissions from said contract, in writing, or otherwise"; that the reasonable value of said extra work amounts in the aggregate to $3,866.28, "of which there had been paid, at the time of the abandonment aforesaid by said Magneson, the sum of $1,300."

It was also found: "That the value of the work and materials done and furnished in the construction of said buildings, including materials then actually delivered, on the ground, estimated as near as may be by the standard of the whole contract price (exclusive of the extra labor performed and materials furnished as aforesaid), at the time of the abandonment of the said contract by said Magneson as aforesaid, was and is the sum of $14,730"; that "all of the materials which were furnished by the plaintiffs herein were furnished to be used, and actually used, in the construction of said buildings, and all of the labor performed by these plaintiffs was actually performed upon and in the construction of said buildings, * * * all with the full knowledge and consent of the said Winifred A. Perry."

The foregoing are the general findings more or less applicable to all the claims involved.

The court then finds the facts as to the specific amounts of labor performed and materials furnished by the several plaintiffs, the filing of their liens, and the amount remaining unpaid in each case, amounting in all to the sum of $7,970.87.

The court found, among other conclusions of law, that the contract between Magneson and R. A. Perry, as recorded, was void, and "that no legal contract was ever made or entered into between the owner of said premises, to wit, Winifred A. Perry and O. M. Magneson, for or with relation to the construction of said buildings"; that the "liens hereinbefore declared in favor of said plaintiffs, and the said several sums hereinbefore stated and declared to be due, owing, and unpaid to the said plaintiffs respectively, are prior and superior to the rights, interests and claims of the defendants Winifred A. Perry and R. A. Perry, in and to said premises"; and that plaintiffs are entitled to have the "said described land, together with the buildings thereon and the premises thereof, sold * * * for the satisfaction of said respective liens," etc.

Judgment was accordingly entered.

Defendants appeal from the judgment and from the order denying their motion for a new trial.

The theories upon which respondents urge affirmance of the judgment are as follows:

(1) That a valid contract existed which was duly recorded; that it was abandoned, and hence the amount applicable to the liens of plaintiffs should be measured by section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

(2) That no contract existed, because in the construction of the buildings the plans and specifications of the recorded contract were so departed from and so increased the cost of the buildings as actually constructed as to "constitute a new and independent contract, and render void the recorded contract."

(3) That the entire interest of defendant Winifred A. Perry in the premises should be subjected to plaintiffs' liens because of her failure to give the notice of nonresponsibility required by section 1192, Code of Civil Procedure.

[1] The court found that there was a valid contract. If that finding is to stand, the payment of the liens must be determined by section 1200, Code of Civil Procedure, and the statutes in force prior to the act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1313). Section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, gives a lien to mechanics and materialmen for labor done or materials furnished, "whether at the instance of the owner, or of any other person acting by his authority or under him" and "in case of a contract for the work between the reputed owner and his contractor, the liens shall extend to the entire contract price, and such contract shall operate as a lien in favor of all persons, except the contractor, to the extent of the whole contract price."

Section 1200 provides that, where the contract has been abandoned before completion,

"the portion of the contract price applicable to the liens of other persons than the contractor, shall be fixed as follows: From the value of the work and materials already done and furnished at the time of such failure or abandonment, including materials then actually delivered or on the ground, which shall thereupon belong to the owner, estimated as near as may be by the standard of the whole contract price, shall be deducted the payments then due and actually paid, according to the terms of the contract and the provisions of sections 1183 and 1184, and the remainder shall be deemed the portion of the contract price applicable to such liens."

In the recent case of Roystone v. Darling, 171 Cal. 526, 154 Pac. 15, the history of our mechanic's lien law is very fully shown, and the various decisions of the Supreme Court are cited which have given construction to the statute as it has been amended from time to time. It was shown in that case that up to the passage of the act of 1911 the Supreme Court "has followed the rule established by the cases last cited and has uniformly declared, with respect to such liens, that if there is a valid contract, the contract price measures the limit of the amount of liens which can be required against the property by laborers and materialmen"; "that the contract, legally made, limits the liability of the owner to lien claimants." See, also, Ganahl Lumber Co. v. Weinsveig, 168 Cal. 664, 143 Pac. 1025, where the meaning of section 1200, as affecting the liability of the owner in the case of an abandoned valid contract, was very clearly pointed out.

What, then, was the situation when the contract was abandoned and what were the lienors' rights? The court found that the contract price was $23,567. It found that the value of the extra work performed and materials furnished at the time of abandonment was $3,866.28, of which there had been paid the sum of $1,300; and that the value of the work and materials, including materials then actually delivered at the ground, "estimated as near as may be by the standard of the whole contract price (exclusive of the extra labor performed and materials furnished as aforesaid), at the time of the abandonment of the said contract by said Magnuson as aforesaid, was and is the sum of $14,730," of which the sum of $10,000 had been paid.

Respondents state the account thus:

Labor performed and materials furnished	$14,730.00
Value of alterations, etc.	3,866.28
Total	$18,596.28
Upon which was paid	11,300.00

Leaving applicable to the liens..... $ 7,296.28
The court gave judgment for 7,970.87

—which is $674.59 more than the fund, accepting respondents' method of computation.

But respondents make no allowance for the cost of completing the buildings which, through no fault of appellants, were left in an unfinished condition. What the actual cost of completion was to appellants may be immaterial (Ganahl Lumber Co v. Weinsveig, supra), but as was said in Hoffman-Marks Co. v. Spires, 154 Cal. 111, 116, 97 Pac. 152, 154:

"When he (owner) is, without any default on his part, burdened with the cost of completing the building, it is but fair and just that he should be relieved of the obligation of paying to the original contractor, or those claiming under him, so much of the contract price as corresponds to the portion of the work left undone. In no other way can he be protected in his constitutional right to have his liability limited to the amount which, by a valid contract, he has agreed to pay."

We have been unable to formulate any equation under the rule of section 1200 as approved by the Supreme and appellate courts which would support the findings of the court for the full amount found subject to the liens, on the theory of a valid contract abandoned by the contractor.

The finding that there was a valid contract and that it was abandoned by the contractor before completion is sustained by the evidence, and, unless the judgment can find support upon one or other of plaintiffs' remaining theories, it must be reversed.

[2] Plaintiffs' second theory was that the original contract was rendered void by reason of the alterations in the plans adding so materially to the cost of the buildings. The contract contained the provision quoted above by which the owner was given the right to make any alterations he might wish to make "from said contract, specifications, or plans" which, when made, "shall in no way affect or make void the contract, but will be added to or deducted from the amount of said contract price, as the case may be, by a fair and reasonable valuation." Notice of the provision of the contract was given to all parties concerned by its recordation, and nearly all of them furnished some of the materials or labor constituting these alterations, and no objection was made to any claim because it was for extras. It would be difficult to express in language more explicit authority to deviate from the plans and specifications than is found in this contract. So far as lien claimants are concerned, alterations are immaterial, except where there is an abandonment, and in such case they may be considered in ascertaining the cost of completing the buildings according to the contract, for the contract so expressly provides. Johnson v. La Grave, 102 Cal. 324, 36 Pac. 651. That the owner may provide in his contract for changes or alterations in the building during its construction without invalidating the contract we do not doubt.

Witness Quinn, manager of plaintiff Pacific Manufacturing Company, was asked by plaintiffs' attorney whether or not there were changes or alterations made in the construction of the buildings prior to abandonment, and, if so, to state what, if any, there were.

"A. One of the changes made was in the cornice of the building. The owner took exception to it for some reason or other, and caused the cornice to be torn down and a new cornice was put up in place of it. Another change was made in the pergola after that was in place. The owner * * * objected to the use of beams, and had that torn down and a new pergola put in place. And then the owner was dissatisfied with the quality of brick used in the construction of the building and had a special brick manufactured. There were other changes of a minor character. * * * Q. Were there any changes in the interior arrangement of the house, the rooms, to your knowledge? A. No material changes."

He testified as to some changes made after abandonment, but we cannot see that they would affect the question of the lienors' rights at the time of abandonment; for they would be taken into account in ascertaining the cost of completion under the contract.

Other witnesses pointed out some changes made in the course of the construction of the building. The contract called for a "brick veneered and frame residence and garage." The court found that the reasonable value of the changes made, in materials and labor, was $3,866.28; that, while said changes did not materially alter the elevations and appearances of said buildings, the same consisted in the use of more expensive material, greater increase in labor, and necessitated the tearing out and replacing of certain work done and performed in the buildings, thereby changing the interior construction as to value and character of materials, and to a certain extent in general appearance. We do not think that the facts found justified the conclusion of the trial court that the contract was void.

[3-5] Plaintiffs' third theory calls for the application of section 1192. This claim is that this section of the Code of Civil Procedure makes the title and interest of defendant Winifred absolutely responsible irrespective of the contract, and that the findings and judgment may rest entirely on the fact that she did not give the notice contemplated by section 1192.

Plaintiffs allege in their complaints that:

"Said defendant R. A. Perry, acting for himself and on behalf of the said defendant Winifred A. Perry, and with her full knowledge and consent, entered into a contract in writing with the said defendant Magneson," etc.

In their answers, defendants admit these averments of the complaints.

The finding of the court was:

"That defendant R. A. Perry is, and was at all times herein mentioned, the reputed owner of the hereinafter described land, buildings, and premises, and that Winifred A. Perry is, and was at all times herein mentioned, the real owner, to wit, the owner in fee," etc.

The court also found that during all the time that labor was being performed or materials being furnished for said buildings said defendant Magneson was employed and engaged in the construction of said buildings by the said R. A. Perry, with the full knowledge and consent of the said defendant Winifred A. Perry, "and that all the materials furnished or labor performed" was furnished and performed with the knowledge and consent of the said Winifred A. Perry.

There was no direct finding that R. A. Perry executed the contract as the agent of his wife, Winifred, nor was there any evidence that she personally contracted with Magneson. The admitted averments of the complaint that defendant R. A. Perry entered into the contract on her behalf and with her full knowledge and consent rendered any finding on the fact of his authority to act for her in the matter immaterial. And the finding that "the said Winifred A. Perry never made or entered into any contract in writing with the said defendant R. A. Perry and one Magneson, or either of them, relating to the construction of said buildings," is not inconsistent with the fact that her husband entered into the contract on her behalf and with her full knowledge and consent.

It was said in Stimson Mill Co. v. Braun, 136 Cal. 122, 125, 68 Pac. 481, 482 (57 L. R. A. 726, 89 Am. St. Rep. 116):

"The materialman and the laborers are protected in their right to a lien by the provision in section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring such contract to be in writing and made a matter of public record. They know that, in accordance with the decisions of this court, the Legislature cannot give a right of lien to an extent greater than the contract price. By being placed upon record the contract is open to their inspection and examination, and if they are not content with its provisions they may decline to furnish any materials for the building or perform any labor thereon. But if they do furnish any, their right to a lien must be limited by the terms of the contract."

And as was said in the Roystone Case, supra:

"The contract, legally made, limits the liability of the owner to lien claimants."

In the present case there was a valid contract made on behalf of the owner and with her knowledge and consent, and it seems to us that the owner was not obliged also to give notice under section 1192 of nonresponsibility in addition to the recorded contract in order to secure the protection given her by the statute. We have found no case where our Supreme Court has held that lien claimants may disregard the recorded contract of the owner and proceed against him under section 1192 unless he has also given the notice mentioned in that section. Where the contract is made on his behalf and with his knowledge and consent, and is recorded, and the lien claimants so state in their complaints, we can see no reason why the contract should not be the measure of his liability. In short, the owner's liability under section 1192 does not attach when there is a valid recorded contract made in his behalf.

Some other questions are presented in the briefs, but the view we have taken renders their consideration unnecessary.

The learned trial court seems to have found the amount due on the claims upon the theory that the contract was void because of the alterations in the plans and that the owner was liable under section 1192. We think the contract was valid and the owner's liability should be measured by section 1200.

The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: HART, J.; ELLISON, Judge pro tem.

On Rehearing.

BRESLAUER v. McCORMICK-SAELTZER CO. (Civ. 1489.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 25, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 23, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT §80(10) — ACTION FOR SALARY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action to recover a balance alleged to be due on account of salary as chief clerk of a corporation at the rate of $175 per month, where the defendant claimed that the salary was $150 per month and had been fully paid, evidence held to sustain a judgment for the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 119; Dec. Dig. §80(10).]

2. PAYMENT §74(2) — ACTION FOR SALARY—RECEIPT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

In an action to recover from a corporation on account of salary at $175 per month, the fact that plaintiff, who received $150 a month and $25 per month out of a secret fund, signed a receipt each month in full was not conclusive that he had been paid the full agreed compensation, where it appeared that defendant did not want the receipt to show the full salary paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 138, 139, 229; Dec. Dig. §74(2).]

3. EVIDENCE §271(18) — DECLARATIONS — SELF-SERVING DECLARATIONS.

In an action for the balance due on account of salary, the stubs of checks and resolutions of the defendant's board of directors, made long after the making of the contract with plaintiff, were self-serving declarations, and properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1096; Dec. Dig. §271(18).]

4. ACCORD AND SATISFACTION §25(2) — PLEADING—ISSUES—FINDING.

In an action for the balance of salary at the rate of $175 per month, the answer denied that plaintiff had not been paid all his salary, and alleged that plaintiff had agreed to, and that defendant had promised to pay, a salary of $150 per month, which amount was paid, and that plaintiff received and accepted payments of that salary amounting to $2,250. The court found that the salary was $175 per month; that plaintiff received $150 per month, and the balance was due. Held, that the answer was no more than a statement that the agreed salary was $150 per month and that the full amount at that rate had been paid and accepted, and was not an allegation that there was an accord and satisfaction by which the parties settled a disputed claim on the basis of $150 per month, so as to require a finding on such issue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Accord and Satisfaction, Cent. Dig. §§ 154, 155; Dec. Dig. §25(2).]

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; James G. Estep, Judge.

Action by Louis Breslau for the McCormick-Saeltzer Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Carr & Kennedy, of Redding, for appellant. W. D. Tillotson, of Redding, for respondent.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. This action is brought by the plaintiff to recover of the defendant the sum of $375, balance alleged to be due on account of salary from February 28, 1914, to May 1, 1915. Plaintiff has judgment for the amount claimed, and the defendant appeals therefrom.

The complaint alleges that between the above dates plaintiff rendered services for defendant at its instance and request, each and every month, in the capacity of chief accountant and clerk; that for said services defendant promised to pay him at the rate of $175 per month, which salary for said time amounted to $2,625; that defendant had only paid him of said amount the sum of $2,250, leaving a balance due him of $375, which had not been paid, and for which judgment is asked. The answer denied that plaintiff's salary was fixed by agreement at $175 per month, but alleged it was fixed at $150 per month, and alleges that during said period of employment—

"the plaintiff received and accepted from defendant in payment of said salary the sum of $150 for each and every month of said time, amounting for said period to the total sum of $2,250, and alleges that said salary has been fully paid and satisfied."

The findings of the court followed closely the allegations and language of the complaint. The principal contention of the appellant is that the finding of the court "that for plaintiff's services the defendant promised to pay him $175 per month" is not sustained by the evidence, that the evidence shows he was only to receive $150 per month, and that this amount has been fully paid to him. It appears from the record that the defendant is engaged in the general merchandise business in the city of Redding, Shasta county, Cal., and has in its employ many persons. The plaintiff entered the employ of the defendant in July, 1901, as chief clerk and accountant, and continued with it until May 1, 1915. In February, 1910, and for some time prior thereto, the salary of the plaintiff appeared upon the books of the defendant as $125 per month, but for some time he had been receiving, in addition to his "book salary," $25 per month which was paid to him at the end of the year in a check for $300.

The plaintiff testifies that in the latter part of the year 1909, or the early part of 1910, he applied to the defendant for an increase in his compensation or salary. Quoting from his testimony:

"I applied to Mr. Saeltzer for an increase of salary. What was said to me: 'You were to receive a book salary of $150 per month.' A salary on a separate fund known as the 'secret fund' of $25 per month. It was said at the time I would get the $25 per month at the end of the year."

He further testified that after this incident his salary was entered on the books of the defendant at $150 per month, which was paid each month, and that $300 was paid him each year out of the "secret fund," and that this arrangement was carried out from February 28, 1910, to February 28, 1914. There is no conflict in the testimony as to the fact that the corporation kept a fund or account known as the "secret fund," and no dispute that plaintiff and other employes of the defendant received money from this fund, both before and after February, 1910, and no dispute that from February, 1910, to February, 1914, plaintiff was paid by defendant out of the fund $300 on four different occasions, making $1,200 in all. This gave him a compensation for his work between those dates of $175 per month. From February, 1914, to May 1, 1915, he only received $150 per month, and received nothing out of the secret fund. The extra $25 per month for the period between the last two dates is the basis of this action. The defendant denies that it ever agreed to pay the plaintiff at any time any salary in excess of the $150 per month appearing on its books.

The conflict between the parties centers, largely, around the significance and meaning of this transfer of money from the "secret account" to the plaintiff, the position of the latter being that the $25 per month was paid to him as a part of his agreed salary out of this fund; the defendant's position is that the $300 per year paid was a pure gift for good services rendered, and not the result of any contractual liability; that it could give it or not to the plaintiff in any years as it saw fit.

The plaintiff testified that Mr. Saeltzer gave as a reason for not having the books show he was getting $175 per month that he did not want the other employes to know what salary any particular employe was getting. In this he is corroborated by the testimony of Mr. Saeltzer, from which it appears a "secret fund" was kept, and from it other employes besides the plaintiff received extra compensation. His testimony shows that the "secret fund" was a recognized part of the machinery for transacting the business of the corporation. As to its purpose and use, Mr. Saeltzer testified:

"The secret fund was kept to pay extra salaries. To explain salary—for instance, we have a person in our employ who is working for $75 per month, and that being a good man. And he says: 'I want to leave; I can make more money.' I don't want to give him more on the books, for the next man would want more salary if I started this. So I would pay him the extra salary out of the secret fund, and the board would approve it."

[1] We think this testimony of Mr. Saeltzer clears up the whole situation and corroborates the plaintiff. It makes manifest that the defendant did not want the books to show, in all cases, the salary that was being paid to an employe, and that they did not; that the "secret fund" was kept for the purpose of paying "the extra salary" (to quote his testimony), extra salary meaning salary agreed upon in excess of that entered on the books, and that plaintiff was paid $1,200 out of this "secret fund" after his salary was raised on the books from $125 per month to $150. That the plaintiff did have an arrangement with the defendant that he was to get $25 per month in addition to his book salary of $150 per month seems clear. And the evidence shows he did receive it for four years. His book salary was raised from $125 per month to $150 per month February, 1910. After this, according to the testimony of Mr. Saeltzer, he secured, in addition to his book salary, the following sums: January 1, 1911, $300; May 23, 1912, $300; December 22, 1913, $300; December 24, 1914, $300. The above testimony of the defendant's manager amply supports the plaintiff's contention that there was a "secret fund," that out of it he was paid $300 per year extra compensation for several years, not as a gratuity, but as of right under the terms of his contract with the defendant, and that he is entitled to it as of right for the period embraced herein.

Appellant further contends that the plaintiff's testimony is inconsistent with the entries made in the books of the corporation by himself. It is true that for the period here involved, the plaintiff's salary was entered upon the books of the corporation as $150 per month. But in view of the plaintiff's testimony that it was a part of his agreement with R. M. Saeltzer that the books should show a salary only of $150 per month, the discrepancy between his actual salary and the book entries stands explained. The entries on the books were in accordance with the contract.

There is other evidence in the record bearing upon the finding under discussion, both in favor of the plaintiff and the defendant. We have examined it all with care, but enough has been referred to to show that the finding of the learned trial judge that plaintiff was working under a contract for an agreed compensation of $175 per month finds substantial support in the evidence.

[2] 2. It appears that during the later months of plaintiff's employment the system of paying employes was changed to a time card system, and employes receipted on the card. The plaintiff signed these receipts. The receipts were worded as follows:

"Received payment in full for period and amount stated, and time recorded on this card."

Counsel for appellant claims that this should be held conclusive on plaintiff that he had been paid his full agreed compensation. A receipt is never conclusive evidence. Is always open to explanation. The explanation contained in the record is sufficient to prevent this receipt from concluding plaintiff. If the defendant did not want the books of the corporation to show the salary plaintiff was receiving, and the evidence is ample for the drawing of such a conclusion, then it did not want, for same reason, the receipts to show it. It would have been an idle act to have the books show that he was getting only $150 per month, and follow this with a receipt showing he was receiving $175 per month.

[3] 3. The stubs of checks and resolutions of the board of directors, made months and years after the contract was made with plaintiff, were self-serving declarations, and properly excluded.

[4] 4. It is claimed the court erred in failing to find upon a material issue raised by the answer. In the brief of counsel the allegation of the answer upon which it is claimed no finding was made is quoted as follows:

"That during said time defendant paid to plaintiff, and plaintiff received and accepted in payment of said salary, the sum of $150 for each and every month of said time, amounting for said period to the total sum of $2,250."

To properly appreciate the significance of the above language, it must be considered in connection with its context. It is found in paragraph 4 of the answer. The first part of the paragraph denies that plaintiff has not been paid all of his salary and, proceeding, says:

"Defendant alleges that for said services so rendered by plaintiff to defendant during said time mentioned in the complaint, plaintiff agreed to accept and defendant promised to pay to plaintiff a salary at the rate of $150 per month for each and every month during said time, and amounting to the total sum of $2,250" (and alleges that during said time defendant paid to plaintiff and plaintiff received and accepted from defendant in payment of his salary, the sum of $150 for each and every month of said time, amounting in said period to the total sum of $2,250, and alleges that said salary has been fully paid and satisfied).

The court has found that the agreed salary was $175 per month, and that of it only $150 per month has been paid, and that the balance is unpaid and due. The part of the answer above quoted and placed in parentheses, when considered with its context, is no more than a statement that the agreed salary was $150 per month, and that the full amount computed at that rate has been paid and accepted by defendant. The statement in the answer that his salary was to be $150 per month is the pleader's statement of what the contract of employment was as originally made, and is not, and was not intended as, a statement that after the services were performed, there was an accord and satisfaction in and by which plaintiff and defendant settled a disputed claim on the agreed basis of $150 per month for the period.

Viewed in this light, the findings of the court fully cover the issue made.

The judgment is affirmed.

FEE v. MCPHEE CO. et al. (Civ. 1475.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 28, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 27, 1916.)

1. ACCOUNT STATED 19(3) — EVIDENCE — SUFFICIENCY.

In an action on an account stated, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that the defendant corporation's president knew the contents of the statement prepared by the bookkeeper and presented to him by plaintiff at the time he approved it, so as to make it an account stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. § 93; Dec. Dig. 19(3).]

2. ACCOUNT STATED 1 — ELEMENTS.

An "account stated" is a writing which exhibits the state of an account between the parties and strikes a balance which is agreed upon by them so as to become a new contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. §§ 1-8; Dec. Dig. 1.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Account Stated.]

3. ACCOUNT STATED 11 — CORRECTION — MISTAKE.

Where an account stated, because of a mistake of the bookkeeper in addition, does not show the true balance between the parties, it may be opened and corrected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. §§ 61-72; Dec. Dig. 11.]

4. ACCOUNT STATED 13 — CORRECTION — BURDEN OF PROOF.

A party seeking to avoid an account stated must allege the error, mistake, or fraud on which he relies, and establish it by clear and satisfactory evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. §§ 77-80; Dec. Dig. 13.]

5. ACCOUNT STATED 11 — CORRECTION — INSERTION OF NEW ITEMS.

In an account stated between a contracting corporation and its superintendent who was to receive a proportion of the net profits on certain contracts, where the account was based on the corporation's books which were kept in the same manner as they had been in previous similar transactions, the account cannot be corrected by charging against the profits certain expenditures for president's salary and other items not chargeable to any particular contract, and never before charged against the superintendent, the charges being made for the first time on the corporation's books after the institution of suit on the account stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. §§ 61-72; Dec. Dig. 11.]

6. INTEREST 39(5) — ACCOUNT STATED — PERIOD OF COMPUTATION.

Under Civ. Code, § 1917, providing that in the absence of express contract, interest is payable on all moneys due on any settlement of account, from the day on which the balance is ascertained, and section 3287, providing that every person entitled to recover damages, certain or capable of being made certain by calculation, is entitled to recover interest thereon from the day the right to recover is vested in him, plaintiff in an action on an account stated is not limited to interest from the date of the judgment, but may recover it from the commencement of the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. § 87; Dec. Dig. 39(5).]

7. PARTNERSHIP 12 — CREATION — SHARING PROFIT AND LOSS.

A contract between a contracting corporation, not shown to have authority to enter into a copartnership, and its superintendent, whereby the superintendent was to receive a percentage of the net profits on certain contracts and to be charged with a similar percentage of the losses, the superintendent having no interest in the property of the corporation used in the work, does not make the parties copartners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 27; Dec. Dig. 12.]

8. EVIDENCE 471(3) — OPINION EVIDENCE — CONCLUSION — ACCOUNT BOOKS.

Where a witness has identified the account books and explained the items therein shown, a question as to what the books showed to have been the profits of a certain job is not objectionable as calling for a conclusion of the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2151, 2164; Dec. Dig. 471(3); Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 833.]

9. TRIAL 69 — DISCRETION OF COURT — ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE AFTER MOTION FOR NONSUIT.

It is discretionary with the court to allow evidence to meet objections made by the motion for nonsuit for lack of proof on certain matters.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 164, 165; Dec. Dig. 69.]

10. EVIDENCE 134 — ADMISSIBILITY — SIMILAR FACTS — ACCOUNTS.

In an action on an account stated, showing plaintiff's share of the profits of certain contracts where defendant claimed that certain items of expenditure should have been charged against the contract, thereby reducing the profits, evidence of previous similar transactions between the parties which had been settled without including similar items of expenditure is admissible to aid the court in determining what the parties meant by net profits.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Mogan, Judge.

Two actions by Grant Fee against the McPhee Company and others. From the judgments for the plaintiff in each action, and from orders denying new trials, the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

William P. Hubbard, of San Francisco, for appellants. Aitken & Aitken and R. H. Countryman, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Two actions between the same parties are included in the appeal, one having been numbered in the court below 17,022, the other 18,032, both having been tried together. The transcript on appeal covers 1,292 printed pages, and the briefs comprise half as many more. The appeals are by defendants from the respective judgments and from orders denying their motions for new trials made in each case, and 354 alleged errors of law are specified in the assignments of errors.

The complaint in the first action, No. 17,- 022, was filed June 6, 1908. It is therein alleged that defendant McPhee Company was a corporation organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of California, with its office and principal place of business in the city and county of San Francisco; that defendants Daniel McPhee and Anna McPhee were at all times husband and wife; that defendant Daniel, during all the times mentioned, was doing business under the name and style of McPhee Company; that defendants sued fictitiously as First Doe, Second Doe, and Third Doe were the owners of one share each, and defendants Daniel and Anna McPhee were the owners of 248½ shares each of the capital stock of said corporation, the entire issued capital stock being 500 shares; "that said defendants other than the defendants sued herein as stockholders of the defendant McPhee Company are indebted to this plaintiff in the sum of $13,649.27 upon and as for and upon an account stated made by and between said defendants except said defendants sued herein as stockholders and this plaintiff." It is then alleged that "said defendants other than those who are sued as stockholders of said defendant corporation within two years last past * * * entered into a written agreement with this plaintiff from time to time, by which it was agreed that in the course of the erection and construction of certain buildings, this plaintiff should act as the superintendent thereof and receive 40 per cent. of the net profits of the erection and construction of said buildings"; that plaintiff performed his part of said contracts and from time to time received various sums of money on account thereof; that, on May 28, 1908, plaintiff and defendants "other than said defendants sued as stockholders" entered into an account stated and the amount of the indebtedness to plaintiff was fixed at the sum of $13,649.27, which said defendants promised to pay; that no part thereof has been paid and that said stockholders are liable for their proportionate amount of said indebtedness.

In a second count of the complaint it was stated "that this plaintiff performed certain work and rendered certain services to defendants other than said defendants sued herein as stockholders of the defendant corporation," and that plaintiff was to receive 40 per cent. of the net profits received for the construction of said buildings; that the said profits thereof were $65,229.56; that 40 per cent. thereof is $25,991.82; that plaintiff has been paid $12,342.45, leaving due him the sum of $13,649.27. The prayer is for the last-mentioned sum; judgment being asked against the five stockholders named for their proportionate amounts.

A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and defendants, other than those fictitiously named, answered. Denied that Daniel McPhee "was doing business under the name and style, or name or style, of McPhee Company, otherwise or at all except under the name of McPhee Company, a corporation"; denied that defendant Anna was the owner of any greater number of shares of the capital stock of said corporation than ten shares; denied the indebtedness sued for; denied that they entered into written agreements with plaintiff by which it was agreed that plaintiff should act as superintendent of the construction of the buildings referred to and should receive 40 per cent. of the net profits thereof; denied performance by plaintiff of the conditions of the contracts alleged; denied making an account stated and that any amount of indebtedness was fixed. The averments of the second cause of action were specifically denied.

The trial commenced on November 17, 1909, and, before its conclusion and on December 1, 1909, an amended complaint was filed, containing two counts. The allegations were the same as in the original complaint, with these exceptions: W. M. Willett, J. F. Campbell, and W. E. Lowe were substituted as defendants for First Doe, Second Doe, and Third Doe; it was alleged that defendant Daniel McPhee was the owner of 483 shares, and defendant Anna McPhee of 10 shares of the capital stock of said corporation; that the account stated was for $13,749.27, and that $100 had been paid thereon; the amount alleged in the second cause of action to be due was $15,649.27, and judgment was prayed for that amount.

A demurrer to the amended complaint was overruled, and an answer was filed, with similar denials as those contained in the answer to the original complaint.

On April 6, 1910, an amendment to the answer was filed, setting up two additional further and separate defenses, in the first of which it was alleged that in any account stated between the parties, mistakes, errors, and omissions were made therein by the bookkeeper who prepared "such alleged account stated," and that it showed only "gross profits and losses," the items being enumerated and aggregating $14,544.59 "as appearing in favor of the plaintiff herein." It was also alleged, as a further and separate defense, that both counts of the complaint were barred by the provisions of subdivision 1, section 339, of the Code of Civil Procedure.

On April 1, 1912, plaintiff filed an "amendment to amended complaint" to be added to the first count, setting up a mistake by the bookkeeper by which $5,000 of the net profits made by the defendant corporation were omitted from the account upon which plaintiff was to receive 40 per cent., "and if said account stated had expressed said real intention of plaintiff and the defendant corporation, said account would have shown an additional $5,000 of net profits, and said account should and would have been stated for the correct sum due plaintiff, to wit, the sum of $15,749.27." A denial of these allegations was filed by defendants.

The complaint in action No. 18,032, filed July 31, 1908, contained similar averments to those set up in the original complaint in action No. 17,022, alleging an indebtedness of $1,123.78, for which amount judgment was asked. An amended complaint was filed December 1, 1909, containing the same changes as made in the amended complaint filed in the other action on the same date. Answers were filed to both pleadings, denying the material allegations thereof.

Very full findings were filed in each action. A nonsuit was granted as to the defendant Daniel McPhee, doing business under the name of McPhee Company. The judgment in action No. 17,022 was in favor of plaintiff against the corporation for the sum of $14,491.33, with interest from the date of the commencement of the action, the aggregate being $18,529.15; judgment was also entered against defendant Daniel McPhee for $17,899.17, and against defendant Anna McPhee for $370.56. In action No. 18,032, the judgment against the corporation, including interest from the commencement of the action, was $1,427.78, against defendant Daniel for $1,379.20, and against defendant Anna for $28.54.

As is apparent from the pleadings, the corporation defendant McPhee Company was engaged in the general contracting business in San Francisco and plaintiff was its superintendent of construction. Six written agreements were entered into by the plaintiff and defendant corporation, which were received in evidence and marked, respectively, Exhibits 1 to 6. Exhibit 1 was as follows:

"San Francisco Cal., April 1/05.

"This is to certify that Grant Fee is entitled to 40 per cent. of the net profits on our contract, Fairmont Hotel dated, Jan. 13/05, salaries and office expenses to be charged to the contract.

"All money allowed Grant Fee during construction to be charged against his 40 per cent., on settlement at completion of the contract.

"McPhee Company,
"D. McPhee, Pres't."

Exhibit No. 2 was as follows:

"San Francisco, Cal., Nov. 3/05.

"This is to certify that Grant Fee is entitled to 40 per cent. of the net profits of our contract, Deming Building located on the southeast corner of Post and Stockton St., S. F.

"Should there be a loss on the building it is agreed that 40 per cent. of the net loss on the Deming Building is to be deducted from Grant Fee's share of the profits on our contract, Fairmont Hotel dated Jan. 13/05." (Same signatures as to Exhibit No. 1.)

Exhibit No. 3, dated June 25, 1906, certified that plaintiff was entitled to 40 per cent. of the net profits on 17 specified contracts.

Exhibit No. 4 was dated December 1, 1906, covered three separate contracts, and contained the following clause:

"Should there be a loss on any of the above-named contracts it is agreed that Grant Fee is to assume 40 per cent. of such loss, the same to be deducted from his share of the profits."

Exhibit No. 5, dated April 18, 1907, covered 4 separate contracts and contained a clause in the same words and figures as last above quoted.

Exhibit No. 6, dated September 28, 1907, covered two contracts and provided that in case of loss on said contracts, "Grant Fee is to stand 40 per cent. of said loss same to be deducted from his share of profits on other work."

Appellants, in their opening brief, urge the following general points as demanding reversal of the judgments: (1) There was no account stated. (2) Interest was allowable only from the date of judgment. (3) The judgment rendered was for 40 per cent. of gross profits and not for 40 per cent. of net profits. (4) The contracts created the relation of a partnership or joint undertaking between plaintiff and defendant corporation. (5) The court erred in its rulings during the trial. (6) The court erred in other particulars in its findings.

The court found that the defendant corporation entered into written agreements with plaintiff by which it was agreed that in the course of the construction of certain buildings, plaintiff should act as superintendent thereof and receive therefor 40 per cent. of the net profits arising from the construction of said buildings, and that plaintiff performed all the terms and conditions of said agreement on his part to be performed, and there became due plaintiff various sums as his proportion of said net profits; that said proportion at the commencement of the action amounted to the sum of $67,334.46, and that said 40 per cent. of said net profits amounted to the sum of $26,933.78, of which plaintiff has been paid $12,442.45, leaving due and owing to plaintiff from defendant corporation the sum of $14,491.33, no part of which has been paid; that on May 30, 1908, plaintiff and defendant made and agreed to an account stated of said indebtedness due to plaintiff, and as a result of said accounting the amount of the net profits of defendant on said buildings and the construction thereof was shown to be $65,288.43, and defendants' indebtedness to plaintiff, after charging all debits against him, was fixed and stated to be the sum of $13,749.27, and it was then and there so agreed between plaintiff and defendant, and defendant thereupon promised and agreed to pay plaintiff the said sum of $13,749.27; "that in said account stated and in the making thereof, mistakes, errors, and omissions were made by which mistakes, errors, and omissions net profits amounting to $2,046.03 made by the defendant corporation McPhee Company in the erection and construction on said buildings upon which plaintiff was to receive 40 per cent. of the net profits, was omitted from said account," and said account, through said errors, did not represent the real intention of plaintiff and defendant; that said errors were made by the defendants' bookkeeper in erroneously adding up a certain column of figures contained in what defendant called the "Cost Book," showing the sum of money expended by defendant in said work, and through said error there was set down as expenditures the sum of $5,000 more than the true sum; that by reason of the mistake as to the said sum of $5,000, or, rather, with certain other mistakes, errors, and omissions of said bookkeeper, the said net profits were in fact $2,046.03 in addition to said $65,288.43, the total net profits being $67,334.46, and the correct amount of net profits due plaintiff should be and is the sum of $14,491.33.

The court found adversely to all the errors, omissions, and mistakes alleged in the answer to have occurred in stating the account, to wit, items in respect of salaries, office expenses, interest, insurance, use of donkey engine, and as to these the court found that none of said items was "omitted from said account stated in making up said account stated through mistake, error, or omission of said plaintiff and defendant corporation McPhee Company, or through the mistake, error, or omission of the bookkeeper of said defendant corporation," except "the court has allowed $809 for insurance and given the defendant corporation credit therefor in ascertaining the net profits as hereinbefore found, and in finding the additional net profits which should have been allowed to the plaintiff in making said stated account." The court also found that defendant's bookkeeper did in fact figure the office expenses to be $1,800, which sum is the correct sum and was charged for office expenses in making said account stated. The court also found that neither cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations.

As conclusions of law, the court found the plaintiff was entitled to judgment as we have hereinabove stated.

We shall address ourselves to the principal action (No. 17,022 in the superior court), in which judgment for the larger amount, $18,529.15, was rendered. No question arises as to the ownership of the shares of defendant corporation, 97 per cent. of which belonged to defendant D. McPhee—he and his wife owning over 98 per cent. of the 500 shares; nor is there any question as to his authority as president and manager of the corporation, to represent and act for it during all the time plaintiff was connected with it. There had been no meeting of the stockholders or directors for years, its business being carried on by McPhee. The corporation, in fact, represented his business incorporated. Our reference, when made to the defendant, will mean the corporation.

evidence. The account was introduced as Exhibit 7, and is as follows:

--------------	-------------------

The notations, "Nov. 17/09 First page E P M J" and "Nov. 17/09 Second page E P M J," were made by his honor, Judge Mogan, at the trial.

The notation: "O. K. A. M. G." on second page was placed there by defendant's bookkeeper, Mrs. Goodspeed. Otherwise than the notation made by Judge Mogan, the account is as it was handed to plaintiff by the bookkeeper.

It will be observed that there are two pages comprising this account, each initialed by the trial judge. The one spoken of in the testimony as the "second page" is signed: "O. K. McPhee." This account covers transactions concerning the contract made April 1, 1905, in relation to the Fairmont Hotel, and ending February, 1908, the account having been first stated February 22, 1908.

The "first page," so-called, brings the account down to May 28, 1908. This page was not signed by McPhee. The facts as to the preparation of the account and its signing by McPhee were given in the testimony of plaintiff and of Mrs. Goodspeed, who was the defendants' bookkeeper. Plaintiff testified that he asked the bookkeeper to make a statement of the profits and losses on the different jobs in which he was associated or superintended and the moneys drawn by him and the moneys due him; that she made the statement in writing and gave it to plaintiff showing the account down to February 21, 1908; that he gave the paper to McPhee between the 1st and 10th of March. He testified:

"I told him this was the statement made up by the bookkeeper, showing the profits and losses on the different jobs, the amount of money drawn by me, and the amount of money due me at this date. * * * He took the paper and said that he would look it over"; that McPhee retained it in his possession until the other account ("first page") was handed him more than two months later; that at plaintiff's request, the bookkeeper continued the account down to May 23, 1908, showing the profits and losses and moneys drawn to that date; that this continuation was a carbon copy of the prior statement which had been handed to McPhee; that on May 28, 1908, the bookkeeper prepared a further statement as to two buildings—the Borel Bank and Pacific Union Club—just completed; that this statement was pinned to the prior statement, the two constituting what is referred to as Plaintiff's Exhibit 7. The carbon copy of the February account with its continuations, being the portion referred to as "second page," and the subsequent account constituting what is referred to as the "first page."

He testified that on May 30, 1908, he gave McPhee—

"the carbon copy of that same paper and the extension brought down and the other business pinned onto it." "Q. Were they attached together with a pin? A. At that time; yes, sir. Q. And the papers were in the same condition then as they are now, as to figures, totals, etc.? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was that written in lead pencil on that second page 'O. K. McPhee'? A. He placed that on there that day."

As to what occurred at that time, he testified:

"I handed the paper to Mr. McPhee, and told him that was a statement of the profits and losses on the jobs, and the moneys that I had drawn, and what was due me to date, and that Mrs. Goodspeed did not want to put this amount to my credit on the books without he first O. K'd the statement. * * * Mr. McPhee took the paper and he looked it over for a little while and O. K'd the paper and signed his name to it and handed it to Mrs. Goodspeed, and told her that was all right, to place it in the books."

Mrs. Goodspeed testified:

"I saw Mr. Fee on that occasion hand this paper to Mr. McPhee; that paper, plaintiff's Exhibit 7, as near as I can remember, was, at that time, in its present condition and I think both pinned together. As near as I can remember, Mr. Fee said: 'Mr. McPhee,' he says, 'here is a statement of the profits and losses and the balance due me as far as I know.' * * * The Court: Q. Did Mr. McPhee look at the paper? A. Yes, sir. Mr. Aitken: Q. Then what? A. He looked at it quite a few minutes, and then he said, 'That is all right, Grant.' Q. Did he sign it? A. I saw him sign it. * * * Q. Did he say to you, asking about putting it in the books to Mr. Grant Fee's credit? A. I turned around to Mr. McPhee, and I said, 'Mr. McPhee, will I put this in the books?' and he said, 'Yes.'"

She testified that McPhee handed the paper to her with this instruction, and that later she gave it to plaintiff.

Both before and after this account was stated as plaintiff testified, he had been demanding from McPhee money on account for the purpose of building a house and also to make a contemplated trip east, and these demands amounted to $9,000; that McPhee made frequent promises to meet his demands, but put him off to await a payment due or soon to become due on the Call building.

"The Court: Q. At that time he had in his possession, and there was due you, you claim, eleven odd thousand dollars? A. Yes, sir. The Court: Q. But you were only asking a certain sum on account? A. Yes, sir."

After plaintiff commenced the action, plaintiff met McPhee at the latter's request. Plaintiff testified:

"Mr. McPhee wanted to know why I had brought suit. I told him I was unable to get the money that was due me; he had promised repeatedly and I could not succeed in getting any of it, and I brought suit to protect myself; that I needed the money and wanted it. * * * He said he owed me the money, but he did not have the money just then. * * * There was no question about his owing me the money. * * * He and I conceded that there was this amount due me of $13,000 and some odd dollars."

Later they met in the office of John R. Aitken, one of plaintiff's attorneys, to talk over the matter. Mr. Aitken testified quite fully to what was said in his office by the parties. Among other things, he testified:

"Mr. Fee used words like these: 'You owe me this money; why don't you pay it? Why don't you keep your word?' Mr. McPhee said: 'Well, I owe the money, I know I owe you the money,' or words to that effect, substantially that he owed the amount of money we had sued for. I am trying to give you almost the exact words used by Mr. Fee and Mr. McPhee. * * * Substantially it was this: Mr. Fee said: 'You owe me this money'; and Mr. McPhee said he owed the amount of money that we had sued for. * * * I used the words, stating the amount, $13,649, and Mr. McPhee said that he owed the amount, but that he did not have the money and would give his notes at 15, 30, and 60 days for it without security, and I advised Mr. Fee not to accept the offer. * * * The Court: Q. Was the amount mentioned in the conversation, or was the claim mentioned? A. The amount was mentioned in the conversation, I know."

It is not necessary to state more of the testimony to show that McPhee knew the contents of the Exhibit 7 and the amount therein stated as the balance due plaintiff and the amount plaintiff claimed to be due him.

[2] We think also that this Exhibit 7 was what the law regards as an account stated. In Mercantile Trust Co. v. Doe, 26 Cal. App. 246, 256, 146 Pac. 692, 695, we had occasion to say:

"To turn an account into an account stated, it must have been rendered with a view of ascertaining the balance and making a final adjudication of the matter involved in the account; or, in other words, to bring about a meeting of the minds of the parties."

That this is precisely what was effected in the case here seems to us plain enough.

In Gardner v. Watson, 170 Cal. 570, 574, 150 Pac. 994, 995, the Supreme Court very recently said:

"Over what in law constitutes an account there was never any question in this state, and very little uncertainty exists in other states."

Quoting from Baird v. Crank, 98 Cal. 297, 33 Pac. 65, the court said:

"It must appear that at the time of the accounting certain claims existed, of and concerning which an account was stated, that a balance was then struck and agreed upon, and that defendant expressly admitted that a certain sum was then due from him as a 'debt.'"

And as was said in Coffee v. Williams, 103 Cal. 556, 37 Pac. 506:

"An account stated is a document—a writing—which exhibits the state of account between parties and the balance owing from one to the other; and when assented to, either expressly or impliedly, it becomes a new contract."

See 1 Ruling Case Law, p. 207, title Accounts & Accounting.

We need to go no further into the books to warrant the finding of the court that the document here in question was an account stated.

[3] 2. Appellants contend that the account was opened up by proof of mistakes, errors, and omissions, and hence it ceased to be an account stated. Defendants' bookkeeper testified that the account was stated from entries in what were called "Cost Books," in which were entered all the items of receipts and disbursements relating to the contracts with plaintiff, as had been done in agreements not now involved, but similar previous transactions which had been carried on by the same parties and had been closed up in the same manner. She testified that after this account had been stated she discovered that in adding the column showing expenditures on the Fairmont Hotel, she had made a mistake of $5,000 which affected the profits to that extent on that contract, and made a difference in plaintiff's balance of $2,000. She also discovered some other minor mistakes, both debits and credits, resulting in $46.03 more to pass to plaintiff's balance.

"In the absence of allegation and proof of fraud or mistake which taints the entire account, the court will not open and unravel it as if no accounting had been made, but the settlement will be binding except for the errors shown." 1 Corpus Juris, p. 721.

We held in Adams v. Gerig, 25 Cal. App. 638, 640, 145 Pac. 106, that it was proper for the court, in an action for an account stated, to allow evidence of omissions and errors therein and find in favor of plaintiff in accordance with the facts.

Johnson v. Gallatin Valley Milling Co., 38 Mont. 83, 98 Pac. 883, was a case where an account was stated in relation to an invoice of wheat sold by plaintiff to defendant. A balance was struck and plaintiff signed at the bottom a receipt in full payment. He afterwards discovered that there was a shortage in the number of bushels and in the true balance due, to his disadvantage, and he demanded of defendant to make the correction, which being refused, he brought the action to surcharge the account stated. Said the court:

"The rules of law applicable to such cases as the present, wherein one of the parties seeks to avoid the settlement and reopen the account, are simple and of easy application. The balance ascertained from a statement of accounts was formerly held to be the result of so deliberate an act by the parties as to preclude an examination into the items for the purpose of correcting errors or mistakes; but this rule has been so far relaxed that, while the promise to pay the ascertained balance is in effect a new promise, the settlement being regarded as the consideration for it, the settlement does not create an estoppel, but furnishes a strong prima facie presumption that the result is correct." (Citing cases.)

[4] It was held that the burden of proof is cast upon the party seeking to avoid this new promise and open up to investigation the antecedent dealings between the parties, and he must allege the error, mistake, or fraud on which he relies and establish it by clear and satisfactory evidence. See, also, note to Jasper Trust Company v. Lampkin, 136 Am. St. Rep. 48.

It was in obedience to this rule that defendant sought to surcharge the account and introduced evidence of what it regarded as errors, omissions, and mistakes.

[5] 3. At this point we may dispose of defendants' contention that it was error to find against it in these particulars. The precise point urged is that the judgment rendered was for 40 per cent. of gross, and not 40 per cent. of net, profits, and this because it failed to take into account certain items which defendant contends should have been considered.

Defendant devotes much attention to the cases and text-writers on the question of what constitute net profits as contradistinguished from gross profits, and the rule by which they are to be ascertained, but he deduces the conclusion that the term "net profits" used in the contracts necessarily implies that the items claimed by defendant should have been included as expenditures, thus reducing proportionately the net profits on the several contracts. Defendants' position might find support were this an accounting of the general business of the corporation between persons mutually interested in such general business, which it is not. There were six separate contracts, each referring to a particular building or buildings, or to particular work at certain places. There was no necessary connection between any two or more of them except as provided in the contracts themselves. Expressly in some and impliedly in others, there was by the terms of the contracts to be a settlement at the completion of each contract. Forty per cent. of the net loss in the Deming building (No. 2) was to be deducted from plaintiff's share of the profits on the Fairmont Hotel contract. No. 3 embraced the Newhall building and "the net profits on repair work" at certain designated places, and plaintiff was to be allowed his profits "on settlement at completion of the contract and work." No. 4 mentions the second Newhall building, the Pope Estate building and certain work on the Claus Spreckels building, and the contract provided that:

"Should there be a loss on any of the above-named contracts, it is agreed that Grant Fee is to assume 40 per cent. of such loss, the same to be deducted from his share of the profits."

No. 5 contained a similar provision as to the work therein provided for, that is, plaintiff was to share losses in any of the work therein mentioned. In No. 6, the Borel Building, and brick work on the Call powerhouse, the contract reads:

"Should there be a loss on the above-named work, it is agreed that Grant Fee is to stand 40 per cent. of said loss, same to be deducted from his share of profits on other work."

Whether the terms "other work" referred to work mentioned in that contract or in all others is not clear. It is not very material since in preparing the stated account the bookkeeper took up the work from the beginning and entered the profits and losses on each, and struck a balance, thus giving defendant the benefit of all losses. But the contracts show and the evidence was that plaintiff had nothing to do with the other business of the corporation or enterprises in which it was engaged, or in the private enterprises or business of McPhee outside of the corporation which amounted to a large sum and absorbed most of McPhee's time. The testimony of the bookkeeper and of plaintiff was that the account was made from entries in defendants' books showing the receipts and disbursements—the profits and losses—connected with each contract and building and piece of work constructed or performed under it. Mrs. Goodspeed testified that she was then and had been bookkeeper for defendant for about six years. She testified: "I keep a ledger, journal, cashbook and the cost books; they are the books of the McPhee Company." She testified that she "kept the accounts of the receipts, expenditures, and disbursements relating to those buildings (referring to the six different contracts) in the cashbooks of the McPhee Company" and that she made up the document—Plaintiff's Exhibit 7—and that it represented "the profits and losses shown on the books at that time. * * * That is the summary of the accounts as kept by the McPhee Company in the cost book." "Q. That is the way you kept the account of these jobs in the cost book? A. Yes."

Speaking of one of these cost books, and it seems there were several of them, the witness said:

"The book I have in my hand is the cost book of the McPhee Company, No. 5. The cost of the various buildings and work done by the McPhee Company was kept in the journals and ledgers and the cost books. The items were first entered in the journal and ledger, and in the cost book right afterwards."

This cost book No. 5 contained the items as to the Lowe building, which the witness gave in detail as she did as to the other buildings of which entries were made in other cost books commencing with cost book No. 1. For example, cost book No. 1 contained the items as to the Deming building—a $21,000 job in which the loss was over $4,000 charged against plaintiff. Cost book No. 2 contained the items as to the Newhall, Folsom, and most jobs on which there was a net profit, and some other jobs; this book also contained the items as to the Newhall Halleck street job and the Pope Estate job. Cost book No. 3 contained the Pope Mission street job, Irwin residence, Bush street job, Aronson Building, and other jobs. No. 4 contained items of repair work. The items of all these jobs were read into the record "as shown by the books of the company." The witness testified the date the work mentioned in the contracts "was completed so far as the McPhee Company was concerned on the 23d day of May, 1908," and the amount of money drawn by plaintiff on the various jobs, which, as appeared by the ledger, was $12,385.10 and $157.35 merchandise.

4. We cannot pursue the testimony as to the character and purpose of these cost books. It showed that they were kept with the view of recording just what the parties to the contracts meant should be in them, and what they intended were to be considered in ascertaining the receipts and expenditures from which were to be computed the net profits of the work called for. Some time after this action was begun, Mr. McPhee employed an accountant to examine the books and make a summary of the net profits after there had been written into these cost books by McPhee's direction certain items aggregating $36,334.31, the principal item being McPhee's salary as defendant's president and manager at $1,000 per month, amounting to $55,000, of which he directed $29,633.33 to be distributed upon a proportion fixed by himself among the numerous jobs embraced in these six contracts. This distribution was entirely arbitrary as it was in respect of the charges for warehouse and storage rent, caretaker, interest, and use of a donkey engine, for it was not possible to say what part of any one of these items was justly chargeable to any particular contract. There was no evidence explaining why, during the period these contracts were running, none of these items had been carried into the cost books, nor was there any evidence that this omission was by mistake. The books had been kept in this way for years, and Mrs. Goodspeed received her education and instruction in bookkeeping from her predecessor, who kept the books under McPhee's directions prior to Mrs. Goodspeed's employment. Some of the items which McPhee directed to be entered in the books, notably his salary, had never before appeared on the books in any form or been considered in any settlement with plaintiff for his services. There never had been, as was shown by the minutes of the corporation, any agreement made by the directors to pay him a salary, or authority given him to charge for his services as president and manager. He knew the system under which his books were being kept, and he knew that the items he caused to be entered in the books after the action had been commenced were items never before considered in previous settlements, and had not been entered at any time during the two or three years these contracts were in force. He had in his possession for two months the stated account as first shown him, and, presumably, did what he told plaintiff he would do, namely, "look it over." He approved it as presented to him again; with some additions to cover later jobs, and subsequently, and after suit brought, admitted the indebtedness there shown. The burden was on him to show that, through mistake, the account did not include the items he now claims should have been entered on the cost books. He did not meet this burden.

These books were, in fact, so far as they went, duplicates of the journal entries and were placed in the cost books at the same time. Their only office seems to have been to furnish in separate books in convenient form, the various items constituting receipts and expenditures relating to the contracts here involved and from which the profits and losses on the contracts could be readily ascertained.

We think the facts and circumstances shown justified the court in rejecting the items written into these books by McPhee's direction after the action was commenced and accepted the cost books as the correct source of the stated account.

[6] 5. It is claimed that interest was improperly allowed from the commencement of the action and should have been, if at all, from the date of the judgment.

Section 1917 of the Civil Code provides:

"Unless there is an express contract in writing, fixing a different rate, interest is payable on all moneys at the rate of seven per centum per annum after they become due, on any instrument of writing, except a judgment, and on moneys lent, or due on any settlement of account, from the day on which the balance is ascertained.

* * *

Section 3287 provides:

"Every person who is entitled to recover damages certain, or capable of being made certain by calculation, and the right to recover which is vested in him upon a particular day, is entitled also to recover interest thereon from that day, except during such time as the debtor is prevented by law, or by the act of the creditor, from paying the debt."

The general rule is that interest is chargeable on a stated account from its date. De la Cuesta v. Montgomery, 144 Cal. 115, 77 Pac. 887; 22 Cyc. 1511, 1515.

Where the action is for general damages, or liquidated, or quantum meruit, or quantum valebat, for the recovery of the reasonable value of goods sold and delivered or services rendered, interest is allowable only from the date of the judgment under the Code rule. Here the demands were for "moneys due on settlement of account" and "the balance ascertained" and agreed to as witnessed by the stated account (Civ. Code, § 1917); and we think interest was recoverable because the damages were "certain or capable of being made certain by calculation" (Civ. Code, § 3287). Even under some circumstances, interest may be allowed in an action upon a contract for unliquidated damages. Courteney v. Standard Box Company, 16 Cal. App. 600, 615, 117 Pac. 778.

The following cases would seem to warrant the charge for interest from the commencement of the action: McCowen v. Pew, 18 Cal. App. 482, 487, 123 Pac. 354; Lane v. Turner, 114 Cal. 396, 46 Pac. 290; Cutting Fruit Packing Co. v. Canty, 141 Cal. 692, 697, 75 Pac. 564; Macomber v. Bigelow, 126 Cal. 9, 58 Pac. 312; Farnham v. Cal., etc., Trust Co., 8 Cal. App. 268, 273, 96 Pac. 788.

[7] 6. It is further contended that the contracts created the relation of a partnership of joint undertaking between plaintiff and defendant. It is hence claimed that there could be no action other than a suit for an accounting. The pleadings nowhere raise this issue. Ordinarily, in the absence of special authority, a corporation cannot enter into partnership with a private person (10 Cyc. 1142, 1143), and no such authority was shown. A corporation may enter into a contract by which it is agreed that the gains and losses of the venture shall be borne equally (Bates v. Coronado Beach Co., 109 Cal. 162, 41 Pac. 855), but such agreements do not necessarily make the parties partners in legal contemplation.

The question here does not involve the question of partnership as affecting third parties. Kennedy & Shaw Lumber Co. v. Taylor, 3 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 697, 31 Pac. 1122, cited by defendant, only held that the associates were liable as partners to plaintiff. As between themselves, their rights were not involved. In the case here, plaintiff had no interest in the profits as property; he was simply employed under an arrangement by which he was to receive for his services a given sum out of or a proportion of the profits. Berthold v. Goldsmith, 24 How. 536, 16 L. Ed. 762. "The general rule is," as was stated in Jernee v. Simonson, 58 N. J. Eq. 282, 43 Atl. 370, "if there is no community of interest in the property of a business, that there is no partnership inter sese by mere participation in the profits."

In Smith v. Schultz, 89 Cal. 526, 26 Pac. 1087, the agreement was to work a farm upon shares. Speaking of the contract, the court said:

"It gives no power to one to bind the others; it contemplates no common liability; it does not make one the agent for the others in carrying on any business whatever; it contains no agreement, either express or implied, for the division of any losses; and there is no intimation in it that plaintiff was to be 'liable to third persons for all the obligations of the partnership, jointly with his copartners.' Civ. Code, §§ 2404, 2429, 2442, 2443. Nor does it contain any agreement among themselves that the party of the one part should be bound to any extent for the obligations of the party of the other part. They were not to be partners, therefore, either as to third persons or inter sese."

This case presents many features similar to the one here. See, also, Coward v. Clanton, 122 Cal. 451, 55 Pac. 147; 30 Cyc. 376, 377; Cudahy Packing Company v. Hibou, 92 Miss. 234, 46 South. 73, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 975, and note, 1032.

The discussion loses some of its importance in view of the fact that whatever the relation of the parties was, they settled their account with each other and agreed upon the balance due from one to the other.

[8] 7. It must not be expected that we can give specific attention to over 350 alleged errors. Such an array might give one pause, if each suggested a separate and distinct error. In fact but few points are involved. For example, after the cost books were identified and the entries explained, as to the different contracts, to each of the hundred or more questions an objection being interposed, plaintiff's counsel would ask the question: "What does the cost book show to be the profits of (naming the job)?" The answer was merely the result of these figures, and was not a conclusion of the witness, and the result was not, as defendant contends, a showing of gross profits; the result clearly was net profits.

[9] 8. The motion for nonsuit was directed to this point and was properly overruled. It was discretionary with the court to allow evidence to meet objections made by the motion based on the lack of proof on certain matters. The motion also presented the point that the action should have been in the form of an accounting on the theory that a partnership existed. This point has already been noticed; no partnership was proven.

[10] 9. Evidence was admitted that plaintiff and defendant had made similar contracts prior to the ones in the suit. This evidence was objected to. Defendant contended at the trial and still contends that these cost books and the profits referred to in the contracts had relation to gross profits and not net profits as claimed by plaintiff. The evidence now urged as inadmissible was introduced to aid the court in viewing the circumstances surrounding the parties, when the contracts were made, and to clear up the situation of the parties at that time—in short, to put itself in their place. It appeared from the evidence that plaintiff and defendant had been operating from 1901 and up to the time contract No. 1 was made, in a series of jobs not unlike the ones here, and under terms quite similar. In one of them, for example, plaintiff was to receive 20 per cent. for his services; in another they were to "divide the profits in half on any work or contracts," and neither of them was to receive a salary, and in all these contracts the McPhee Company was to "finance the jobs." It is true that in the cases where he got 50 per cent., plaintiff was to procure, as well as superintend, the jobs, but we cannot see that that affects the question. Plaintiff and defendant had been engaged in doing work for three or four years under substantially the same conditions and circumstances as for the time here involved.

In giving interpretation to their agreement, and to ascertain what they meant by "net profits," it seems to us the court was justified in allowing the evidence. "Previous and contemporaneous transactions may properly be taken into consideration to ascertain the sense in which the parties used particular terms, or to ascertain the subject-matter of the contract." 17 Cyc. 671. The Supreme Court said, in First Nat. Bank v. Bowers, 141 Cal. 253, 262, 74 Pac. 856, 860, that "where the meaning of terms is debatable," facts which tend to illustrate or explain the language used in a contract and to place the court or jury as nearly as may be in the situation of the parties "are always admissible." The courts "may avail themselves of the same light which the parties possessed when the contract was made." Merriam v. United States, 107 U. S. 437, 2 Sup. Ct. 536, 27 L. Ed. 531.

10. Counsel takes up in his brief each one of these jobs and endeavors to show that the cost books do not correctly exhibit the receipts and disbursements, and hence do not show the net profits. We cannot follow all these intricate details. The bookkeeper testified to the correctness of the accounts in these cost books, and so far as we have been able to analyze the figures and entries upon which her testimony rests, we cannot say she was mistaken. Defendant approved the stated account, and the principal issues before the court were whether or not it constituted a stated account, and in any case should have included the items written into the cost books by defendant's direction, after the commencement of the action, should have been included in it.

As we understand the record, the action No. 18032 involves the same questions mutatis mutandis as in No. 17022, and the decision in the latter covers the decision in the former.

We have endeavored to consider such of defendants' numerous objections as seemed to demand attention, and, failing to discover any prejudicial error in the record, the judgments and orders are affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; ELLISON, Judge pro tem.

DOERR et al. v. FANDANGO LUMBER CO.
et al. (Civ. 1509.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California, Aug. 28, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 27, 1916.)

1. CORPORATIONS ⚡426(7) — CONTRACTS — RATIFICATION.

A corporation ratified a mortgage alleged to have been executed by its president without authority when it made a deed of trust of all its property, and in that deed expressly referred to the mortgage and made the deed subject to the mortgage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1702, 1703, 1713; Dec. Dig. ⚡426(7).]

2. CORPORATIONS ⚡426(7) — CONTRACT — RATIFICATION.

The corporation again ratified the mortgage when its board of directors passed a resolution authorizing a deed of all of its property subject to its debts, and which resolution not only expressly recognized the deed of trust, but recognized by express reference thereto the mortgage of the plaintiffs as a prior and valid lien upon such properties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1702, 1703, 1713; Dec. Dig. ⚡426(7).]

3. CORPORATIONS ⚡426(10) — CONTRACTS — ESTOPPEL.

The defendant corporation is estopped from denying the validity of the mortgage by having received, retained, and used the consideration therefor for its legitimate purposes with full knowledge.

4. CORPORATIONS ⚡426(7) — CONTRACTS — RATIFICATION.

Although the resolution of defendant's directors did not in express terms refer to the indebtedness between the plaintiffs or the mortgage, the fact that the board, in construing the language of the resolution by making a deed of trust, authorized by the resolution, subject to the mortgage, amounted to a recognition of the mortgage as imposing a valid obligation upon the corporation as effectually as if express authority to do so had been by the resolution vested in the board.

5. CORPORATIONS ⚡426(7) — CONTRACTS — RATIFICATION BY RECOGNITION.

Where a trust deed, recognizing the plaintiffs' mortgage as a valid and prior lien, has been in existence for a long time, and has never been repudiated by the corporation, the corporation must be deemed to have acquiesced in and ratified all the covenants and conditions of the trust deed, including any that were unauthorized.

6. CORPORATIONS ⚡426(7) — CONTRACTS — RATIFICATION.

Where a defendant, as trustee under a deed of trust from defendant corporation which recognized plaintiffs' mortgage, and as receiver under appointment of the court, accepted the deed of trust, and as president of the defendant corporation executed a deed of the company's property, he admitted not only for the corporation, but for himself as trustee, the validity of the mortgage.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

Action by Henry Doerr and others against the Fandango Lumber Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Cornish & Robnett and Daly B. Robnett, all of Alturas, and N. J. Barry, of Susanville, for appellants. Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, and W. Lair Thompson, of Lakeview, Or., for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiffs instituted this suit to foreclose a mortgage upon certain real property of the Fandango Lumber company, given to secure a loan to the latter of the sum of $10,000, evidenced by a promissory note executed by the Fandango Lumber Company in favor of the plaintiffs. The property upon which the mortgage was given is located in Modoc county, and consists of about 2,100 acres of timber and agricultural lands, upon which a sawmill stands.

The Fandango Lumber company (to be hereafter referred to variously as the Fandango Company and the company) is a regularly organized corporation, doing business in California, with its principal place of business and offices at Ft. Bidwell, Modoc county, this state. The note to secure which the mortgage in question here was given is set out in full in the complaint. It was executed and delivered to the plaintiffs on the 23d day of December, 1911, and is payable on demand.

It is alleged that at the time of the delivery of said note, and for the purpose of securing the payment of the principal sum thereof, and the interest thereupon accruing, the Fandango Company duly executed and delivered to the plaintiffs its mortgage, bearing date of December 23, 1911, "conveying the premises described in said mortgage," that said mortgage was duly acknowledged and certified so as to entitle it to be recorded, and that the same was duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county of Modoc. It is alleged that the defendants W. R. Wilkinson, W. R. Wilkinson, as trustee, and W. R. Wilkinson, as receiver, "have or claim some interest in, or lien on, said mortgaged premises; but all of said claims, if any, have accrued since the lien of said mortgage." The mortgage is made a part of the complaint, and purports to have been executed by the Fandango Company, "by A. G. Duhme, President."

The answer denies all the material averments of the complaint, but, while admitting that Wilkinson, as an individual, claims no interest in, or lien upon, the alleged mortgaged premises, alleges that he, as trustee and as receiver, has and claims some interest in and lien upon said premises.

The answer further alleges that the said A. G. Duhme, as president of the Fandango Company, was never at any time authorized by the board of directors of said company, at any meeting thereof, or at all, to borrow any money from the plaintiffs, or to execute and deliver to the latter the said note for $10,000 as evidence of a loan in that amount, or to execute the mortgage the foreclosure of which is sought by this action; that the transaction involving the execution of said note and mortgage was never ratified by the board of directors of said company.

As an alleged "second and separate" defense, the answer charges collusion between the plaintiffs and the said A. G. Duhme for the purpose of fraudulently bringing about a foreclosure sale of the mortgaged property at which said property would be purchased by the plaintiffs, thereby preventing other creditors of the Fandango Company from securing satisfaction of their respective claims against said company, amounting in the aggregate to approximately $40,000, and which claims are unsecured. No testimony having been offered or received in support of the charge so made, further consideration thereof is obviously unnecessary.

The court found that the Fandango Company or its board of directors never at any time or place authorized the said Duhme, as president of said company, or otherwise, to borrow for the company from the plaintiffs the sum of $10,000 or any other sum, or to execute on behalf of said company the note and the mortgage in question; that the said company or its directors never at any time subsequent to the making and delivery of said note and the execution of said mortgage ratified the same or the action of said Duhme in the transaction resulting in the consummation of the loan from the plaintiffs and the giving to them of said note and said mortgage; that therefore "the said note and mortgage are not, nor are either of them, the note or mortgage of the said Fandango Lumber Company."

From the findings, of which the foregoing is an epitomized statement, the court concluded as a matter of law:

"That the said note and mortgage, and each of them, and every part thereof, are void and of no effect as creating any obligation against the said defendants or any of them, or as to constituting any lien against the property of said defendants, or any of them, described in said mortgage and complaint, or otherwise."

Judgment for the defendants followed, from which the plaintiffs appeal, supporting the same by a transcript of the testimony and other proceedings of the trial, prepared in accordance with the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The general question presented is whether the findings vital to the judgment are supported by the evidence.

The salient facts are undisputed, and briefly they are: In the year 1911 the Fandango Company found itself in financial difficulties, being heavily in debt and without financial means to carry on its lumber business. It owned extensive properties, including extensive timber land holdings. While the board of directors of said company never at any time expressly authorized Duhme, the president, to borrow on behalf of the company the sum of money for which the note and the mortgage in dispute were given, said board did nevertheless, at a special meeting thereof, on August 18, 1911, adopt a resolution which, in general language, vested in the directors the authority to borrow money "of whom they see fit" for the company "to run the business." Transcript, p. 47.

Among those to whom the company was indebted at the time mentioned and whose indebtedness was secured was the Bank of Ft. Bidwell. The company had overdrawn its account at said bank by the sum of approximately $4,000; the total indebtedness of the company to said bank being over $9,000. The bank was pressing the company for a settlement, and Duhme, in the year 1911, went to Minneapolis, Minn., for the purpose of making an effort to secure a loan which would be sufficient to liquidate the debt of the company to the said bank. Two of the directors of the company, C. B. and C. D. Eustis, then resided in Minneapolis. After negotiations with the plaintiffs, Duhme and his codirectors, C. B. and C. D. Eustis, succeeded in securing the loan. Before consummating the transaction, however, Duhme telegraphed to the said bank from Minneapolis, asking its consent to mortgage the company's timber lands and plant to secure the proposed loan. The bank, by telegram, replied, under date of December 22, 1911:

"Bank consents to your mortgaging timber and plant, providing you have bank in Minneapolis wire us seven thousand dollars for credit Fandango Lumber Company; overdraft now four thousand dollars. Brown advises two thousand in checks outstanding which we will protest if the money is not wired immediately."

Thereafter, and on the 23d day of December, 1911, the plaintiffs loaned and delivered to Duhme the sum of $10,000, for which the note set out in the complaint and the mortgage attached to and made a part of that pleading as security for the payment of said note were executed by Duhme in the name and under the corporate seal of the Fandango Lumber Company.

On the 25th day of June, 1912, in pursuance of a resolution previously adopted by the board of directors of the Fandango Company, the said board executed a trust deed, whereby it conveyed to the defendant, W. R. Wilkinson, as trustee, all the property covered by the mortgage in controversy. The object of said deed of trust was to straighten out the affairs of the company, and to this end the trustee was authorized by said instrument to conduct and manage the business of the company, to pay all current operating expenses, and to pay off, as they fell due, the debts of the concern. This deed provides, among other things:

"The party of the first part (Fandango Company) covenants and agrees that this deed of trust delivered to the trustee shall be a mortgage upon the premises and property affected thereby, subject only to mortgage * * * to Devereaux, Wallace, Doerr, and Bleeker, of Minneapolis," who are the plaintiffs in this action.

The Sunset Lake Lumber Company is a subsidiary corporation which was organized subsequent to the time at which the mortgage in question was given, for the purpose of taking over the properties and business of the Fandango Company, and paying all its debts. On the 26th day of July, 1912, the Fandango Company, by deed, conveyed to the said Sunset Company all its properties and business for the purposes above mentioned. The defendant W. R. Wilkinson was then president of the Fandango Company, and as such officer, and for and under the seal of the said company, executed the said deed of conveyance to the Sunset Company. That deed expressly recites that it is subject to all the debts of the Fandango Company, and subject further " * * * to a second mortgage for the sum of ten thousand ($10,000.00) dollars in favor of Thomas F. Wallace et al., of Minneapolis, Minnesota. * * *"

On September 10, 1912, a complaint reciting among other facts, the existence of the mortgage in suit and the indebtedness to secure which it was given, and asking for the appointment of a receiver of the Fandango Company was filed in the superior court of Modoc county, by an unsecured creditor of said company. The complaint in said action was verified, and alleged the existence and validity of the mortgage in suit here. Upon the hearing of the application for the appointment of a receiver in said action, the defendant W. R. Wilkinson was named for and appointed by the court to that office, and as such took over the control and management of the properties of the Fandango Company covered by the mortgage involved herein.

On page 36 of the book containing the record of the proceedings of the meetings of the board of directors of the Fandango Company there appears on a slip of paper pasted on said page a resolution in typewriting, purporting to have been adopted by the said board on the 24th day of June, 1912, and purporting to ratify the acts of Duhme in borrowing the money from the plaintiffs and in giving the note and the mortgage in question, evidencing and securing said loan.

It appears from the uncontradicted testimony of Duhme that the money obtained from the plaintiffs on the note and the mortgage in question was applied to the extinguishment of the obligations of the Fandango Company, approximately $9,500 thereof having been paid to the Bank of Ft. Bidwell in satisfaction of the debt due it from the company.

Under the evidence, of which the foregoing statement embraces an accurate résumé, it cannot justly be held that the findings essential to the support of the judgment are warranted.

[1-3] Whether the purported resolution of June 28, 1912, pretending to ratify the transaction involving the making and giving of the note and mortgage in controversy here was regularly or legally adopted by the board of directors is a question. Duhme testified that it was so adopted, while Wilkinson, then a member of the board and president of the corporation, positively declared that he attended all the meetings of the board, and that at none was any such resolution even suggested, much less adopted. But, in view of other facts, it is wholly unimportant whether there was or was not a formal ratification of the transaction. For we agree to the following contentions of counsel for the plaintiffs: (1) That the Fandango Company ratified the mortgage "when it made a deed of trust of all its property to W. R. Wilkinson, and in that deed expressly referred to plaintiff's mortgage and made said deed subject to this mortgage, thereby expressly recognizing the obligation"; (2) that the Fandango Company again ratified said mortgage when its board of directors passed a resolution authorizing a deed of all its property to the Sunset Lake Lumber Company, said conveyance to be subject to the debts of the Fandango Company, and which resolution not only expressly recognized the deed of trust theretofore given to Wilkinson, covering all its properties, but recognized by express reference thereto the mortgage of the plaintiffs as a prior and valid lien upon said properties; (3) that, as to the defendant Fandango Company, it is estopped from denying the validity of the mortgage for the reason that it received, retained, and used for its legitimate purposes the consideration for the mortgage, viz. the sum of $10,000, with full knowledge of the fact that said sum of money had been borrowed for its use in his business and of the fact that said mortgage was given to secure the repayment of said sum of money.

[4, 5] But it is earnestly contended by the defendants that the trust deed to Wilkinson could not have the effect either of ratifying the act of giving the mortgage or of estopping the Fandango Company from denying the validity of that instrument, inasmuch as the resolution authorizing the making of said trust deed did not expressly vest the board of directors with authority to include in said deed a provision that it should be subject to the prior lien of the mortgage. The resolution, it is true, did not in express terms refer to the indebtedness to the plaintiffs or the mortgage in question, but it did provide that the object of the trust deed was to place the properties and business of the company in the hands of Wilkinson as trustee, for the purpose of operating the business of the concern and paying off its indebtedness. The provision in the trust deed that it was to be subject to the mortgage and the rights of the mortgagees thereunder may be assumed to have been the result of the interpretation by the directors of the language of the resolution providing generally for the satisfaction of the obligations then existing against the company; but, whether such interpretation was justified or not—that is to say, whether, in strictness, the board of directors was authorized or intended by the resolution to be authorized to insert in the trust deed as a condition thereof the provision respecting the mortgage—the very fact that said board did so construe the language of the said resolution in that particular amounted to a recognition of the mortgage as imposing a valid obligation upon the Fandango Company as effectually as if express authority to do so had been by the resolution vested in said board. If, however, this position were unsupported, then upon either one of two other considerations, supported by the record, may it justly and with legal propriety be held that the transaction involving the execution of the note sued on and the mortgage given to secure its payment has been ratified, viz.: (1) That the trust deed has been in existence for a long period of time (executed June 25, 1912), is still in existence, and has never been repudiated by the corporation, nor is there any repudiation of it now. It must therefore be deemed to have been by the corporation acquiesced in and all its covenants and conditions, including any unauthorized conditions or terms, if any, which it contains, thus ratified. Gribble v. Columbus Brewing Co., 100 Cal. 67, 69-70, 34 Pac. 527. (2) Not only does the resolution authorizing the deed to the Sunset Lake Lumber Company refer to and thus ratify the trust deed and all its conditions, but the deed itself expressly refers to and provides that it shall be subject to the mortgage in question. Here, therefore, we have an express and positive recognition of the obligation of the mortgage, and this is the equivalent of the ratification of said mortgage. The conclusion thus declared is in accord with all the cases in which the facts bear analogy to those of the present case. Indeed, the proposition that ratification of a contract, the making of which is unauthorized by one of the principals, may be effectuated by a recognition, howsoever informally of the agreement and the obligations arising by virtue thereof, is elementary. A familiar and common application of this doctrine is to be found in those cases where an agent, in making a contract for his principal, transcends the scope of his authority as such, and the principal, after the contract has been made, although not at that time legally bound by its terms, does some act recognizing the validity of the agreement, as, for instance, accepting some of the benefits or assuming some of the burdens thereof. In such case, quite obviously, the principal will be deemed from his acquiescence in the contract to have ratified the unauthorized act of his agent, and will be held to its terms and conditions, notwithstanding that he has not in express language or in a formal manner ratified the contract. The case here comes within the principle thus referred to. The giving of the mortgage was not an ultra vires act, and there is no claim that it was. If the act involved the making of an invalid contract, it was, as shown, merely because of the manner in which it was attempted to perform the act or make the contract, and, like any other contract, it is capable of being ratified by conduct or a recognition in some manner of the obligation, and, as stated, the deed to the Sunset Company, which was executed and delivered by the Fandango Company when the defendant Wilkinson was president thereof, and which, indeed, was executed by him as president for the company, contains language clearly and plainly recognizing the mortgage and the obligations thereof.

We need not refer to all of the many cases holding to the views above expressed. The case of Porter v. Lassen County, etc., Co., 127 Cal. 261, 270-271, 59 Pac. 563, 567, is directly in point here, and it is sufficient for the purposes of this case to reproduce herein an excerpt or two therefrom. It is held in that case, quoting from the syllabi thereof:

"The subsequent action of a full board [of directors] requiring the mortgagee to make additional advances on the security of his mortgage, and recognizing its validity in a resolution authorizing a second mortgage upon the property, is a full ratification of the first mortgage."

In the text the late learned Chief Justice Beatty, who wrote the opinion, said:

"The manner of directing the execution of a corporation mortgage is by resolution of the board of directors, and here by resolution of the board the mortgage is recognized as valid and its benefits claimed in behalf of the corporation. It is not necessary, in order to ratify, to do so in express and formal terms. Anything is sufficient which clearly and necessarily implies a recognition of the obligation."

Besides the foregoing considerations, it is very clear that the defendant Fandango Company, having received, retained, and used for the purposes of its business the money to secure the repayment of which the mortgage was given, is, and upon a familiar equitable principle should be, estopped from denying the validity of the obligation. As shown, it is not disputed that the corporation received the money and used it in the payment of a part of its debts.

[6] As to the defendant Wilkinson, it is to be observed that both as a trustee under the deed of trust and as a receiver under the appointment of the court he accepted the deed of trust and the office of receiver with full knowledge of the existence of the mortgage and upon the express condition that his rights and powers in both instances were expressly made subject to the mortgage. Indeed, as seen, as president of the Fandango Company, he executed for said company, by authority of the directors duly evidenced and vested, the deed to the Sunset Company, and by that act he recognized and admitted not only for the Fandango Company, but for himself as trustee, the validity of the mortgage.

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment is reversed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 27, 1916. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 25, 1916.)

CRIMINAL LAW — § 829(7) — INSTRUCTION — ALIBI.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to murder, where the complaining witness identified defendant as the one who entered her house with burglarious intent, but the defendant denied he was such person, introducing his wife and another to testify that at the time of the crime he was some distance away from complainant's house, refusal to instruct that in making proof of alibi defendant was not obliged to establish the defense by a preponderance of the evidence or beyond a reasonable doubt but that it was sufficient to entitle him to a verdict of not guilty if the proof raised a reasonable doubt as to defendant's presence at the place of the crime when it was committed was error though the court had instructed generally on reasonable doubt.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Tony Visconti was convicted of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to murder and from judgment of imprisonment and an order denying the motion for new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Ford & Nelson, of Riverside, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was charged with the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to murder. He was found guilty as charged, and has taken an appeal from a judgment of imprisonment, as well as from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The complaining witness gave testimony identifying the defendant as being the man who entered her house in the nighttime and who struck her with a gun after she had attempted to shoot him. It appeared that the man with whom the encounter was had entered the house of the prosecutrix with burglarious intent. The prosecuting witness positively identified defendant as being the perpetrator of the crime; she testified that there was some light in the house—perhaps a lantern—but she was not sure about that. The defendant denied that he was the person who had assaulted the prosecutrix, and introduced his wife and another witness who gave testimony in corroboration of his claim that he was not at the house of the prosecutrix on the night charged, but was at another place some distance away. In view of the testimony offered for the purpose of establishing an alibi, the defendant asked the court to give an instruction by which the jury was to be informed that in making the proof of an alibi the defendant was not obliged to establish that defense by a preponderance of evidence or beyond a reasonable doubt, but that it was sufficient to entitle him to a verdict of not guilty if the proof raised in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt as to the presence of the defendant at the place where the crime was alleged to have been committed and at the time referred to in the information. The court refused to give this instruction, or any instruction upon the matter of the defense of an alibi.

It seems to be conceded, as it must, that the instruction as proposed was pertinent and proper; but the contention is made that, inasmuch as the trial judge did instruct the jury that they must believe beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant committed the crime, no prejudice would arise by reason of the failure to instruct directly upon the matter of the alibi proof. The instruction of the court which was given was general, and stated in substance that before conviction could be had it was incumbent upon the prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt all of the matters alleged in the information. We think that defendant was entitled to have some particular and specific instruction given touching the matter of his defense of an alibi. It is said in our decisions that the matter of alibi proof is not strictly "a defense." However, in the American & English

Encyclopedia of Law, as cited in the case referred to below, this expression is made:

"The true doctrine seems to be that where the state has established a prima facie case, and the defendant relies upon the defense of alibi, the burden is upon him to prove it, not beyond a reasonable doubt, nor by a preponderance of the evidence, but by such evidence, and to such a degree of certainty, as will, when the whole evidence is considered, create and leave in the mind of the jury a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the accused." People v. Winters, 125 Cal. 325, 57 Pac. 1067.

It may well have been that the testimony introduced by the prosecution did make out to the minds of the jury and beyond a reasonable doubt prima facie the guilt of the accused. Yet if upon the evidence offered by him, tending to show that at the time in question he was not at the place, nor where he could have committed the crime, a reasonable doubt was created in the minds of the jury, such doubt of course would avail the defendant and entitle him to an acquittal. The quantity and variety of evidence and the quality of proof which would be sufficient to raise such doubt where an alibi was sought to be proven, are proper and pertinent subjects for an instruction to the jury, and we think were within the right of defendant to insist upon. There are no decisions in this state directly upon the point presented, but in a similar state of the law the Oklahoma court has decided in agreement with appellant's contention. Courtney v. State, 10 Okl. Cr. 589, 140 Pac. 163. We are of opinion that the error in refusing to give the offered instruction was prejudicial, and that defendant is entitled to a new trial.

The judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. VISCONTI. (Cr. 2047.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 25, 1916.)

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Tony Visconti was convicted of crime, and he appeals to the District Court of Appeals of the Second Appellate Division. Judgment reversed 160 Pac. 410. Application by the State for hearing in the Supreme Court. Application denied.

Ford & Nelson, of Riverside, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Dep. Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District is denied.

In denying the application we deem it proper to say that we are not to be understood as intimating that the refusal to give such an instruction as was refused in this case would, in all cases, be deemed by us sufficient cause for reversal. Especially is this true in view of the provisions of section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution.

In denying the application for hearing in this court we assume that the District Court of Appeal concluded, in view of the circumstances of this particular case as shown by the record, that the refusal of the trial court to permit the requested instruction operated substantially to the prejudice of the defendant.

FRENCH v. COOK et al. (S. F. 7533.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1916.

On Rehearing, Aug. 24, 1916.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 181 — OFFICERS — POLICE COMMISSIONERS — POWERS — PENSIONS.

San Francisco charter, requiring its police commissioners to pay certain death pensions and authorizing them to examine witnesses and hold hearings for that purpose, confers no judicial powers upon them, but their powers are ministerial only.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 458-465; Dec. Dig. —181.]

2. MANDAMUS — 14(1) — NECESSITY OF DEMAND — PAYMENT.

Under San Francisco charter, requiring its police commissioners to pay certain death pensions and authorizing them to hold hearings for that purpose, mandamus will not lie to compel the granting of a pension prior to a proper demand upon the police commissioners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 44; Dec. Dig. —14(1).]

3. MANDAMUS — 81 — PUBLIC OFFICERS — MINISTERIAL ACTS — WHEN BASED UPON CONFLICTING EVIDENCE.

The police commissioners' power over death pension applications being purely ministerial, the claimant's right to a judicial determination of the facts is not dependent upon whether the evidence supporting such right was uncontradicted at the hearing before the police commissioners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 138, 139; Dec. Dig. —81.]

4. MANDAMUS — 168(3) — PROCEEDINGS — ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In mandamus to compel police commissioners to grant a death pension, evidence is not inadmissible because it had not been introduced at a previous hearing before the commissioners.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 373; Dec. Dig. —168(3).]

5. MANDAMUS — 187(7) — PROCEEDINGS — APPEAL AND ERROR — RESERVING GROUNDS FOR REVIEW.

In a mandamus the admission of testimony cannot be regarded as prejudicial error, where the record does not disclose its nature.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. § 435; Dec. Dig. —187(7).]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Mandamus proceedings by Ella French against Jesse B. Cook and others, as Board of Trustees of the Police Relief and Pension Fund, and Kay Conway, Secretary of said Board. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Percy V. Long and Harry G. McKannay, both of San Francisco, for appellants. J. E. White, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding in mandate by the surviving wife of Frederick W. French, deceased, who was at the time of his death a member of the police department of the city and county of San Francisco, against the board of trustees of the police relief and pension fund of said city and county and their secretary, to compel provision for and payment by said board of a monthly pension to plaintiff, on the theory that her husband was injured while in the performance of his duty as a member of the police department and died as a result of such injury within one year from the date thereof.

By the terms of the charter of San Francisco the board of police commissioners constitutes a board of trustees of the police relief and pension fund, from which they provide for the payment of pensions to members of the force retired by them on account of age or disability on account of bodily injury received in the performance of their duties. Provision is also made for a pension to the widow, children, and dependent parents of officers killed in the performance of their duty, section 4, c. 10, art. VIII, of the charter providing:

"The commissioners shall out of the police relief and pension fund provide as follows for the family of any officer, member or employé of the department who may be killed or injured while in the performance of his duty, and who shall have died within one year from the date of such injury: * * * First—should the decedent be married, his widow shall as long as she may remain unmarried be paid a monthly pension equal to one-half of the salary attached to the rank held by the decedent at the time of his death."

The trustees of the pension fund possess the powers vested in the board of police commissioners to make rules and regulations, and are required to hold quarter yearly meetings and keep a public record of their proceedings. Such board has the power conferred on every board or commission provided for in the charter to administer oaths and affirmations, to issue subpoenas, and to take and hear testimony concerning any matter or thing pending before it. Section 24, art. XVI, Charter. The charter apparently contains no other provision than those already referred to in any way material to the procedure in the matter of such a pension as the one here sought. There is no provision whatever as to any hearing or finding by the board.

The petition for a writ of mandamus in this proceeding alleged that on November 14, 1910, Officer French, while engaged in breaking a colt for the police department pursuant to orders to that effect, was thrown from the colt and injured to such an extent that he died on January 10, 1911, as the result of the injury. It further alleged that plaintiff on or about October 1, 1911, filed her verified petition with the board of trustees of said pension fund praying that she be awarded the pension to which she would be entitled under such circumstances, and that on October 18, 1911, her application was denied by said board. She further alleged:

"That at said hearing of said application and petition of the plaintiff for said pension the plaintiff introduced evidence fully sustaining each and every allegation therein and herein set forth, without any material evidence of any kind or character being offered in contradiction or opposition to said evidence."

She further alleged that on July 25, 1912, she filed a petition for a rehearing with said board, and that the same was denied on October 7, 1912.

By its answer the board denied that the officer was injured while in the performance of any duty as a member of the department, and affirmatively substantially alleged that he was on duty until December 16, 1910, and perfectly sound in mind and body until that date, when he reported himself ill on account of "la grippe," and that he died on January 10, 1911, solely from the effects of "la grippe" and pneumonia, which were in no way contributed to or superinduced by any injury received by him while in the performance of his duty. The answer contained also an explicit denial of the allegations as to the effect of the evidence given on the hearing, which we have hereinbefore quoted, and affirmatively alleged that the evidence introduced conclusively established in the minds of the members of the board that the death was due solely and directly to "la grippe" and pneumonia, and that no injury received by French in the performance of his duty was a contributing cause of his death.

The findings of the trial court so far as they went were in accord with the allegations of the petition, but the only finding on the issue as to the showing made before the board of trustees was as follows:

"That at said hearing of said application and petition of the plaintiff for said pension the plaintiff introduced testimony to support all of the allegations therein set forth, and that the said board of trustees of the police relief and pension fund then and there on said last-mentioned date denied said application of said plaintiff for said pension."

There was no finding whatever upon the allegation in the petition to the effect that there was no substantial conflict on material questions of fact in the evidence given on the hearing before the board, nor was there any finding on matters affirmatively alleged in the answer.

Upon these findings judgment was given for plaintiff, directing the issuance of a peremptory writ of mandate. We have before us an appeal from this judgment and from the order denying defendants' motion for a new trial; the same having been transferred to this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal for the First Appellate District. The record on appeal does not set forth any of the evidence given upon the trial in the court below.

[1, 2] We are unable to see in the charter provisions bearing on the matter anything which can fairly be held to make the board in relation to such an application as this a tribunal possessing judicial powers whose decision on questions of fact is at all binding. The charter prescribes the contingencies on which such a pension shall be granted by the board. It says substantially that, if a member of the department is killed or injured while in the performance of his duty, and dies within one year from the date of such injury, the board "shall, out of the police relief and pension fund," provide for the payment to his widow, as long as she remains unmarried, of a monthly pension equal to one-half of the salary attached to the rank held by the decedent at the time of his death. These facts existing, the plain duty to make the provision exists. It has been held under very similar circumstances that the widow has a vested right from the date of death of her husband (Kavanagh v. Board, etc., 134 Cal. 50, 66 Pac. 36). There is absolutely nothing in the charter purporting to confide to the board the power to finally determine any question of fact in connection with such a pension. The board is apparently in the same position with relation to such a matter as is any officer required by law to do a prescribed act in a certain contingency, where no special method is provided by law for the ascertainment of the facts. Under such circumstances it may often be true that there is uncertainty or dispute as to the facts, but in such a case the only resort of the officer is such investigation as he may be able to himself make for the purpose of determining his own course of action. His determination as to the facts, however, is not effectual for any other purpose. If not satisfied as to the evidence of the essential facts, he may refuse to act until required to do so by the judgment of some tribunal invested with the power to finally determine such controversy, but before such tribunal any conclusion to which he may have come on the facts has no legal force whatever. The sole question there is whether the facts are in reality such as to require the performance of the act, and this altogether regardless of the officer's conclusion as to the facts. The party having a vested right in the performance of the act, if the facts are as claimed by him, has also the right to have his claim as to the facts judicially determined. The functions of the board in such a matter as this are really ministerial only, and come under the same principle as would apply in the case of a county or city auditor, in so far as any finality to its conclusions are concerned. We can attribute no greater force to their conclusions, in view of the condition of the charter provisions. Of course, mandamus would not lie to compel the granting of such a pension in the absence of a prior demand made upon the board by the person beneficially interested. It may be conceded also that the board may prescribe reasonable regulations relative to such demands looking to the presentation to it of a fair showing as to the alleged facts so that it may act intelligently on the demand, and also that a court would not hold that a party has made a sufficient demand in the absence of a compliance with such regulations. But we have no question of this character on this appeal. Cases cited by counsel for appellants, including People v. Los Angeles, 133 Cal. 338, 65 Pac. 749, and People v. Ontario, 148 Cal. 634, 84 Pac. 205, have no application here. As we read the charter, it gives no judicial function whatever to the board in such a matter as this, confers upon it no authority to hear and determine a controversy in a judicial sense. It is not a board or tribunal by law vested with authority to decide a question, and herein lies the distinction between this case and the cases cited in which it was substantially held that the statute was to be construed as submitting the question to the decision of the board or officer. To hold in accord with defendants' claim in this connection would be, as we read the charter, to hold that any officer authorized and required by law to do a prescribed act upon a prescribed contingency, where no method is specially provided for the ascertainment of the facts, is invested with the power to judicially determine the facts, and that his conclusion is a judicial determination as to the facts. Such has never been declared to be the law.

[3-5] In view of what we have said on the matter already discussed, there is no force in any of the points made for reversal. The petition for a writ of mandate sufficiently stated a cause of action, and this altogether regardless of the allegation that the evidence adduced by petitioner on the hearing before the board was not contradicted by any other evidence. That allegation was superfluous and immaterial, and no finding thereon was essential. Therefore a failure to find thereon cannot be cause for reversal. The findings in her favor upon the other allegations of her petition are full and complete. As to matters affirmatively alleged by defendants in their answer by way of defense as to which no findings were made, the evidence not being before us, it must be presumed that no evidence was introduced tending to support such allegations. The trial court did not err in receiving evidence as to the facts essential to plaintiff's right to a pension, entirely regardless of whether such evidence so received was introduced on the hearing before the board. Even if this were not so, defendants would not be in a position to insist upon a reversal on account thereof; for the record does not show what any of such evidence was, and consequently it could not be held that the action of the court was in fact prejudicial.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. In denying the application for a rehearing, we deem it proper to say, in view of certain expressions therein as to the supposed or possible far reaching scope of the opinion, that we were considering the status of the pension board solely with relation to pensions in the event of death of the officer, and what is said is not to be taken as expressing any opinion as to other matters in which the board is required or empowered to act.

ARMSTRONG v. BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY OF VALLEJO et al. (Sac. 2234.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 27, 1916.)

Rehearing Denied Aug. 25, 1916.)

SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS — 135(3) — APPOINTMENT OF SUPERINTENDENT — VALIDITY.

Where a city school superintendent was appointed for a year's probationary period by the board of education under a misapprehension that such an appointment was within its powers, but claimed a four-year tenure under Pol. Code, § 1792, subd. 2, providing that superintendents should be elected for four years, that the contract, having been made under a mistake, was void for reasons of public policy.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; R. H. Latimer, Judge.

Mandamus proceedings by Albert M. Armstrong against the Board of Education of the City of Vallejo and others. Judgment for defendants, and petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Albert M. Armstrong, of Oakland, in pro. per. Frank R. Devlin, of Fairfield, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. Petitioner sued in the superior court for mandate requiring the defendants to restore him to the position of city superintendent of schools of the Vallejo City School District, and to pay him the salary attached to the position. Judgment passed for defendants, and petitioner appeals.

The following facts are uncontroverted, and fairly show the nature of the controversy: Prior to the 6th day of July, 1911, petitioner sought from the defendant board of education an election or appointment at its hands as superintendent of schools of the city of Vallejo. The personal defendants, as members of this board, explained to the petitioner that there were many applications for the position filed with the board, and that when they made their selection they would elect city superintendent on probation for the period of one year and no longer. Petitioner was elected with this understanding, and under this agreement qualified and entered upon the performance of his duties as such superintendent. Before the expiration of the year differences had arisen; petitioner's fitness was in question; a hearing was had; testimony was taken, and upon June 26th, before the expiration of the one year, the board of education declared that they had investigated the matter of the qualifications of the petitioner, and as a result of their investigation were convinced that the public good and the welfare of the public schools demanded the suspension of the school superintendent, and, further, that he should not be reappointed or re-elected to the office for the ensuing year, and, finally, that his entire connection with the school department be terminated. Notwithstanding this, the petitioner was paid the salary of his office for the full first year. Petitioner twice amended his complaint. Under the first two complaints he insisted merely that he had been re-employed for the second year. Upon his third amended complaint he took the position that he had been duly elected superintendent of public schools for the full period of four years by virtue of subdivision 2, § 1793, of the Political Code, which declares that city superintendents of public schools elected by city boards of education "shall be elected for a term of four years," and in this connection he argues that, having thus been chosen for the full term of four years, the attempted removal of him from office by the board of education is without authority in law, which authority is found only under the provisions of sections 758-772 of the Penal Code.

This question, however, with other subsidiary questions in the case, as whether or not the superintendency of schools is an office and the incumbent an officer, whether or not this is in its essence an action to try the title to office, may all, for the purposes of this consideration only, be resolved in favor of petitioner's view, to the end that we may come to the one question in the case, which is both vital and of public moment, and that question may be thus stated: Under the facts shown was petitioner elected or appointed superintendent of schools of the city of Vallejo for the period of four years as contemplated by law? Herein petitioner takes the position that he was duly elected superintendent of schools; that the law itself fixed his term of office, and that it was not within the power of the board of education to shorten that term at all or to deprive him of his office, save under proceedings for his amotion legally brought. Of course the cases are numerous which hold that when a term of office is fixed by statute the appointing or the electing power may not change the term, which can be done only by a change in the statute. Thus in State v. Chapin, 110 Ind. 272, 11 N. E. 317, it is held that the law having fixed the term of office of a judge, the Governor's commission could not extend that term of office, nor the judge's tenure. To the same effect is State v. Jeter (S. C.) 1 McCord, 233, where it is held that the commission of a Governor is only evidence of the appointment of the office, and can have no effect upon its term, which must depend upon the provisions of the act creating the office itself. In Shaw v. Mayor and Council of Macon, 21 Ga. 280, the law fixed the term of marshal of the city for 12 months, and it was held that, notwithstanding a recital in his official bond that he held it at the pleasure of the city council, he did not in fact do so, but held it by virtue of the law creating the term. And so, finally, in People ex rel. Lane v. Case, 19 N. Y. Supp. 625,¹ the Supreme Court of New York declared that where the term of office is fixed by statute to be three years, the fact that the ballot used at the election of an officer to fill the office bore the words "two years" could not have the effect of abridging that officer's term. These cases, of course, announce nothing more than familiar principles of law. They have but a remote bearing upon the real question here presented. That question may better be stated under a recapitulation of the essential facts. The board of education of Vallejo, acting for what it conceived to be the best interest of the public and its public schools, was unwilling to select any superintendent for a four-year term of office, manifestly for the reason that the qualifications of the applicants were, the board felt, not sufficiently known to it. The board then proceeded to exercise the power which either it possessed or did not possess. That power took the form of appointing petitioner superintendent for the probationary period of one year, and there can be no doubt but that he accepted the appointment with full knowledge of all these facts. If the board had the power, there is, of course, an end to the question. If it had not the power, then certainly it is a power which might very well be conferred upon such boards. It would manifestly make for the public welfare if boards could do precisely as this board did, name an incumbent to the office for a limited period, in order that at the end of that period they might judge of his qualifications for selection for a full ensuing term. Other cases where this power might properly be exercised will readily present themselves to mind, as where, for example, the services of one known to be admirably qualified for the position are not immediately available, and a temporary appointment is made to bridge the time until the services of the desired man can be obtained. But apart from all this, what should be the conclusion if it be said that the board was without power to do as it did? Only under the strongest compulsion of the law itself would it ever be held that one obtaining nominal title to an office under such circumstances should be held to have been chosen for the full term. Such, clearly, was not the contract or understanding of the parties. What, then, should be the holding when such a situation is shown, a situation which, it is to be remembered, is not at all identical with that of a mistake in a private contract between individuals? The whole question is controlled by considerations of public welfare, and instead of declaring that under such circumstances and under such a mistake the incumbent has slipped into office for a full term, it will be held that the whole contract, having its origin in misapprehension and mistake, will be set aside under the dictates of public policy as void, leaving the board of education free to exercise its full powers in the matter of a new or successive appointment. And such is the view of the New York Court of Appeals in People v. Hall, 104 N. Y. 170, 10 N. E. 135, where, under a similar contention and a like effort to hold an office, the appointment to which was made by mistake, that court said:

"There are certainly very strong reasons founded in public policy against permitting a person to claim and hold a public office in such a case and under circumstances such as are disclosed in this record, against the intention and through the mere mistake of the appointing power as to the existence of extrinsic facts, supposed to exist, and which, if they had existed, would have rendered the appointment valid according to its terms. It might very well be that the public interests would, in the judgment of the mayor and common council, require a different appointment for a full term than for a temporary period."

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

HUMPHRES v. WESTERN PAC. RY. CO.
(Sac. 2231.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 6, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 2, 1916.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR §930(4) — PRESUMPTIONS—THEORY OF CASE.

In a railroad fireman's action for personal injuries on the theory that he was struck by a signboard near the track and thrown from the step, it must be presumed, after verdict for him, that the jury so concluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3760, 3761; Dec. Dig. § 930(4).]

2. TRIAL §242—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

In a railroad fireman's action for injury, when struck by a sign standing near the track, instruction substantially in the language of Civ. Code, § 1970, that an employee injured by the unsafe condition of any appliances or structures was not barred from recovery, unless he understood and appreciated the dangers incident thereto and continued in their use, was not misleading or prejudicial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 569-576; Dec. Dig. § 242.]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT §295(3) — ACTION FOR INJURIES—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Such instruction was not improper, where it appeared that a signboard in close proximity constituted an inherent and permanent condition of the way.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 1171; Dec. Dig. ☞ 295(3).]

4. TRIAL ☞ 296(6) — INSTRUCTIONS — CONSTRUCTION.

Such instruction was not objectionable as tending to convey the impression that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, or that the jury should not find him negligent, "unless he fully understood, comprehended, and appreciated what the result of his own act would be," when read with other instructions fairly stating the test of contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 709; Dec. Dig. ☞ 296(6).]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT ☞ 240(1)—ACTION FOR INJURIES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

The test of a railroad fireman's contributory negligence in leaning outside the tender was whether a prudent man in the exercise of due care would have done so under similar circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 751; Dec. Dig. ☞ 240(1).]

6. MASTER AND SERVANT ☞ 264(14)—ACTION FOR INJURIES—EVIDENCE—WARNING.

In a railroad fireman's action for injury when he was struck by a signboard, wherein the defendant denied his ignorance of the proximity of the signboard and alleged that he knew of its presence, evidence that the fireman had not been warned of the nearness of the signboard or instructed as to its dangerous proximity was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 874; Dec. Dig. ☞ 264(14).]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT ☞ 113(1)—MASTER'S DUTY—RAILROAD—WAY AND APPLIANCES.

A railroad must so construct its roads and structures, and so protect its ways and provide proper appliances, that its employes will have a reasonably safe place to work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 213, 224; Dec. Dig. ☞ 113(1).]

8. TRIAL ☞ 191(10) — INSTRUCTIONS — PROVINCE OF JURY.

In a railroad fireman's action for injury, when struck by a signboard, instructions that it was the railroad's duty to use ordinary care to see that its tracks were not so near other structures as necessarily to endanger its employes upon passing trains, that to permit any obstructions so near the track as to injure trainmen engaged in their ordinary duties was actionable, and that a railroad was bound to place signal posts and other structures at a safe distance from the track, were not objectionable as invading the province of the jury by directing it to find that the maintenance of a signboard 55 inches from the tracks was actionable negligence, even though the fireman was not actually injured by the signboard, since it left such question of fact to the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 1420; Dec. Dig. ☞ 191(10); Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1383.]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR ☞ 1064(1) — REVIEW — INSTRUCTIONS.

Instructions that an employer's violation of its own reasonable rule is as much negligent conduct as an employe's violation of the rule, that rules adopted in the operation of a railroad brought to the knowledge of an employe form part of the contract of hiring binding on both the railroad and the employe, and that the railroad's violation thereof to the injury of the employe is as negligent as if the employe violates them, if erroneous, were harmless, when considered with the effect of the railroad's knowledge of the violation of the rule that no structures should be allowed nearer than 8 feet of the rail of the main track.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4219; Dec. Dig. ☞ 1064(1).]

10. MASTER AND SERVANT ☞ 243(2) — INJURIES TO SERVANT—VIOLATION OF RULES.

Where a master adopts reasonable rules which are brought to the knowledge of the servant, such rules constitute an element of the contract of hiring, the disregard of which on the part of the servant will preclude his recovery for resulting injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 760; Dec. Dig. ☞ 243(2).]

11. MASTER AND SERVANT ☞ 205(2)—RULES—CONTRACT OF HIRING—EFFECT.

A railroad's rule that no structure should be allowed nearer than 8 feet of the rail of the main track, if brought to the knowledge of a railroad fireman, became part of the contract of hiring and gave him a right to rely upon the railroad and go about his work with the assurance that no structures were close enough to the track to imperil his safety.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 547; Dec. Dig. ☞ 205(2).]

12. MASTER AND SERVANT ☞ 144 — MASTER'S LIABILITY — VIOLATION OF RULE — NEGLIGENCE.

A railroad knowingly violating a rule as to the distance of structures from the main track promulgated for the protection of its employes and upon which a fireman had a right to rely, resulting in injury to a fireman who had not been warned regarding the dangerous proximity of a signboard, was negligent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 287; Dec. Dig. ☞ 144.]

13. NEGLIGENCE ☞ 141(12) — ACTION FOR INJURIES — INSTRUCTION — DAMAGES — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

In a railroad fireman's action for injuries from being struck by a signboard near the track, an instruction that his contributory negligence, if any, should not bar his recovery where it was slight and that of the railroad was gross in comparison, but that the damages should be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employe, substantially similar to Roseberry Act (St. 1911, p. 796, § 1), was not objectionable as not telling the jury whether the reduction should be in proportion to the negligence of the employer or the total negligence of the employer and employe combined.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 397-399; Dec. Dig. ☞ 141(12).]

14. TRIAL ☞ 296(11) — INSTRUCTIONS — DAMAGES.

An instruction that the plaintiff might recover for all injuries suffered and for all resulting damages, in view of proper instruction on the diminution of damages on account of contributory negligence, was not misleading.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 431; Dec. Dig. ☞ 296(11).]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Yuba County; Eugene P. McDaniel, Judge.

Action by Charles O. Humphres against the Western Pacific Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Warren Olney, Jr., of San Francisco, W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and Alexander R. Baldwin, of San Francisco, for appellant. E. J. Talbott, of San Francisco, and Wallace Dinsmore, of Marysville, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. The plaintiff was injured while performing his duties as a fireman on one of the defendant's freight trains, and brought this action to recover damages. His claim for damages is based upon the alleged negligence of the defendant railway company in maintaining a signboard so close to its track that it collided with him while the train was in motion, and caused the injuries complained of. The defendant denied the material allegations of the complaint and pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff in that he knew of the location of the signboard, "but notwithstanding such knowledge he carelessly and negligently extended and protruded his body and head out of the locomotive upon which he was riding, * * * and as a result * * * came in contact with said signboard to his injury." The verdict was in plaintiff's favor. The defendant appeals and seeks a reversal of the judgment, and the order denying its motion for a new trial, principally upon the ground of certain alleged erroneous instructions which were given to the jury.

The accident occurred on October 13, 1911, at which time the Roseberry Act (Stats. 1911, p. 796) was in force, but the parties had not elected to come under its compensatory provisions. The record discloses the following facts: While making a run from Stockton to Oroville on one of the defendant railway company's freight trains, plaintiff, who was employed as a fireman, was directed by the engineer to care for a hot box which had developed on the truck of the tank of the locomotive on the left-hand side. In order to cool the hot box a hose was inserted into the box and water allowed to run on the heated bearing or axle. It was plaintiff's duty to keep a lookout to see that the hose remained in position and that the water continued to run upon the axle during the time that the train was in motion. To do this, plaintiff, at times, grasped the handholds of the cab and tender of the engine and leaned out so as to be able to look under the tender, the better to see the box. While he was thus engaged, the train was traveling at about the rate of 30 miles per hour in an easterly direction and approaching a flag station in Yuba county, known as "Oso." There was no station or depot at that point; the defendant's trains stopping there only when it was necessary to take on or let off passengers or load or discharge freight. A signboard, however, had been erected by one of the shippers at that point, with the acquiescence of the defendant, nearly a year prior to the time of the accident for the purpose, as testified, "of familiarizing the trainmen with the place so they would know where Oso was." The signboard consisted of a horizontal board about 18 inches in length, nailed to a perpendicular post or scantling, and bore the name of "Oso." It was located so that its inner edge was just 55 inches from the nearest rail of the track upon which the freight train was approaching—that is, about 24 to 26 inches from the side of a locomotive if standing opposite it upon the track. The train upon which plaintiff was employed had no orders to stop at Oso. As to what took place as the train neared the said station may be inferred from the testimony of plaintiff:

"I looked around and see the hose was down out of the faucet. That was after we got across the bridge. I got down and put the faucet back up, and puts the hose back up to the faucet, and got hold of the handholds, one on the cab and one on the tank, and stretched my head out to look down there at the box, and when I was doing this, this board struck me in the head. What went on after that, I know nothing about."

The engineer testified that at this point he "saw a flash and the fireman was off." The train was brought to a stop, and plaintiff was found lying 20 feet down an embankment in the neighborhood of 120 or 200 feet beyond the signboard. His hat was picked up about 20 feet east thereof, while commencing about 50 feet from the post, a trail of blood and broken weeds marked the course through which he had rolled. The board, itself, was found to be freshly split and twisted out of shape.

[1] It is the theory, in support of the plaintiff's case, that he was struck by this board, and thus received the severe injuries to his skull, spine, and other portions of his body complained of. As the verdict was in his favor, it must be presumed that this was also the conclusion of the jury.

[2] 1. The court instructed the jury that: "An employé, injured by the defective or unsafe character or condition of any machinery, ways, appliances, or structures of such employer, shall not be barred to recovery for injury or death caused thereby, unless it shall also appear that such employé fully understood, comprehended, and appreciated the dangers incident to the use of such defective machinery, ways, or structures, and therefore consented to use the same or continued in the use thereof."

This instruction is substantially similar to the language of the Civil Code, § 1970. It is contended by the defendant that such an instruction was inapplicable because no allegation had been made that plaintiff had assumed the risk of the hazard, and that, in any event, by the provisions of the Roseberry Act, the doctrine of the assumption of risk was not available as a defense. Stats. 1911, p. 796. But we are unable to see in what way the giving of the instruction was prejudicial to the defendant, for the doctrine of the assumption of risk is a limitation on the right of the injured employé to recover for injuries he may suffer in the course of his employment. The instruction, when considered in respect to the other instructions, and the facts to which it was to be applied, could not have misled the jury to the prejudice of the defendant.

[3] The defendant also attacks the instruction upon the ground that it was improper for the reason that the proximity of the signboard to the track did not constitute a defective or unsafe character or condition of the track or way. In support of its contention the defendant relies upon the case of Kansas City, M. & B. Ry. Co. v. Burton, 97 Ala. 240, 12 South. 88. But in that case the court merely holds that an obstruction temporarily near the track does not constitute a defect in the way. The obstruction here constituted an inherent condition of the way which was essentially of a permanent nature. The Alabama authority is therefore not in point.

[4, 5] Nor do we think the instruction tends to convey the impression that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, or that the jury should not find him negligent, "unless he fully understood, comprehended, and appreciated what the result of his own act would be." The instruction does not purport to be a complete statement of the law upon which the plaintiff may recover. When read in connection with the many instructions covering contributory negligence, we find the jury was fairly instructed as to the test of contributory negligence—what a prudent man in the exercise of due care would have done under similar circumstances. Killelea v. California Horseshoe Co., 140 Cal. 602, 74 Pac. 157, and Pierce v. United Gas & Electric Co., 161 Cal. 176, 118 Pac. 700, relied upon by the defendant, are not based upon instructions similar to the one under consideration. The instructions before the court in those cases concluded with a direction to the jury to render a verdict for the plaintiff in the event that the things stated were found to be true.

[6] Evidence was admitted, over the defendant's objection, to the effect that the plaintiff had not been warned of the nearness of the signboard to the track, or instructed as to its dangerous proximity. This evidence was properly admitted. It was material to the issue raised by the defendant in its denial of plaintiff's claim of lack of knowledge of the proximity of the signboard, and the affirmative allegation of the answer that the plaintiff "knew of its presence, its location, and existence as herein alleged," as well as to the defense of contributory negligence.

[7, 8] 2. Instructions Nos. 2, 3, and 4 read as follows:

"(2) The court instructs the jury that it is the duty of a railway company to use ordinary care to see that its tracks are not in such close proximity to other structures as unnecessarily to endanger its servants and the employes who may be engaged in the discharge of their duties upon trains or cars passing along such tracks.

"(3) It is actionable negligence on the part of a railway company to suffer obstructions to remain so near their tracks that their trainmen, engaged in their ordinary duties, are liable to come in contact with them and be killed or injured while in the exercise of due care.

"(4) A railroad company is in duty bound to place its signal posts, telegraph poles, cattle guard fences and other structures used in connection with the road at a safe distance from the track, to the end that they will not be dangerous to those engaged in operating its trains."

These instructions are founded upon the principle that a railway company must so construct its roads and structures, and so protect the ways and provide proper appliances, that its employes will have a reasonably safe place to do their work. The law, thus covered by the instructions, is supported by numerous authorities. Chicago & Iowa R. R. Co. v. Russell, etc., 91 Ill. 298, 33 Am. Rep. 54; Murphy v. Wabash Ry. Co., 115 Mo. 111, 21 S. W. 862; 4 Thompson on Negligence, §§ 4253, 4280; 3 Elliott on Railroads, § 1269; 26 Cyc. 1112. But the defendant contends that, by these instructions, the court has invaded the province of the jury in the determination of the facts, and has in effect, directed it to find that the maintenance of a signboard 55 inches from the track was actionable negligence, "even though the plaintiff was not actually injured by the signboard." We do not so read the instructions. They seem to us to go no further than to state the principles of law defining the responsibilities of the defendant railroad company in the premises, and declaring the duty which it owed to plaintiff. It was proper for the jury to know and understand the law in this regard, and necessary that it should be so instructed as to enable it to fully determine the issues presented by the plaintiff's case. But, as for the facts to which the instructions were to be applied, the jury was left to draw its own conclusions—that is to say, the jury was bound to determine whether the plaintiff was, as a matter of fact, struck by the board, whether the board was so near the track that trainmen engaged in their ordinary duties and exercising due care were liable to come into contact with it, whether it was a safe distance from the track, whether the failure of the defendant to perform its duty in providing a safe right of way was the proximate cause of plaintiff's injury, and other facts which, under the instructions, were material to his recovery. We find no error in the instructions.

[9-12] 4. By instructions Nos. 7 and 8 the court charged the jury as follows:

"(7) You are hereby instructed that the violation by an employing company of a reasonable rule which it has made, where such violation results in an injury to an employe, is as much negligent conduct as a violation of the rule by the employe would be.

"(8) You are instructed that a system of rules adopted by a master for the conduct of a complicated business, such as operating a railroad, when brought to the knowledge of the employe, forms a part of the contract of hiring, and becomes binding on both master and servant. The violation thereof, to the injury of the servant by the master, is as much an act of negligence as if the servant violates them."

One of the rules imposed a duty upon the plaintiff to inform himself as to the proximity of the signboard to the track. This rule (No. 366) is as follows:

"Employés are required to look after their own safety and to exercise caution to avoid injury to fellow employés, and must inform themselves respecting the location and clearance of all structures or obstructions (including mail cranes, water cranes, bridges, and tunnels) along the line that will not clear them when on the top of cars or side of cars or engines."

According to rule No. 383, the signboard should not have been as near as 55 inches from the track. The rule reads, in part:

"No building or structure should be allowed nearer than 8 feet of the rail of main track, nor nearer than 6 feet of the rail of any side track. Any violation of this regulation must be at once reported to the superintendent."

It is not contended that either of these rules is unreasonable, but it is claimed that the question whether a violation of a rule by an employer constitutes negligence is solely for the determination of the jury (citing Smithson v. Chicago G. W. Ry. Co., 71 Minn. 216, 73 N. W. 853; McKernan v. Detroit, etc., Ry. Co., 138 Mich. 519, 101 N. W. 812, 68 L. R. A. 347; Fonda v. St. Paul City Railway Co., 71 Minn. 438, 74 N. W. 166, 70 Am. St. Rep. 341), and that, likewise, it was the function of the jury and not that of the court to compare the negligence of the parties. The court in other instructions fully covered the rule, which is not questioned by counsel for the defendant, that where an employer adopts reasonable rules which are brought to the knowledge of the employé, such rules constitute an element of the contract of hiring, disregard of which on the part of the employé will preclude his recovery for injuries sustained. Hodshire v. Corn Products Refining Co., 179 Ill. App. 529; 26 Cyc. 1162; 3 Elliot on Railroads, §§ 1280, 1282. As the court puts it in instruction No. 21:

"After having been given a copy of such rules, it was the duty of plaintiff to familiarize himself with the provisions of said section and to comply with and conform to the same. This was a duty owed by him to defendant by virtue of his employment, and if he failed so to do, such failure was a violation of the duty he owed to defendant, and if such violation contributed directly to the accident out of which plaintiff claims to have received his injuries, then plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence."

But it is not necessary for us to pass upon the general question whether the mere violation by a railroad company of a rule which it has promulgated for the protection of its employés, where the violation results in injury to such employé, constitutes negligence. In the giving of instructions Nos. 7 and 8, no prejudice could possibly have resulted to the defendant company except as the instructions applied to the particular rules of the company which were admitted in evidence. Examining these rules, we find that the jury could not have found against the defendant on the ground that the violation of the rules was negligence per se, except in the case of rule No. 383. Applying instructions Nos. 7 and 8 to this rule, it must be admitted that the jury was, in effect, instructed that the railroad company was negligent in permitting the signboard to be located just 55 inches from the track, instead of 8 feet, as provided in its rule. It was part of the plaintiff's duty to watch the hot box while the locomotive was in motion. Assuming that the rule was brought to the knowledge of the plaintiff, as the jury was directed to find before it could apply the law embraced in the instructions, it became part of the contract of hiring. See Louisville, N. A. & C. Ry. Co. v. Heck, 151 Ind. 292, 50 N. E. 988, 991; Central Ry. Co. v. Young, 200 Fed. 359, 118 C. C. A. 465. The plaintiff had a right to rely upon the rule and to go about his work on the locomotive with full assurance that no structures were close enough to the track to imperil his safety. Had the company enforced the provisions of the rule the clearance between the signboard and the sides of a passing locomotive would have been at least 67 inches. The actual distance was 26 inches. Moreover, as testified by Jacob P. Ebert, one of the defendant's witnesses, the signboard had been erected in that position for about a year prior to the accident. The defendant must therefore be charged with knowledge that rule No. 383 was being violated. The situation is then presented of the company not only having knowingly violated a rule which was promulgated and, excepting in this case, presumably enforced for the protection of its employés, and upon which the plaintiff had a right to rely, but such violation actually endangered the lives and safety of its employés and brought harm to the plaintiff, who, according to his uncontradicted testimony, had not been warned regarding the dangerous proximity of the signboard. This, in itself, is sufficient to constitute negligence on the part of the defendant. It is therefore our opinion that whatever error was committed by the instructions, was harmless under the facts of the case.

[13] 5. Instruction No. 10 is also complained of. It was to the effect that:

Plaintiff's contributory negligence, if any, "shall not bar a recovery therein where and if his contributory negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross in comparison; but the damages may be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of such negligence attributable to such employé."

This language is substantially similar to section 1 of the Roseberry Act. The defendant points out that:

"The court does not tell the jury in proportion to what the damages are to be diminished; that is, whether it is in proportion to the negligence of the employer or the total negligence of the plaintiff and defendant combined."

The latter construction has been adopted in the United States Supreme Court, where a similar provision in the federal Employers' Liability Act (Act Cong. April 22, 1903, c. 149, 35 Stat. 65 [U. S. Comp. St. 1913, §§ 8657-8665]) was construed. Norfolk & Western Ry. Co. v. Earnest, 229 U. S. 114, 33 Sup. Ct. 654, 57 L. Ed. 1096, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 172. But that case turned upon the point that the trial court, after stating the general rule, as was done in the instant case, added that the negligence of the plaintiff diminished the damages "in proportion to his negligence as compared with the negligence of the defendant." As the court said in that case:

"But for the use in the second instance of the additional words 'as compared with the negligence of the defendant' there would be no room for criticism."

This case is followed in Nashville, C., etc., Co. v. Banks, 156 Ky. 609, 161 S. W. 554, which is cited by the defendant, where the court, however, apparently overlooking the language just quoted, assumes that it is error for the court to fail to add that the damages should be apportioned to the combined amount of negligence attributed to plaintiff and to defendant. We are not disposed to follow this latter authority. The instruction, as given by the trial court, corresponds to the words of the statute, and is, in our opinion, sufficiently definite.

[14] 6. The defendant complains of instruction No. 5 on the ground that it informs the jury that the plaintiff is entitled to recover "for all damages which he has suffered * * * and for all damages for detriment resulting, * * * thus entirely doing away with the diminution of damages on account of contributory negligence." But when read in connection with the other instructions, there is nothing in the language of the instruction by which the jury could have been misled.

Judgment and order affirmed.

MERCANTILE TRUST CO. OF SAN FRANCISCO v. SUNSET ROAD OIL CO. et al. KERN VALLEY BANK v. SAME (WILLIAMS, Superintendent of Banks, Intervener). (L. A. 3784.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 14, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 9, 1916.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR — 82(1) — DECISIONS APPEALABLE.

An order denying appellants' motion to call in another judge to hear and determine the motion for new trial is appealable under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, as amended by St. 1915, p. 209, as a special order made after final judgment, for the order, if erroneous, subjected appellants under a void proceeding to a final judgment disposing of their rights, and the error could not be corrected on appeal from the order on the motion for new trial, for the relief to which appellants were entitled was not reversal, but vacation of the order and a remand of the matter for a hearing before a qualified judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 517, 521; Dec. Dig. — 82(1).]

2. JUDGES — 51(1) — DISQUALIFICATION — PROCEEDING.

One filing an affidavit alleging the disqualification of a judge to sit, while entitled, under Code Civ. Proc. § 170, to have counter affidavits by the judge filed before hearing, may waive that right.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judges, Cent. Dig. §§ 224, 225; Dec. Dig. — 51(1).]

3. JUDGES — 51(1) — AFFIDAVITS OF DISQUALIFICATION.

Where appellants' counsel, who filed an affidavit setting forth the disqualification of the judge to proceed with the hearing, agreed that the counter affidavit of the judge might be filed at any time, the right to insist on the strict statutory procedure requiring the filing of counter affidavits before hearing was waived, and an affidavit filed after hearing was in time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judges, Cent. Dig. §§ 224, 225; Dec. Dig. — 51(1).]

4. JUDGES — 51(3) — DISQUALIFICATION — COUNTER AFFIDAVITS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 170, providing for disqualification of a judge for interest, for relationship to parties or attorneys, or former participation in the case as an attorney, a judge is not disqualified by an affidavit in support of a motion to call in another judge, stating that he had been appointed by the Governor, a bitter enemy of one of the moving parties, that the Governor's son was of counsel in the case, and that the judge, though of little experience, had consented to try the matter, where the allegations of prejudice were contradicted by an affidavit of the judge, for constructive bias is not recognized by the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judges, Cent. Dig. §§ 227, 228; Dec. Dig. — 51(3).]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR — 185(3) — REVIEW — MATTERS REVIEWABLE.

On appeal from an order of the judge refusing to call in another judge on the ground of his disqualification, the question of the jurisdiction of the judge to hear the proceeding cannot be reviewed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1166; Dec. Dig. — 185(3).]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Howard A. Peairs, Judge.

Action by the Mercantile Trust Company of San Francisco, a corporation, against the Sunset Road Oil Company and others, defendants, in which the Kern Valley Bank, by W. R. Williams, cross-complained against the Sunset Road Oil Company, W. S. Tevis, and others, and in which W. R. Williams, as Superintendent of Banks of the State of California, intervened. From an order denying their motion to call in another judge to determine the motion for new trial, the Sunset Road Oil Company and W. S. Tevis and others appeal. Affirmed.

Gavin McNab and R. P. Henshall, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Hiram W. Johnson, Jr., of San Francisco, A. A. De Ligne, of Sacramento, and Donzel Stoney, William Denman, and G. S. Arnold, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Sunset Road Oil Company, W. S. Tevis, and other defendants appeal from an order overruling an objection by appellants to the hearing by Judge Peairs of a motion for a new trial made by the cross-complainant, Kern Valley Bank, and the intervener, the superintendent of banks, and denying their motion to have some other judge called to preside at the hearing of the motion for a new trial.

The cause was tried before Judge G. W. Nicol of Tuolumne county, who presided by consent of all the parties instead of one of the judges resident in Kern county. After the trial of the case Judge Peairs was appointed to the superior bench, and appellants made a motion and an objection under section 170, Code of Civil Procedure. An affidavit was filed alleging Judge Peairs' bias and prejudice, counter affidavits were prepared and presented, and Judge Peairs, denying the prayer of appellants, proceeded to hear and determine the motion for a new trial.

[1] Respondents insist that this court lacks jurisdiction to hear this appeal because, they say, an order denying a motion to call in another judge is not a "special order made after final judgment," and is not, therefore, appealable under the provisions of section 963, Code of Civil Procedure, as that statute existed prior to the amendment of 1915 (St. 1915, p. 209). They say that any errors committed by the court in denying such a motion are reviewable on an appeal from the order granting the motion for a new trial. An order granting the motion for a new trial has been made in this case, and an appeal therefrom is pending. Respondent relies upon such cases as Kaltschmidt v. Weber, 136 Cal. 675, 69 Pac. 497, and Murphy v. Stelling, 138 Cal. 641, 72 Pac. 176, which announce the rule that an order granting relief under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, to one in default in presenting a bill of exceptions for settlement within the time required by law is not appealable separately "as a special order made after final judgment," while an order refusing such relief is so appealable. We find no analogy between this appeal and the one attempted in Kaltschmidt v. Weber, supra; nor does Grless v. State Investment & Insurance Co., 93 Cal. 411, 28 Pac. 1041, support respondent's position. In the case last mentioned there was an effort to appeal from an order denying a motion to dismiss a motion for a new trial. It was declared by this court that such an order is not appealable because the refusal to dismiss a motion for a new trial does not dispose of the motion itself, and until some order is made by the trial court, which, in effect, grants or denies the motion for a new trial, neither party is aggrieved, and there is nothing to appeal from. But in the case at bar the order refusing to call another judge to the hearing of the motion for a new trial, if erroneous, subjected the appellant under a void proceeding to a final judgment disposing of his rights. If error was committed it was not such as might be corrected on appeal from the order subsequently made granting the motion for a new trial by reversing that order on appeal, but the proper order to be made by this court would be one pronouncing void the order denying the motion to disqualify the judge. This would operate not to reverse the order granting a new trial, but to vacate it and send the matter back for a hearing before a qualified judge. Keating v. Keating, 169 Cal. 754-760, 147 Pac. 974.

In Estate of Friedman, 171 Cal. 431, 153 Pac. 918, an appeal similar to this one was taken. It was the only appeal then before the court in that proceeding, and while the right of appellants to a separate appeal from the order there considered was not questioned, we think the court properly assumed jurisdiction of the controversy.

We will therefore decide this appeal on its merits. It is not necessary to discuss here the details of the litigation in the superior court, as certain appeals are pending from the judgment and from the order granting the motion for a new trial. The cause was tried in the superior court of Kern county, Judge Nicol of Tuolumne county presiding. After judgment motions for new trial were made by certain of the litigants, and Judge Nicol settled the statement on motion for a new trial. Subsequently the Hon. Howard A. Peairs was appointed judge of the superior court of the state of California, in and for the county of Kern. On October 24, 1913, the motions of the Kern Valley Bank and of the superintendent of banks for a new trial of the action so far as they were concerned were called for hearing before Judge Peairs. Thereupon the appellants objected to Judge Peairs and moved that he forthwith secure the services of some other judge to preside at the hearing as required in proper cases by section 170, Code of Civil Procedure. This motion was supported by the affidavit of Gavin McNab, Esq., one of the attorneys for Sunset Road Oil Company, W. S. Tevis, and others. In this affidavit it was directly charged that the judge was biased and prejudiced against one of the parties to the action, Mr. William S. Tevis. It also contained charges of constructive bias and prejudice on the part of the judge against Mr. Tevis, based upon allegations which were in substance as follows: The Governor of California, who appointed Judge Peairs, was a bitter enemy of Mr. Tevis and of Mr. McNab, and as attorney for the defendants in some criminal proceedings instituted by Mr. Tevis against them he had filed affidavits abusing Mr. Tevis. The Governor's son was one of the attorneys in this case for the superintendent of banks, who was also one of the Governor's appointees. It was also alleged in the affidavit that instead of bringing the motion on for hearing before the judge who tried the case and settled the bill of exceptions, counsel had solicited Judge Peairs to hear the motion, and that he had granted their request, although he was a judge of very little experience, and the record in the case was more than 10,000 pages long. The moving parties also offered to consent to a hearing before any judge who had been elected by the people and who then presided in any one of certain specified counties—a total of about 30 judges.

On the day when the affidavit was presented and read to the judge, opposing counsel filed an affidavit in response to it, by A. A. De Ligne, Esq., one of the attorneys for the superintendent of banks of the state of California. Among the averments contained in this document were those to the effect that the Governor of California had selected and appointed Judge Peairs only because of his fitness, and not to influence judgments in this or other cases; that the superintendent of banks took no part in the selection of the said judge; that the Governor's son, although an attorney of record in this case, had never taken any part nor rendered any services in the action since the filing of the pleadings; that the compensation of the Governor's son was in no manner contingent upon the outcome of the action; and that the chief executive officer of California was not influenced, in his appointment of Judge Peairs, by bias or prejudice against Mr. W. S. Tevis nor against any other person, whereby said W. S. Tevis or any other person could not have a fair and impartial hearing on the motion. There were other allegations impugning the motives of opposing counsel in seeking a hearing before some judge not of Kern county, but, as they are immaterial to the issues involved we will not discuss them.

After the reading of Mr. De Ligne's affidavit, Mr. Stoney, one of his associates, called the court's attention to the fact that, under the decisions of this court a judge might properly file an affidavit touching the matter of his alleged prejudice. Then the following proceedings were had:

"The Court: The court will state that it has absolutely no knowledge of the facts connected with this case. I am not acquainted with the attorneys, nor am I acquainted with the facts, and leaving aside the affidavit filed by Mr. McNab, I have no possible reason for any bias or prejudice in the case. Concerning the affidavit itself, I will make no comments. If the counsel in the case desire to stipulate that the matter be heard before some other judge, it will relieve me of a great deal of work, but in so far as making any ruling in the case upon the ground that I am biased or prejudiced, it would not be possible. If the counsel desire an affidavit from me to that effect and will prepare it, I will take a recess of the court for such time as deemed necessary.

"Mr. Stoney: If Mr. Henshall will stipulate that the affidavit will be dispensed with, but that the statement of the court may be regarded as an affidavit, we say that there will be no necessity for the making of the affidavit.

"The Court: I wish to say to counsel that I have no desire to hear the matter, but that I am not disqualified in any manner.

"Mr. Henshall: I do not think that a request like that should be made of me. I do not think I should be called upon to do it.

"Mr. Stoney: I will ask you to stipulate that if the affidavit is filed to-day, it may be deemed to have been filed at this time.

"Mr. Henshall: It can be filed at any time."

After some further conversation between court and counsel, which we need not reproduce here, a short recess was had, and upon the reconvening of court the following occurred:

"The Court: I will say, gentlemen, that I have carefully read the affidavit of Mr. McNab, and there are no features of this affidavit worthy of consideration, except those relating to the trial judge, G. W. Nicol; that under the stipulation—the last clause of that affidavit asked this court to designate some other judge to hear this motion for a new trial, which if I should do, under the affidavit as filed would be a reflection upon Judge Nicol, which could not be said to be the case, when I set this matter for hearing before this court, as I had no knowledge at that time of the fact that it had been tried before any judge other than Judge Bennett. The clerk of the court here can tell you that I had not opened Mr. Shaw's letter, and knew nothing of the facts of the case when I set it for this date, and in view of all the circumstances, and considering the affidavit, I will hear the motion for a new trial.

"Mr. Henshall: I understand that the objection was formally overruled?

"The Court: It is.

"Mr. Henshall: And that the motion to call in another judge under section 170, Code of Civil Procedure, is denied.

"The Court: It is."

A formal order embodying the substance of the oral statement of the judge was thereupon entered in the minutes of the court. One of the paragraphs of said order was as follows:

"Pursuant to stipulation of counsel for respective parties, including R. P. Henshall and Donzel Stoney, in open court, it is by the court ordered that the affidavit of the court in answer to the affidavit of Gavin McNab heretofore filed be presented later and considered as filed at this time."

The court then proceeded to hear argument on the motion for new trial. This hearing was continued from time to time pursuant to regular adjournments. One of the days upon which argument was heard was November 10, 1913, and on that day in the presence of the attorneys for all of the interested parties the affidavit of Judge Peairs was "produced in open court and filed with the clerk of said court, and said clerk of said court did then and there deliver to and serve upon each of the said attorneys, R. P. Henshall, T. O. Toland, and A. E. Shaw, a copy thereof, and such service and such filing was had and done with the full knowledge of all of said attorneys and without objection of any kind thereto."

[2-4] This affidavit, dated November 8, 1913, contained emphatic denial by Judge Peairs of any bias or prejudice against the litigants objecting to his presiding at the hearing of the motion. The judge deposed that, while he had been regularly appointed by the Governor of California, that official had never discussed nor mentioned this case nor any litigation of any kind pending in Kern county; that he had no knowledge of the Governor's hatred toward W. S. Tevis nor any other party to the action except such information as he received from Mr. McNab's affidavit; that if such feeling existed he was not prejudiced by it; that the fact of the Governor's son being connected with the case would not cause prejudice nor bias for or against any litigant in the case; that he was not aware of any interest in the case on the part of the state's chief executive officer, but that if such interest did exist it would cause no bias nor prejudice in the mind of the affiant; and that his sole desire was to see the laws applied to the facts in this cause with equal and exact justice to all the parties.

The appellants contend that under the authority of certain decisions of this court, notably Bassford v. Earl, 162 Cal. 115, 121 Pac. 395, there was no sufficient contradiction of the affidavit asserting the judge's prejudice at the time when the motion under section 170, Code of Civil Procedure, was denied. Undoubtedly under our statute, the qualification of the judge to preside in a case where sworn objection is made on the ground of his alleged prejudice, must be tried on affidavits, and the judge must put in the form of an affidavit an account of his own state of mind, if his fairness is called in question, but in this case counsel waived the filing of a formal affidavit until such time as the court might conveniently put in form and solemnly swear to a statement substantially equivalent to the declaration which he had made in open court. The petitioners were entitled to have the allegations of prejudice contained in Mr. McNab's affidavit traversed by the judge's affidavit before there should be a decision upon their motion, but this was a right which they might waive, and they did waive it. Mr. Stoney asked a stipulation that if the affidavit should be filed the day of the hearing it might be deemed to have been filed at the hour of the hearing. Opposing counsel with great generosity said: "It can be filed at any time." Subsequently when asked to stipulate that the judge might have five days in which to file the affidavit he said: "Anything that the court desires to do in that regard will have no opposition from me." This amounted to a waiver of the strict letter of the statutory requirement. It was entirely analogous to an agreement that the court may proceed without the formal presentation of a pleading the substance of which is known to both parties. Such arrangements are common in the practice of law, and many times the filing of a formal amended complaint or answer follows the actual decision of the cause.

The affidavits on behalf of the respondents were sufficient to support the ruling of the court, refusing to call another judge. We find no uncontradicted assertion of bias, nor was there a showing of constructive bias sufficient to support the motion. Section 170, Code of Civil Procedure, points out three classes of cases in which a judge may be disqualified. They are (1) interest in the case; (2) relationship to a party or attorney; and (3) former participation as an attorney; and "constructive bias" is not one of them.

[5] Appellants further argue that since Judge Nicol had been called to try the case Judge Peairs never acquired jurisdiction to hear any phase of it, but that is a question which, if pertinent at all, could not be raised on the motion before the court. It might have been raised by some other appropriate proceeding, but the only question presented by this record is the correctness or incorrectness of the ruling declining to call in another judge. That question was determined upon conflicting testimony, and we will not disturb the court's ruling, as we do not find any abuse of discretion. We fail to see how the appointment of a judicial officer by a Governor would even have a tendency to cause the former to adopt all the latter's prejudices and to decide cases not according to law, but in a manner which he might think pleasing to the appointing power.

The order is affirmed.

In re HUGHSON'S ESTATE.
BRIGHAM v. HUGHSON et al.
(Sac. 2495.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 11, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 10, 1916.)

1. MARRIAGE $\hookrightarrow$ 39—PROCEEDING TO DETERMINE HEIRSHIP—ISSUES, PROOF, AND VARIANCE.

In a proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, to determine heirship to a decedent whose estate was in administration, where plaintiff sought to establish her position as the widow of decedent, alleged her marriage to him and the continuance of her status as his wife to his death, and where defendants denied the marriage as pleaded and that the plaintiff was his widow by averring that one of the defendants was his wife at his death, the defendants, by relying upon the presumption that a marriage being proven stands as valid until proof of a prior unrevoked marriage, were not seeking to change their pleading or position or to substitute presumptions for proven facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. §§ 56, 57; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 39.]

2. MARRIAGE $\hookrightarrow$ 40(11)—CONTINUANCE—PRESUMPTION AND BURDEN OF PROOF.

In a proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, to determine heirship of a decedent, plaintiff, alleging her marriage to him and the continuance of her status as his wife to the time of his death, had the burden of proving that his subsequent marriage was void, and that her own earlier marriage to him had not been set aside by divorce or annulment so that at his death she was his wife by virtue of a lawful and subsisting marriage; and it was not incumbent upon the defendants to show that decedent had been divorced prior to his second marriage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. § 68; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 40(11).]

3. MARRIAGE $\hookrightarrow$ 40(1, 11)—VALIDITY—PRESUMPTION.

A ceremonial marriage having been proven is to be presumed lawful and valid until strong proof to the contrary, and the person asserting its invalidity by reason of a former marriage has the burden of proving that the first marriage had not ended before the second marriage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. §§ 58, 68; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 40(1, 11).]

4. MARRIAGE $\hookrightarrow$ 50(1)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 1664, to determine plaintiff's status as the widow of a decedent, opposed by a defendant claiming to be his surviving wife, evidence held to sustain a finding that the plaintiff was not decedent's wife at the time of his death.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Proceeding to determine heirship by Julia J. Brigham against Luella R. Hughson, as administratrix of the estate of Hiram Hughson, deceased, and others. Judgment for defendants, motion for new trial denied, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank J. Gordon, of Oakland, Welles Whitmore, of San Francisco, and J. J. Van Hovenberg, of Oakland, for appellant. J. W. Hawkins, of Modesto, Geo. F. McNoble and Nutter & Orr, all of Stockton, Griffin & Carlson and Hatton & Scott, all of Modesto, and Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan and J. Lanagan, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Julia J. Brigham instituted a proceeding under section 1664 of the Code of Civil Procedure to determine heirship to Hiram Hughson, deceased, whose estate had been for more than one year in process of administration. After appropriate proceedings to bring in all interested persons the said Julia J. Brigham became the plaintiff by filing a pleading in which she asserted that she was the surviving wife of Hiram Hughson by virtue of a marriage by and between herself and said Hughson contracted in the state of New York on the 27th day of October, 1860, and continuing and subsisting until the death of said Hiram Hughson, on January 15, 1911. This pleading was answered by Luella R. Hughson, who asserted that she was the surviving wife of Hiram Hughson, and by her ten children who claimed interest in the estate as legitimate heirs of the said Hiram Hughson.

After trial judgment was given in favor of the defendants. From said judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

The findings of the court disclose a very remarkable story. On the 27th of October, 1860, in the town of Norwich, county of Chenango, state of New York, Hiram Hughson and Julia J. Porter, this plaintiff, were lawfully joined in the bonds of matrimony by a ceremonial marriage duly performed. In February, 1861, Hiram Hughson left his wife, near Chenango Forks in the state of New York, came by steamer to California, and never thereafter lived with her. During his lifetime she never heard from him directly or indirectly after his departure from Chenango Forks. About February 1, 1864, she left New York and went to Hongkong, China, where she was united to one Elias J. Manning by a ceremonial marriage duly solemnized according to law. Thereafter four children of this union were born. In 1866, the Mannings and their family left China and went to Chenango Forks, where they resided until a time shortly before Mr. Manning's death, which occurred in Delaware in 1872. Thereafter plaintiff continued to live near Chenango Forks until her marriage on February 16, 1875, to Frank Brigham at Greene, Chenango county, N. Y. This was a ceremonial marriage solemnized according to the laws of the state of New York. As a result of this union four children were born. Julia J. Brigham and Frank Brigham continued to live together as husband and wife and to hold themselves out to the world as such until a time following the 1st day of January, 1915. She never knew that Hiram Hughson had survived the voyage from New York and had reached and resided in California until early in the year 1914, when she learned of his death. The court also found that plaintiff entered into the marriage relations with Manning in Hongkong and with Brigham in New York in good faith, and that she had good and sufficient reasons to believe that Hiram Hughson was dead. There were specific findings that plaintiff before her marriage to Manning acted in the highest good faith both in law and in fact to ascertain whether her first husband was living or dead, and that:

"She, the said Julia J. Brigham, was before her marriage to the said Elias J. Manning and also before her marriage to the said Frank Brigham, deceived as to the existence of her first husband, said Hiram Hughson, by a false report of his death, which said report had been communicated to her by persons in whom she had confidence and upon whose statements she had a right in good faith to rely for truthful statements, which said statements she did rely upon to be true in all respects."

The court also found that Hiram Hughson and Luella R. Avery were lawfully and by due solemnization married at Stockton, Cal., November 21, 1864, and continued to be such husband and wife until his death in 1911. It was found that they lived before the world as married people, raised a large family, and worked together diligently and faithfully to accumulate the ample fortune which was theirs at the time of Mr. Hughson's death. There were further findings that at the time of the wedding of Hiram Hughson and Luella R. Avery there was no legal impediment to their contracting such marriage; that Julia J. Brigham was not the wife of Hiram Hughson at any time on or after November 21, 1864; and that she was the legal wife of Frank Brigham from the time of her marriage to him in 1875 to and until January 1, 1915, a time following the commencement of this proceeding to determine heirship. The court made elaborate findings upon many matters connected with the administration of the estate and with the interests of the widow, Luella R. Hughson and her children, but it is not necessary to review them in the light of the conclusion which we have reached.

[1, 2] Respondent confidently depends upon the strength of the presumption which prevails in this state that a ceremonial marriage having been proven, it is to be treated as lawful until there is strong proof to the contrary; the burden of proof being upon the person asserting its invalidity. But appellant, while conceding that the authorities do seem to sustain the rule regarding the validity of marriage for which respondent contends, resists the application of the presumption to the facts of this case upon the ground that the question of a possible divorce of plaintiff from Hiram Hughson was not litigated. Appellant insists that the case was tried upon the theory by respondents that she and Hiram Hughson never had been married, and that the finding to the contrary is a complete overthrow of their position, and is fatal to their case. She cites numerous authorities, among them Brusie v. Gates, 96 Cal. 265-268, 31 Pac. 111, to the effect that a litigant may not assume a position at variance with his pleadings. It is also argued that the denial by respondents that there ever was a marriage between Hughson and Miss Porter amounts to a denial that there ever was or could have been a divorce. Appellant also asserts that as the record shows Hiram Hughson to have been the deserter and wrongdoer, no presumption of divorce may be invoked in his favor or in favor of any one claiming through him.

But respondents, by relying upon the presumption that a marriage being proven it stands as valid until proof of a prior unrevoked marriage, do not seek to change their pleading or position, nor to substitute presumptions for proven facts. And the question whether Hughson was a wrongdoer or not in leaving and not returning to his bride in New York has no place in the discussion of this particular point. The sole question is this: Did plaintiff meet the burden of proof resting upon her under her pleading? She was seeking to establish her position as the widow of Hiram Hughson. To succeed it would have been necessary for her to show that at the very moment of the death of Hiram Hughson she was his wife by virtue of a lawful and subsisting marriage. Estate of Harrington, 140 Cal. 244-246, 73 Pac. 1000, 98 Am. St. Rep. 51. She had not only alleged the marriage, but had pleaded the continuance of her status as the wife of Hiram Hughson to the moment of his death, and although respondents in their answers denied the marriage as pleaded, they also controverted the asserted position of plaintiff as Hughson's wife when he died, by averring that Luella R. Hughson was his wife at that time. The court found in their favor. It was not incumbent upon the respondents to show that Hiram Hughson had been divorced prior to his marriage to Luella. It was plaintiff's task to prove that the second marriage which she attacked was void—that her own earlier marriage to Hiram Hughson had not been set aside by divorce or annulment.

[3] In many of the states of this Union the presumption in favor of the legality of a marriage is not overcome by mere proof of an earlier ceremony, but to show the illegality of the second marriage there must be proof of a continuance of the prior marital relation, even when such proof involves the establishment of the negative proposition that there has been no divorce. In California the principle announced more than 20 years ago by this court in an opinion written by Mr. Justice Temple has been consistently followed ever since. In that case the following language was used:

"It is presumed that a person is innocent of crime or wrong. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963. There is also a presumption, and a very strong one, in favor of the legality of a marriage regularly solemnized. Rather than hold a second marriage invalid and that the parties have committed a crime or been guilty of immorality, the courts have often indulged in the presumption of death in less than seven years, or, where the absent party was shown to be alive, have allowed a presumption that the absent party has procured a divorce. A more correct statement perhaps would be that the burden is cast upon the party asserting guilt or immorality to prove the negative—that the first marriage had not ended before the second marriage."

Hunter v. Hunter, 111 Cal. 261-267, 43 Pac. 756, 31 L. R. A. 411, 52 Am. St. Rep. 180.

In the very recent case (In re Pusey's Estate, 159 Pac. 433), where a person was seeking to show the invalidity of the marriage of petitioner to Gertrude Pusey, whose estate was involved, this court held that even if the person attacking the sufficiency of certain purported divorce proceedings could do so successfully, it would be necessary to show additionally that petitioner's undivorced wife was living when he married Gertrude Pusey; otherwise there could be no valid finding that he was not the latter's surviving husband. In Wilcox v. Wilcox, 171 Cal. 770, 155 Pac. 95, an action for annulment of marriage, it was held that proof of a marriage was not overcome by evidence of an earlier one without a showing of the continuance of the life of both husband and wife up to the moment of the second marriage. In McKibbin v. McKibbin, 139 Cal. 448, 73 Pac. 143, it was held that proof of a prior marriage and the continued life of both spouses was not sufficient to make a prima facie case as against a second ceremonial marriage; that there must be further showing that the first marriage had not been set aside by judicial decree. The books contain many similar decisions, but it is not necessary to go outside of California for authority. We will refer, however, to the frequently cited case of Maier v. Brock, 222 Mo. 74, 120 S. W. 1167, 133 Am. St. Rep. 513, 17 Ann. Cas. 763, which in its facts is very similar to the one at bar. It was a suit for assignment of dower. Plaintiff had married Maier in Germany in 1865. In 1866 he left her and came to America. In 1885 he visited Germany, and she then saw him for the last time. It was shown that in 1872 he married another woman and lived with her until her death. In 1885 he married Mary Baldruff and lived with her until she died. He then married another woman and was divorced from her. In 1902 he married Nora Carl and lived with her until his death in 1904. The finding of the court in favor of defendants was upheld. Many of the leading cases were there discussed, and upon the very presumption upon which respondent here depends the judgment was upheld.

[4] We conclude that the court was justified in finding that the plaintiff was not Hughson's wife at the moment of his death. It therefore becomes immaterial whether or not the court erred in finding that under the laws of New York the marriage of plaintiff to Brigham was voidable merely and not void; and whether or not there was error in excluding proof that after the commencement of the action that marriage had been annulled by the judgment of another superior court of this state. Indeed many interesting questions are eliminated from the discussion when this fundamental finding is upheld. Having no interest in the estate, appellant is not concerned with the manner of its distribution nor with other matters not related to her status. Estate of Walden, 168 Cal. 759-761, 145 Pac. 100.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

EDWARDS v. ARP. (L. A. 3775.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 13, 1916.)

1. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇨70 — CONTRACTS—CONSTRUCTION.

Plaintiff sold land on part of which walnut trees were growing, under an agreement that, as compensation for the trees, defendant should pay a sum equal to ten times the net proceeds from the sale of the walnut crop. The agreement provided that the harvesting and marketing of the crops should be done under joint supervision of the parties, but defendant was admitted into possession, and no rights were reserved to plaintiff other than to enter on the land to harvest the crop. Defendant allowed his hogs to range on the land covered by the walnut trees, and they ate up considerable of the nuts which were shaken down and were ripening on the ground. Held that, in computing the value of the crop, such nuts should be taken into consideration; plaintiff being under no duty and having no right to prevent the hogs from going on that part of the land where the trees were located.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 102, 106-111; Dec. Dig. ⇨70.]

2. VENDOR AND PURCHASER ⇨70 — CONTRACTS—CONSIDERATION.

In such case, as the wrongful act of defendant prevented the nuts eaten by the hogs from being gathered and sold, defendant cannot object to taking into account of such nuts on the theory that it was not within the contemplation of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 102, 106-111; Dec. Dig. ⇨70.]

3. INTEREST ⇨19(3) — UNLIQUIDATED AMOUNT.

Where the amount defendant was to pay for walnut trees on land purchased was uncertain until judgment, interest prior to the time that the amount was ascertained should not be allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Interest, Cent. Dig. § 39; Dec. Dig. ⇨19(3).]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1151(2)—REVIEW—REVERSAL.

That interest on the amount of the judgment was improperly allowed from a date prior to the rendition of judgment does not necessitate a reversal, for the error can be remedied by striking out such item from the judgment.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by R. L. Edwards against James Arp. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Order affirmed, and cause remanded, with directions to modify judgment.

Kay & Siemon, of Bakersfield, for appellant. Alfred Daggett, of Visalia, and T. M. McNamara, of Bakersfield, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. As part of the purchase price of a tract of land in Kern county, appellant agreed, by written contract, to pay respondent for certain walnut trees growing thereon a sum to be determined as follows: From the gross proceeds received from the sale of the crop of walnuts for the year 1911 the cost of harvesting and marketing the same was to be deducted, and the appellant was to pay respondent a sum equal to ten times the net proceeds received from the sale of said walnut crop. The harvesting and marketing of the crop was to be done under the joint superintendence of the parties. Respondent sued upon the contract to recover $2,335, the purchase price of the trees, and was awarded a judgment for $1,410.37 with interest on that amount from December 7, 1911, a date prior to the filing of his complaint. Appellant appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial and seeks a reversal on two grounds.

He insists, first, that the court erred in including in the amount of the walnut crop of 1911 some 500 pounds of nuts of the net value of $60 which had been eaten or destroyed by hogs owned by appellant, and then awarding respondent ten times that sum—or $600—in making up the judgment in his favor. He further claims that it was error for the court to allow interest at 7 per cent. from a date in December, 1911, after the nuts had been harvested and sold and up to the entry of the judgment. The action was commenced April 19, 1912.

[1, 2] As to the first point: The evidence shows that the walnut grove on which the crop was harvested consisted of about two acres of a larger tract embraced in the contract of sale; that appellant owned some hogs which, while he permitted them to roam over the entire tract, he could readily have kept out of the walnut grove while the nut crop was ripening and being harvested, and was requested by respondent to do so during that period; that appellant failed to take any precautions in that respect, but willfully permitted the hogs to range over the grove during all the time the nuts were ripening and falling, and also while the crop was being actually gathered and harvested, and a large quantity of the nuts had been shaken from the trees and lay on the ground; and that the hogs of appellant ate up or destroyed the quantity as found by the court.

The theory of the appellant in support of a reversal seems to be that he had a right at all times to range his hogs on any portion of the tract embraced in the contract of sale, including the walnut grove, and that, though the exercise of that right resulted in a partial destruction of the nut crop by the hogs, it is a loss for which respondent was entitled to no redress. Further it is claimed by appellant that, conceding negligence on his part in permitting the hogs to roam over the grove, still respondent was guilty of contributory negligence in not taking proper precautions to prevent the depredations of the animals which also precluded any right of recovery on his part. As to the claim of contributory negligence, the argument of appellant is that the contract of sale, in which this provision with reference to payment for the walnut trees is embraced, itself placed no limitation upon the right of appellant to use all of the premises for ordinary farming purposes, nor is there anything therein precluding him during any period of the year from ranging his hogs upon the land constituting the walnut grove; that the contract as respects the grove gave as much right to respondent, as the appellant had, to enter the grove and harvest and market the crop; that it was as much the duty of respondent as of appellant to provide means for protecting the crop from the ravages of the hogs, and respondent, having failed to do so, cannot complain of any loss he may have suffered.

We cannot indorse the theory of appellant or accept his argument as sound. Taking up the points made by him inversely, there is no ground for the assertion that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence in not keeping the hogs of appellant out of the grove. Under the contract of sale of the property appellant was given possession of the tract including the grove. Respondent had no right to enter it save for the limited purpose of supervising jointly with appellant the harvesting and gathering of the nut crop and for that purpose only. Nothing in the contract authorized respondent to enter the premises and build fences to inclose the grove, and there was no contractual or legal duty imposed upon him to do so or to employ swine herds to prevent the hogs of appellant from ranging over it. Under the contract the walnut crop was made the basis of the price to be paid for the trees, and, appellant, being in possession of the tract embracing it, it was his duty to conduct himself respecting it so as to neither do, nor permit to be done, any act which would tend to diminish or destroy the crop of walnuts. Obviously it was to the interest of appellant that no crop should be harvested off the grove in 1911; and, to the extent that any prospective crop might be diminished or destroyed by appellant permitting his hogs to roam through the grove during harvest time, it would be of material advantage to him. But it is fundamental that one cannot take advantage of his own wrong and to sanction the conduct of appellant in the face of the purposes of their contract would be to violate that principle. Whatever right the appellant had to range his hogs over the entire premises at other seasons of the year, he had no right, having a due regard to a fair and honest carrying out of the contract between himself and respondent, to range them over the grove at a time when the crop had ripened and was ready for gathering and harvesting and when the inevitable result would be to have a large quantity of it destroyed. The duty of appellant under the contract was to permit nothing to be done which he might prevent that would diminish the nut crop to be harvested and gathered, and his disregard of that duty by negligently allowing his hogs to range over the grove and destroy a portion of the crop made him liable to respondent to the extent of the net value of the portion of the crop destroyed which would have constituted a partial basis for determining the price to be paid for the walnut trees. The court found that 500 pounds of walnuts of the market value of 12 cents per pound, amounting to $60, were so destroyed and determined that defendant was liable to ten times the value thereof under the terms of the contract. While appellant contends that this is a departure from the method whereby under the contract the purchase price of the trees was to be fixed, we do not think this is true. It is in effect adopting just the standard which the parties provided. If the hogs of the appellant had not destroyed a portion of the crop, it would have been taken into account in fixing the purchase price of the trees. If the appellant had surreptitiously given away that amount of the nut crop or burned up a like quantity, it certainly could have been taken into consideration in settling the rights of the parties under their contract. So, here, the wrongful act of the appellant in negligently permitting his hogs to destroy it having prevented the actual gathering and harvesting of a portion of the crop, the court properly ascertained what its value would have been had not appellant thus prevented its being actually harvested and marketed, and took that value into consideration to the same extent exactly as it was to be taken under the contract in determining the purchase price of the trees.

[3] The second point made by appellant is that the court erred in allowing respondent interest from the 1st day of December, 1911, at which date the court found that the crop of walnuts was fully marketed and disposed of by both respondent and appellant. We think this point is well taken. Here the demand sued on was uncertain and unliquidated. The fact of the contract furnished nothing whereby it could be determined by calculation what amount was due plaintiff. The elements under which the amount due was to be ascertained were uncertain. The quantity of the nuts gathered and sold, the cost of harvesting, and the market value of the crop, were all matters to be determined upon a trial, and, when that is the situation, interest is not allowable prior to judgment.

Brady v. Wilcoxson, 44 Cal. 245; Easterbrook v. Farquharson, 110 Cal. 311, 42 Pac. 811.

[4] This error, however, does not require a reversal of the order and judgment appealed from. It can be remedied by a modification of the judgment. The order appealed from is therefore affirmed. The cause is, however, remanded, with directions to the trial court to modify the judgment by striking out the amount allowed for interest prior to judgment, and, as thus modified, the judgment is to stand affirmed. Appellant to recover his costs on this appeal.

In re COOK'S ESTATE. (L. A. 4561.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 13, 1916.)

1. WILLS §215—PROBATE—ISSUES.

The court on a petition for the probate of several writings claimed to constitute a will is limited solely to the inquiry as to whether the writings constitute the will of decedent, and cannot ordinarily construe the writings as a will and resolve inconsistencies in the disposition of property, or construe provisions of the writings.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 522, 523; Dec. Dig. §215.]

2. WILLS §207 — WRITINGS CONSTITUTING WILL.

A person who had suffered for about 20 years from a malignant disease, and who could obtain relief only from an operation, wrote the day before going to a hospital for the operation three letters—one to a brother, another to sisters and a brother jointly, and a third to her business agent. She stated therein her intention of going to the hospital and expressed the belief that she might not survive. She then gave directions as to her funeral, and then proceeded to dispose of her property. She declared that she wanted a person named to have all of her jewelry except a diamond ring, which in one letter she directed should be sold, while in another letter she stated that she wanted a sister to have it. She further stated that she wanted the proceeds of a mortgage to be collected by her business agent, turned over to a brother, with balance due "on the Neffs payments." She directed further that all her clothing should be sent to a sister, and then declared that, after all expenses were paid, anything left should be equally divided with her father, brothers, and a sister. Held, that the letters were testamentary in character, and could be admitted to probate as her will, in the absence of any other showing.

3. WILLS §207—PROBATE—EVIDENCE.

A person who had suffered for about 20 years from a malignant disease, and who could obtain relief only from an operation, wrote the day before going to a hospital for the operation letters testamentary in character giving directions for the disposition of her property, but used expressions therein, "If I should die from the operation," and "In case I do not live through the operation," and "I have reason to believe I will not live through it," and "I want you to see it is done in case of my death only." She died a month after the operation from gastric ulcers, the disease from which she had suffered. She had never been informed and did not know of the nature of the disease. The physician who operated on her diagnosed her case as involving a diseased condition of other organs than her stomach, and the operation, as far as it went, was successful. There could have been no successful operation for gastric ulcers. Held, that the letters were properly admitted to probate as against the objection that they made it a condition precedent to their becoming effective as a will that she should die as a result of the operation, and that she died from a new and different disease.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Proceedings for the probate of letters written by Jane Boylan Cook, deceased, as her will, in which her surviving husband, W. E. Cook, filed a contest. There was a judgment admitting the writings to probate as the will of the deceased, and the contestant, W. E. Cook, appeals. Affirmed.

West, Koepsel & Eden, of Santa Ana, for appellant. Tipton & Cailor, of Los Angeles, and Gonsalves & Keller, of Oakland, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. The deceased on April 25, 1915, being about to go to a hospital to have an operation performed, wrote and sent three letters—one to a brother, another to her sisters and a brother jointly, and a third to a friend who was her business agent. She died on May 26, 1915. A petition was filed in the superior court of Orange county for the probate of the several letters referred to, as constituting the last will of decedent, and, as no person was nominated therein as executor, that letters of administration with the will annexed be issued to John H. Higgins, a brother mentioned in one of the proffered letters as a legatee, and who was petitioner for the probate of the will. W. E. Cook, the husband of the deceased, filed a contest to the probate of said letters as the last will of deceased on the grounds: First, that the said letters were not testamentary writings, or testamentary in character; and, second, that even if testamentary in character, nevertheless they should be denied probate because their taking effect as the last will of deceased was made conditional by her upon her death under an operation she was about to have performed when they were written; that her death did not occur therefrom, and hence said letters never became effective as the will of deceased. Contestant also prayed that in the event of probate of said letters as the will of deceased, he, as surviving husband of deceased, be appointed administrator with the will annexed.

At the trial the court determined that the letters were of a testamentary character, admitted them to probate as the last will of deceased, and appointed the petitioner, the brother of deceased, administrator with the will annexed. The contestant husband appeals from the order.

As to the points made by appellant for reversal: It is claimed, first, that the letters of deceased offered for probate were not testamentary in character. The letters were entirely written, dated, and signed by the deceased and sent to the parties to whom they were addressed. The evidence indicates, and the letters themselves state, that the deceased had been suffering for upwards of 15 or 20 years from a malignant disease, and had reached that condition of physical disability where the only hope held out to her for relief was through an operation which she had consented to undergo. It was the day before her departure for the hospital for that purpose that the three letters were written. She stated therein her intention of going to the hospital; that she had been very sick and felt that the only way to regain her health was through an operation; that, while everything might turn out in her favor, she felt that her condition was more serious than the doctor thought; and that she had reason to believe she might not live through it. She then proceeded to declare what she wished done respecting her funeral. She specified the cemetery and lot in which she wished to be buried, the kind of headstone she wanted, and the inscription to be placed on it, and named the minister she wished to perform her funeral service. Standing alone, these matters would probably evidence only a desire as to the disposition of her body after her death. But, in addition, she then proceeded to make a disposition of her property. She declared that she wanted Pansy to have all her jewelry except a diamond ring. She wanted the proceeds of a mortgage to be collected by her business agent, to whom one of the letters is written, and such proceeds to be turned over to her brother James W. Higgins, together with the balance due "on the Neffs payments." She directs further that all her clothing be sent to Alice. In one of the letters she declared that "after all expenses is paid if there is anything left I want it equally divided with my father, Mr. H. Higgins, * * * my brother Mr. J. H. Higgins, * * * my brother Mr. C. W. Higgins, * * * my brother J. W. Higgins, * * * my sister Mrs. Alice Grey, or Love-ly." It is the claim of appellant that this last clause in the will had relation only to a disposition of the proceeds of a diamond ring which she directed to be sold, and that even this disposition found in one letter is inconsistent with her declaration in another letter that her sister Emma is to have the ring, hence creating an uncertainty as to whom the ring or its proceeds is given. Respondent appears to assert that the quoted clause constituted a residuary devise of the estate of the deceased. But this court will not, nor did the trial court undertake to, construe the will of deceased manifested by her several letters.

[1, 2] The only question before the superior court on a petition for the probate of one or several writings claimed to constitute a will is: Does it or they constitute the will of the deceased; is a testamentary disposition of property intended and disclosed by the writings? The court is limited solely to that inquiry. In determining whether an instrument proffered for probate is or is not a will, the court cannot ordinarily enter into any consideration of the construction of the will, resolve inconsistencies in the disposition of property, or construe the provisions of the instrument. These are matters which may properly arise only after the probate of the will. Estate of Cobb, 49 Cal. 599; Estate of Murphy, 104 Cal. 554, 38 Pac. 543. As to the ring, certain it is that by the letters she intended, in connection with the other dispositions we have referred to, to give it or its proceeds to some one named in them, and for the purpose of determining whether or not the letters amount to a testamentary disposition of it that fact need only be considered. We are satisfied from the circumstances under which deceased wrote these letters, and the language used by her in them that they were written animo testandi, and the trial court properly determined they constituted the last will and testament of the deceased unless the further claim made by appellant against their testamentary effect is meritorious.

[3] This claim of appellant is that the deceased made it a condition precedent to these letters becoming effective as her will that she should die as the result of the operation which was to be performed; that she did not die therefrom, but recovered, and died from an entirely new and different disease; that hence the letters never became effective as her will. As to this claim appellant contends that it is supported by evidence of the nature of the operation performed and its results, taken in connection with language employed by the deceased in her letters. In the letters the deceased uses the expressions, "If I should die from the operation," and "In case I do not live through the operation," and "I have reason to believe I will not live through it," and the instructions are to be carried out "only in case I do not live," and "I want you to see it is done in case of my death only."

As to the operation: The deceased went to the hospital on April 26, 1915, and the next day an operation was performed on her. When she was taken to the hospital she was in a weak and debilitated condition. She did not at all improve after the operation; she never recovered her strength, but grew gradually weaker. After remaining three weeks in the hospital, she was taken home, where she still continued to fail, and a week afterwards, on May 26, 1915, she died, just a month after the operation was performed. An autopsy disclosed that she died of gastric ulcers, a disease from which she had suffered for some 20 years. It appears that she was never informed, nor did she know, the nature of this disease from which she so long suffered. All she knew was that it had so far afflicted her that the only relief she could hope for was through an operation of some kind which she went to the hospital to have performed. The evidence does not disclose whether she had ever been previous to that time the patient of the physician who performed the operation on her. This operating physician, however, diagnosed her case as involving a diseased condition of other organs of the body than her stomach, and operated on her for those troubles which he said he found existed. This operation, as far as it went, was successfully performed, but it was not an operation for the principal and fatal disease from which the patient was suffering and from which she shortly thereafter died. It was in evidence that in the advanced stage of her stomach disease at the time she went to the hospital no operation could have been performed which would have relieved her condition, and that she would have died from her disease of the stomach about the time probably that she did even if she had not undergone the operation which was performed. While it is claimed by appellant that the language in the letters themselves show that they were only to become testamentary should she die under, or as a result of, the operation itself, we cannot agree with him that such is the reasonable and fair construction to be given to the various expressions used in them. The purpose of her going to the hospital was to be relieved of her wasting disease through an operation. There is nothing to show she knew anything of the kind or extent of the operation to be performed. As we have said, she did not even know the nature of her disease. All she knew was that her disease, whatever it was, had finally reached that stage where an operation was essential to prolong her life. She, of course, did not believe that the proposed operation would be so unsuccessfully performed that she would die under its effects. She doubtless had confidence in the competency of the physician to perform the operation, and an assurance that it would be successfully performed, which she believed; or she would not have consented to have undergone it. What she undoubtedly had in mind in referring to the operation in the various expressions used by her was the possibility of dying from the disease which the operation was intended to relieve, and not from the effects, or as a result of, the operation itself. Her doubt was whether the operation would be effective to cure her. This is fairly disclosed in one of the letters where, after speaking of the contemplated operation, she says:

"Everything may turn out in my favor, but something tells me that it is more serious than the doctor thinks."

This evidently refers to her disease, and the improbability, on account of her long suffering and debilitated condition, and the stage that the disease had reached, of her recovering from her malady even through an operation.

Nor is there any merit in the claim of appellant that the deceased died from a wholly new and different disease than the one she was operated on for. The most that can be said is that the operation which was performed did not reach the real disease with which she was afflicted. But she did not die from any new or different disease than the malignant one from which she was gradually dying when she went to the hospital to have an operation performed for her relief, and from which she did die, notwithstanding an operation. It is of no consequence what the diagnosis of her case by the operating physician was, or what the disease was for which he operated on her. An operation was intended to relieve her, as far as an operation could, from any and all disease from which she was suffering which was the reason she submitted to it and he performed it. He undoubtedly thought that the operation he performed would be effectual for that purpose, and the deceased, no doubt, believed that it was intended to and might accomplish that result. The operation, however, did not relieve her from the fatal disease with which she was afflicted; she did not recover from it as a result of the operation, but died directly from it. This was the event or condition she had in mind, the happening of which was to make the letters effectual as her last will—a failure to recover from her disease under an operation, and her death from the disease notwithstanding it—a condition which the trial court found to have occurred, and which we are satisfied may not be disturbed.

[4] Appellant complains of the action of the court in sustaining a demurrer to a portion of his answer and contest in which he presented the issue as to whether the deceased died from the effects of the operation, or had entirely recovered therefrom and died from the effects of a wholly different disease. This point is based on a construction placed by counsel for appellant on the language in the order sustaining the demurrer of respondent in part, and overruling it in part. But this is a matter we need not consider, because the appellant was not injured whatever the effect of the ruling was, as on the hearing he was informed by the court that the demurrer as sustained did not affect that issue, and that he was entitled to present his evidence on it, which he did as fully as he desired and without limitation, and the court found upon the issue against him. The evidence so presented on this issue is that which we have just finished discussing.

[5] The last claim of appellant is that the court—no executor being nominated in any of the letters constituting a will—should, on admitting the will to probate, have granted letters of administration with the will annexed to him as the surviving husband of the testatrix. But this point is not well taken. Section 1365 of the Code of Civil Procedure, applied to section 1350a thereof, governs in the matter of granting letters of administration with the will annexed to the same extent as it governs the granting of letters of administration in cases of intestacy, and in both cases, under the terms of said section 1365, those only are entitled to letters who in case of intestacy are entitled to succeed to the personal estate of the deceased or some portion thereof, and who in case of testacy take by bequest some portion of that personal estate. The brother of the deceased who was appointed administrator with the will annexed filled the requirement of the statute. The contestant did not. The brother was a beneficiary under the will, and entitled thereunder to take a portion of the personal estate of the deceased. The contestant husband took nothing at all under the will, and hence, under the section cited, was not entitled to letters. Further discussion of this claim of appellant is unnecessary as the decision in the Estate of Crites, 155 Cal. 392, 101 Pac. 316, disposes of it adversely to his contention, and in harmony with the ruling of the trial court.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

In re FINCH'S ESTATE. (L. A. 4454.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 13, 1916.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS $\S$ 181 — ADMINISTRATION — ALLOWANCES FOR SUPPORT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1465, 1466, declaring that on return of the inventory, or at any other time during administration, the court may set apart, for the use of the surviving husband or wife, all property exempt from execution, and that, if the property set apart is insufficient for the support of the widow and children, the court must take such reasonable allowance out of the estate as shall be necessary for the maintenance of the family during the progress of the settlement of the estate, a surviving widow is entitled to have a reasonable allowance made by the court for her support from the estate of her deceased husband, whether it be community property or separate estate, and irrespective of whether she has an estate of her own out of which she might support herself.

2. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS $\S$ 176 — ADMINISTRATION — ALLOWANCES FOR SUPPORT.

Though a husband and wife entered into an agreement that the rents, issues, and profits of their separate property should be considered as community property, but that the separate property should not lose its identity as such, the wife is on the death of her husband entitled under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1465, 1466, to a reasonable allowance for support and maintenance out of the husband's separate property; the agreement not operating as a waiver of any of the rights of the wife in her husband's estate.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Allen Finch, deceased. From an order granting to the widow a family allowance, the objecting devisee appeals. Affirmed.

B. A. Finch, of Los Angeles, in pro. per. Purington & Adair, of Riverside, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. Deceased died testate in Los Angeles leaving an estate consisting of separate property of the value of $15,000. He left a widow but no children, and by his will gave one-half of his estate to his widow, the other one-half to his father and four brothers. The widow petitioned for a family allowance, to the granting of which objections were interposed by one of the brothers, a devisee under the will. The court granted the widow an allowance of $75 a month, and the objecting devisee appeals.

[1, 2] The claim of the appellant is that, by reason of a contract entered into between the widow and the deceased at the time of their marriage, the widow was precluded from making any claim against the estate of deceased for a family allowance. The contract relied on by appellant is as follows:

"Los Angeles, Cal., Mar. 11, 1913.

"In conformance with an understanding had contemporaneous with our contract of marriage, and in consideration of mutual love and affection said understanding is hereby reduced to writing acknowledged and recorded and agreed to by and between Allen Finch and Mary L. Finch, formerly Mary L. Vogel, both of Los Angeles, Cal., that all the rents, issues and profits of our separate property shall be considered as community property but our separate property as a whole shall not lose its identity as such.

"Allen Finch.

"Mary L. Finch."

It was conceded on the hearing herein that the spouses lived happily together during their marriage; that when the contract was made between them, and during their marriage, they were each the owners of income-bearing property which was managed entirely by the husband, and the income therefrom devoted to the family expenses and their joint use; that during such marriage, and at the death of deceased, the widow owned separate estate of the value of $25,000, producing, when the application for a family allowance was made, an income of at least $100 a month.

The contention of appellant is that by reason of this contract between them the widow was precluded from making any claim for a family allowance against the separate estate of her husband. His argument is that by the contract the respondent here relieved her husband from supporting her as long as the income from her separate estate, which was to be treated as community funds, was sufficient for that purpose, a condition which existed up to the time of the death of deceased and which still exists, as the income from her separate estate is more than sufficient for her support. Hence it is claimed that, having relieved him by contract from supporting her during her lifetime, his separate estate is relieved from any claim for such support after his death. As supporting his contention, appellant relies on such cases as Estate of Noah, 73 Cal. 583, 15 Pac. 287, 2 Am. St. Rep. 829, and Estate of Yoell, 164 Cal. 540, 129 Pac. 999. But a little consideration will show that the principle of these cases cited is entirely inapplicable here. They were cases where the application of the widow to the court for a family allowance from the estate of her deceased husband was denied—in the Noah Case because the wife had by an agreement of separation from her husband expressly relinquished "all her marital claims," and was further living apart from her husband at his death, and in the Yoell Case because the wife had also by an agreement of separation with her husband renounced and waived all claim she might then have against his property, and also as his heir or surviving wife. It is only as surviving wife that a demand for family allowance against the estate of her deceased husband can be made under the statute (sections 1465 and 1466, Code of Civil Procedure), and in each of the cited cases the widow had by a solemn agreement with her husband expressly relinquished and renounced the right to make such demand against his estate on his death. But the agreement under consideration here is not at all of the character involved in those cases. Here the wife did not release her husband from either his primary obligation to support her in his lifetime, or renounce any claim which as surviving wife she might have against his estate upon his death. The contract recognized such primary obligation on the part of the husband by devoting the income of his property to their mutual support. She devoted her income to the same purposes. The contract, however, constituted an arrangement prompted, as stated, by a feeling of mutual affection whereby, while the matrimonial relation existed, the income of the separate estate of each should be devoted to the support of the community. It was necessarily terminated on the death of either of the spouses, as no community would then exist to which it could have any relation. The spouses had a perfect right to contract with reference to their property during the continuance of the marital relation, and this is all they did. The wife did not contract away any right which she might be entitled to as the surviving wife or widow of her deceased husband in his estate. Her right to an allowance as such is, as we have stated, founded on the statute (sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, supra), and does not accrue to the widow until the death of her husband. Under these sections the surviving wife is then given the right to have a reasonable allowance made by the court for her support from the estate of her deceased husband whether the estate was community property or his separate estate and irrespective of whether the widow has estate of her own out of which she might support herself (Estate of Bump, 152 Cal. 274, 92 Pac. 643; Estate of Cowell, 164 Cal. 636, 130 Pac. 209), and, as the contract relied on by appellant was in no respect a relinquishment of this right, the superior court properly ignored it and awarded her a family allowance.

Appellant complains that the court failed to make special findings of fact which he requested. But he was in no way prejudiced thereby. No material issue was raised by his objection to a family allowance based solely upon this contract between the spouses which was all he relied on. A special finding respecting it would have been of no benefit to him had it been made; hence a failure to make it could not have prejudiced him.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

SCHADER v. WHITE.

WHITE v. SCHADER et al.

(L. A. 3802.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 11, 1916.
Rehearing Denied Nov. 9, 1916.)

1. PLEADING 93(2)—SEPARATE DEFENSES—PLEADING IN SEPARATE COUNTS.

In ejectment, defendant had the right to plead in separate counts: First, that a contract of sale to him was executed by plaintiff's husband under written authority from plaintiff, second, on a parol contract with plaintiff and a sufficient execution thereof to satisfy the statute of frauds; and, third, that the property was owned by plaintiff's husband and was community property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 189; Dec. Dig. ☞93(2).]

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE ☞138(9)—AGENCY FOR WIFE—EXCEEDING POWER OF ATTORNEY—RATIFICATION.

Where a power of attorney authorized a husband to execute contracts and deeds in the name of his wife, and he executed, in his own name, a contract to exchange her land, the formal execution of the deed itself by the wife with full and complete knowledge of the transaction was an acceptance and ratification of the executory contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 535; Dec. Dig. ☞138(9).]

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ☞32(3)—MUTUALITY OF OBLIGATION.

The fact that a wife, whose husband contracted to exchange her land, could sue or be sued on the contract as undisclosed principal, though she had not herself signed her husband's contract, was sufficient to give the contract the mutuality of obligation essential to entitle the other party to specific performance against the wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 92-98; Dec. Dig. ☞32(3).]

4. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ☞49(2) — "ADEQUACY OF PRICE."

In relation to specific performance of a contract to sell land, "adequacy of price" does not mean equality of price, and an adequate consideration does not mean a consideration measuring to the fullest extent up to the value of the property, each case resting for determination on its own facts, and equity finding adequacy or inadequacy after considering all the circumstances in each case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 141-151; Dec. Dig. ☞49(2).]

5. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE ☞49(2) — INADEQUACY OF CONSIDERATION.

Where a purchaser of land contracted to give the value of but $11,500 for the property, which was worth, above mortgage for $7,500, $12,500, the figures being reached by resolving a mass of conflicting evidence touching values, there was no inadequacy of consideration justifying refusal of specific performance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 141-151; Dec. Dig. ☞49(2).]

6. EXCHANGE OF PROPERTY ☞8(4) — RIGHTS AND LIABILITIES OF PARTIES—FRAUD—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a wife's action in ejectment, wherein defendant sought specific performance of a contract, made by her husband, to exchange her land for defendant's, evidence held insufficient to show fraudulent misrepresentations by defendant concerning the value of his property.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by Nellie M. Schader against A. Stanley White, wherein White filed a cross-complaint against plaintiff and Carl F. Schader. From a decree for defendant, and an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiff and cross-defendants appeal. Judgment and order affirmed.

Tanner, Odell, Odell & Taft, and S. W. Odell, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Oscar C. Mueller, Hartley Shaw, and Frank Stewart, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. [1] Plaintiff brought her action in ejectment, charging in two counts. In the first she averred ownership of property consisting of land and a dwelling house thereon in the city of Santa Monica, which property, for convenience, will be spoken of as the Santa Monica property, and alleged an ouster by defendant on December 3, 1911. By her second count she fixed the time of the ouster as June 8, 1912. In both her damage is declared to be $30,000 and the rental value $500 per month. Defendant answered by denial and by cross-complaint. In his pleadings he set up in different forms and counts the following facts: That he, defendant, had entered into a written agreement with Carl F. Schader, husband of plaintiff, for the sale and exchange of property in Seattle belonging to himself, for the Santa Monica property. The terms of this sale or exchange were the payment by defendant to plaintiff of a certain sum of money, the assumption by each party of the mortgage existing upon the property of the other, and the transfer of a good and sufficient title respectively upon these terms. He alleged that the necessary papers for the consummation of this transaction were placed in escrow, he, the defendant, being given a reasonable time within which to present a certificate of title showing good title in himself to the Seattle property; that his agreement called upon him to pay in cash to Carl F. Schader $4,500, which he did, Carl F. Schader and wife then depositing in escrow their deed of grant to the Santa Monica property, awaiting a like deed from defendant of his Seattle property. Owing to the failure of the Title Company of Seattle to send a sufficient certificate of title, some little delay followed before defendant was able to secure this certificate and make his deed. But this delay was fully concurred in and assented to by the Schaders. On the 27th day of December, 1911, he delivered to the Ocean Park Bank, the escrowee, a warranty deed of himself and wife to the Seattle property, in which deed plaintiff Nellie M. Schader was named as grantee. On the 20th day of March, 1912, the Schaders, without authority or right, withdrew from the Ocean Park Bank their deed and certificate of title which they had previously placed there. The prices upon which the properties were to be exchanged were fair and adequate, and the agreement equitable and just. Demand had been made upon the Schaders to perform their contract, but they had refused to do so. Such, in substance, are the allegations of the cross-complaint. In the first count it is charged that the contract was executed by Carl F. Schader under written authority previously conferred upon him, and that the agreement, although executed in the name of Schader, was intended and understood to be the agreement of Mrs. Schader, the owner of the property. The second count charges upon a parol contract with Mrs. Schader and a sufficient execution thereof to lift the ban of the statute of frauds. The third count alleged ownership of the property to be in the husband and the property to be community property. The defendant had the unquestioned right thus to plead in separate counts, and the explanation that these pleadings were thus framed so as to meet any elusive defense which the Schaders might interpose is quite reasonable. The Schaders answered separately. Carl Schader denied that he entered into the contract as the agent of his wife, averred mutual mistake and error in a minor term of the contract, and asked the court to reform it in that particular; this minor term going merely to the payment of the taxes for the current year. He then set up an oral contract between himself and his wife, by which he was to pay her $25,000 for the property. He admits the receipt of the money, does not offer to restore it, and declares his election to rescind because of false and fraudulent representations made to him concerning the Seattle property. He asserts a great difference in the value of the two properties, and that the contract is therefore inequitable. Finally he declares that the ownership of the property is in Mrs. Schader, that she refuses to make the conveyance to the cross-complainant, and that he is unable to do so, and that he has become obliged to pay her for the use of her premises. Mrs. Schader's answer is to the same effect, asserting ownership in herself, denying all participation in the contract, and charging fraud. The court in equity decreed specific performance in favor of the defendant, and this appeal has followed.

To fill out the skeleton of the facts above given, it was shown by the evidence that the negotiations were conducted between Stanley White and Carl Schader; the executory contract was signed by Carl Schader and not by Nellie Schader, and the $4,500 paid to and received by Carl Schader. Before the money was paid, however, and the contract executed negotiations were had in the presence of Mrs. Schader. White visited the house. There were discussions over the price, over what personal property within the house should go to the purchaser, and, finally, when these matters were agreed to and embraced in the executory contract, Mrs. Schader joined with her husband in executing the deed, which they placed in escrow with the certificate of title to their Santa Monica property.

[2] Appellants first contend that Carl F. Schader was not the agent of his wife. A very full power of attorney by the wife, authorizing the husband to act for her, had been executed and recorded and was introduced in evidence. Appellants' objection to the force of this power of attorney is that it is "an ancient document which everybody had forgotten." Of course there is no legal substantiality to such an attack. But it may be added that it was not utterly forgotten; that Mrs. Schader testifies that her husband was wont to deal in her real estate; that Mr. White was unaccustomed to these transactions, and that when he suggested to Mr. Schader that Mrs. Schader sign the executory contract and said, "You promised your wife should sign," Schader replied: "My signature is good, all right. I would not render myself liable. In fact I have a power of attorney from Mrs. Schader." This was upon the occasion of the payment of the $4,500. Another objection to the power of attorney was that it is not shown to have been delivered. It is shown, however, to have been recorded at the request of Mr. Tanner, one of appellants' counsel in the case, and no effort is made to deny his authority so to have it recorded.

Finally it is objected that the power of attorney authorizes the agent to execute contracts and deeds in the name of the principal, and that this executory contract was executed by Carl Schader in his own name. But following the executory contract was the formal execution of the deed itself, made by Mrs. Schader. There is and can be no question of her full and complete knowledge of the transaction at the time she so executed, and her deed is itself an acceptance and ratification of the executory contract. Salmon v. Hoffman, 2 Cal. 139, 56 Am. Dec. 322; Love v. Sierra, etc., Co., 32 Cal. 639, 91 Am. Dec. 602; Cannon v. Handley, 72 Cal. 133, 13 Pac. 315; Puget Sound Lumber Co. v. Krug, 89 Cal. 237, 26 Pac. 902; Ralphs v. Hensler, 97 Cal. 302, 32 Pac. 243; Bergtholdt v. Porter Bros. Co., 114 Cal. 689, 46 Pac. 738; S. P. Ry. Co. v. Von-Schmidt Co., 118 Cal. 371, 50 Pac. 650.

[3] Appellants' second objection is that of lack of mutuality in the contract, herein arguing that because Mrs. Schader had not herself signed the executory contract, she could not have compelled specific performance, and therefore it was inequitable to decree specific performance against her. But it is sufficient, in addition to what has been said herein, to add that as an undisclosed principal she could sue or be sued. Eldridge v. Mowry, 24 Cal. App. 183, 140 Pac. 978; Walton v. Davis, 22 Cal. App. 456, 134 Pac. 795; Ford v. Williams, 62 U. S. (21 How.) 287, 16 L. Ed. 36; Pomeroy, Spec. Per. (2d Ed.) § 89; 31 Cyc. 1416.

[4, 5] The third and fourth propositions advanced by appellants may be considered together. They are that the respondent misrepresented the value of his property, and that the Schaders were not, therefore, to receive an adequate consideration for their own property. Touching the adequacy of consideration, the court found the value of the Santa Monica property to be $20,000, upon which was a mortgage of $7,500, reducing its actual value to the purchaser assuming the mortgage to $12,500. The value of the Seattle property was found to be $14,000, upon which was a mortgage of $7,000, reducing its value to $7,000. In addition, however, the defendant paid to the Schaders $4,500, which would leave a disparity and difference of $1,000 between the values of the two properties as found and fixed by the court. We have recently had occasion to discuss the question of adequacy of price (O'Hara v. Lynch, 157 Pac. 608), and little need be added to what is there said. Adequacy of price does not mean equality of price. An adequate consideration does not mean a consideration measuring to the fullest extent up to the value of the property. Each case must rest for determination upon its own facts, and equity will find adequacy or inadequacy after considering all of the circumstances appearing in each particular case. Herein, in a transaction involving the exchange of property to the value of $20,000 the disparity is $1,000. This disparity itself is found by the court only as it resolves a mass of conflicting evidence touching values. Moreover, there is the testimony of Schader that in his desire to move away from Santa Monica he would have been indifferent to even a greater discrepancy in the values of the properties. And finally there is the testimony, to which we will shortly advert more in detail, showing a full, complete, and independent investigation made by the Schaders themselves of the value of the Seattle property, which investigation took the form, not only of letters to them from real estate agents in Seattle, but as well the form of a personal inspection of the property and oral inquiries in the city of Seattle regarding its value. In Wilson v. White, 161 Cal. 453, 119 Pac. 895, where there was found a discrepancy in value of $1,000 on a purchase price of $14,000, this court, declaring the rule to which we have adverted, the adequacy or inadequacy is to be determined by a consideration of all the circumstances, said that a mere difference of $1,000 on property worth $15,000 "is perhaps not so large as to warrant a conclusion of inadequacy sufficient to justify a refusal of specific performance." The court then proceeded to show, however, that there were certain equitable circumstances justifying the court's refusal, the essential one being the duty of the vendee under the circumstances of the case to give all information to the vendor, and his concealment of that information, facts wholly wanting in the case at bar.

[6] The contention of the Schaders that they were deceived by the fraudulent misrepresentations of defendant concerning the value of the Seattle property rests upon an even more unsubstantial foundation than the unsustained contentions which we have just been considering. It appears that Schader had a trusted friend in Seattle by the name of Atkinson, with whom he communicated upon the subject-matter. Atkinson replied, saying that the largest real estate house in Seattle said the property might be sold within 60 days for $14,000, "but will make no absolute assurances; market very dull, and triangular lot a little harder to sell than square ones." He followed this with a letter in which he said:

"My advice to you is to let Seattle real estate alone, especially this lot, as it is a little triangle that could not be improved with a building higher than two stories."

Not satisfied with this, Schader sought and obtained from independent sources other views of the value and desirability of the lot. And, finally, in February, 1912, he went to Seattle with his wife, personally inspected the property, inquired of its value, and placed the property with a real estate firm for sale. It remained with that firm for sale on account of the Schaders until July 27, 1912. Upon his return to Santa Monica he never sought a rescission upon the ground of fraud, never declared that he had been deceived during all of the time that defendant remained in possession of the Santa Monica property, until ten months afterward, when he asserts this fraud in his answer to the cross-complaint. The defendant had been put in possession of the house before the departure of the Schaders by the Schaders themselves, and Mrs. Schader, after her visit to the Seattle property, wrote to the maid that she had left at Santa Monica, expressing the hope that she "had cleaned the house to suit the gentleman," meaning the defendant White. No discussion is required upon these facts. It is sufficient to refer to Nounan v. Sutter County, 81 Cal. 1, 22 Pac. 515, 6 L. R. A. 219; Schmidt v. Mesmer, 116 Cal. 270, 48 Pac. 54; Oppenheimer v. Clunie, 142 Cal. 313, 75 Pac. 899; Spinks v. Clark, 147 Cal. 444, 82 Pac. 45; Maxon-Nowlin Co. v. Norswing, 166 Cal. 509, 137 Pac. 240.

That respondent White performed all the covenants and conditions of his contract is not left in doubt. He was to pay $4,500, $500 at one time, $4,000 within a limited time thereafter. He made these payments; Schader received the money, and still retains it. He was to deliver to Schader a warranty deed to the Seattle property. He executed this deed to Mrs. Schader, in whom title to the Santa Monica property was apparently vested, and he did this, as the evidence discloses, under the directions of her husband. He was also to deliver in escrow to the bank a certificate by a responsible guaranty company of Seattle, showing a good title, free from incumbrances, saving the mortgage of $7,000. Upon the doing of these things the evidence discloses that Mr. Schader gave directions to the officials of the bank to examine and pass upon the deed executed to him. They did so examine it, and found no objection to it. Thereafter Schader wrote White that "Everything (in escrow) is in due form." At the time Mr. Schader wrote this letter the deed had been in the bank for two months, and at this moment the only objection urged against the deed is that it is a conveyance to Mrs. Schader instead of to the husband, though the husband pleads that the title is in his wife, and that he cannot induce her to perform the contract which he says he alone entered into. We will not unduly extend this by a discussion of the similar untenable and ultratechnical objections advanced against the sufficiency of the certificate. The evidence fully sustains respondent's position that the delay in obtaining a proper certificate of title was through no neglect of his own, and was fully known and assented to by appellants.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

3. HOMICIDE $\S$ 158(4)—THREATS—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where accused assaulted decedent and a third person, and the third person was wounded by a shot fired by accused at the time decedent was shot by accused, evidence of previous threats made by accused against the third person was admissible under the rule that while threats against decedent are admissible to show malice, threats against another person are only admitted under circumstances showing some connection with the injury inflicted on decedent.

4. WITNESSES $\S$ 269(1) — EXAMINATION — CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Where no statement was made to the court as to the purpose of a question asked a state's witness on cross-examination, and nothing had been elicited to show the pertinency of the question, which called for an isolated matter concerning which nothing had been asked on the direct examination, it was not error to sustain an objection to the question.

5. CRIMINAL LAW $\S$ 1172(6) — EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTIONS.

Where accused denied the killing, and did not justify, excuse, or mitigate it, an instruction that if a homicide by accused was proved to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, then it devolved on him to prove mitigation, justification, or excuse, unless the proof of the prosecution showed that the crime only amounted to manslaughter, or that accused was justifiable or excusable, was not prejudicial, though inapplicable.

6. CRIMINAL LAW $\S$ 552(2) — CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

The jury in case of circumstantial evidence cannot rely on any circumstance as a link in the chain of circumstances establishing to their satisfaction beyond all reasonable doubt the guilt of accused, unless satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt by the proof of the existence of that circumstance, and it is for them to determine what circumstances are essential to satisfy their minds beyond all reasonable doubt of guilt, and thus constitute necessary links in the chain of circumstances.

7. CRIMINAL LAW $\S$ 823(14)—INSTRUCTIONS — MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the court correctly defined circumstantial evidence as testimony of a chain of circumstances pointing sufficiently strong to the commission by accused of the crime charged, and stated that whether the evidence was direct or circumstantial, the final test was whether the whole evidence considered together satisfied the minds of the jurors beyond a reasonable doubt of the truth of the charge, an instruction that it was not necessary that every fact and circumstance given in evidence should be proved beyond a reasonable doubt, but only that every fact and circumstance necessary to the conclusion of guilt should be so established, and that it was for the jury to decide whether any particular fact or circumstance was a necessary link in the chain of evidence, and that if the jury decided that such fact or circumstance was a necessary link, then it must be proved to their satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt, was not objectionable as leaving to the jury the determination of what was necessary to constitute the crime.

8. CRIMINAL LAW $\S$ 798(1)—INSTRUCTIONS — CAUTIONARY INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that if any juror entertained a reasonable doubt of accused's guilt he should vote to acquit and should continue to so vote until convinced to the contrary, and that a juror should not hesitate to change his views when convinced that they are erroneous, is not objectionable as advising the jury that a juror may change his vote from not guilty to guilty in deference to the views of his fellow jurors when not satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt of guilt.

9. HOMICIDE $\S$ 309(6)—GRADE OF OFFENSE—EVIDENCE.

Where, on a trial for murder in the first degree, the undisputed evidence showed that accused, decedent, and a third person were the only persons present at the time of the killing, and that either accused, or the third person, killed decedent, and that accused, when arrested within a few hours of the homicide and charged therewith, did not claim innocence nor intimate that the third person had done the shooting, and there was evidence that accused had threatened the third person who was shot at the time decedent was killed, there was no evidence warranting instructions on manslaughter.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Joseph Vance Wilt was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, and W. T. Belieu, of Willow, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Ben F. Geis, of Willow, for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. Defendant having been indicted for the crime of murder in the unlawful killing of one Warner C. Smith, was convicted of murder in the first degree and adjudged to suffer death. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] 1. It is asserted and most earnestly argued by learned counsel for appellant that a careful consideration of the facts "will convince any fair-minded man that there is at least a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant." The jury by their verdict and the judge of the trial court by his order denying defendant's motion for a new trial have said otherwise. We have given the report of the evidence contained in the record our most careful consideration, as, indeed, we do in every capital case where there is the slightest intimation that there is doubt as to the correctness of the verdict. The result of our examination is that we are not only satisfied that the evidence was such that we cannot say that it did not warrant the jury in being satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the defendant, but also that the record gives us no reason to doubt the correctness of the verdict. Any possible doubt as to the presence of the defendant at the scene of the homicide is removed by his own testimony given at the trial, from which it appears that he, Jansen (the principal witness for the people), and deceased were the only persons present. That either he or Jansen killed deceased when all three were together is one of the admitted facts of the case. His story told on the witness stand practically a month after the event is to the effect that Jansen, after an altercation with deceased, drew a revolver and fired several shots at him, and that deceased fell to the ground and Jansen ran away, leaving him (defendant) alone with the deceased. This testimony on the part of defendant was apparently the first intimation on his part that Jansen was the guilty party. Although arrested on the day and within a few hours of the homicide, and charged with the offense, neither protestation nor claim of innocence, nor any intimation that Jansen did the shooting was forthcoming until he gave his testimony on the trial. All that he appears to have said prior to this in regard to the shooting, so far as we have found, is contained in the report of his recross-examination relative to a conversation between himself and the district attorney a few hours after the homicide, as follows:

"Q. (By district attorney): Then didn't you say, in the presence of Mr. Bailey (the sheriff), after I had made those statements to you, didn't you then say to me, after I said to you that it was not Jansen you killed, that it was Smith, and weren't you surprised and said, 'I thought it was Jansen'? A. I said I was told that it was Jansen, and I turned to Bailey and accused him of saying that. Q. Didn't you say to me, 'I thought it was Jansen who was killed'? A. I didn't say I thought that; no, I turned to Bailey, and I might have said those words, perhaps, but what I meant was I had heard him say it. Everybody was saying it out there. * * * Q. You had heard what? A. That it was Jansen. Q. But, Mr. Wilt, you knew it was Smith, didn't you, that was killed? You knew Jansen killed him; you saw it; you knew all about it. A. Yes; I knew all about it. Q. Then what did you say that for? A. I don't know; I didn't say it with any ulterior motive at all."

Except for the testimony of the defendant, there was no shred of testimony tending in the slightest degree to inculcate Jansen as the perpetrator of this murder, and his testimony was, in view of all the circumstances, of such a nature that, to say the least, it is not surprising that it was rejected by the jury as absolutely unworthy of belief.

The deceased and Jansen were employed in a store in Germantown. Deceased roomed in the home occupied as a residence by Mr. and Mrs. Jansen. Except for the testimony of defendant there was absolutely nothing to indicate that their relations were not of the most friendly nature. Defendant had been the husband of a sister of Jansen, but she had obtained a divorce some years before, and the minor child of the marriage had been for some years and was at the time of the homicide in the custody of the Jansens. Defendant lived in Orland, some miles from Germantown. There certainly had been no great degree of intimacy after the divorce between defendant and the Jansens. Some two years before the homicide there had been some differences between them in relation to defendant visiting the child, and the testimony fairly indicated that defendant had not visited the Jansen house thereafter. There was testimony that about that time he made threats against the Jansens because of this difference. Testimony of Jansen was to the effect that he had seen defendant on very few occasions, and did not know him at all well. According to the testimony of Jansen, he was aroused from his sleep early on the morning of February 14, 1916, about 5:30 o'clock, by the deceased, and on going into the hall found there the deceased and a strange man, some time after declared by him to have been the defendant, whom he did not at once recognize, armed with a revolver. The key of the store having been produced by Jansen, this man marched deceased and Jansen out of the house and to the store, which was opened and entered, and they were then ordered to open the safe. The outer door of the safe was opened, but no key being produced which would open its inner door the attempt of this man to obtain access was abandoned. He marched Jansen and deceased out of the store and down the railroad track away from Germantown for about a mile, and then began firing his revolver at them. Apparently he shot deceased first, killing him. Another shot struck Jansen, inflicting a slight wound, but he, running away, escaped serious injury. He did not at the moment identify in his mind the assailant as Wilt, but a little later, thinking the matter over, became convinced that it was Wilt. The assailant had attempted to disguise himself with a false mustache, and, as already noted, the testimony fairly showed that Jansen had seen very little of Wilt. Such in a general way was Jansen's story, and while it indicated a rather peculiar and at first blush a somewhat incomprehensible course of conduct on Wilt's part, it is not at all an impossible story when considered in the light of all the other circumstances. Confessedly, Wilt did go that night on his bicycle from Orland to Jansen's house in Germantown, leaving his bicycle under a bridge several hundred feet from the house and walking from the bridge to the house. Confessedly, he then carried the 38-caliber Savage automatic revolver which was found on him at the time of his arrest, and it sufficiently appears that deceased was killed by a shot from a weapon of this caliber. Confessedly, he fled from the scene of the homicide, and when captured some hours later steadily refused to say a word in reply to the accusation against him, except as we have already indicated, until he gave his testimony at the trial. Any conclusion that his testimony as to his reason for going from Orland to Jansen's home in Germantown was true was unwarranted in view of what the evidence fairly showed as to the relations existing between him and the Jansens. Certainly no such degree of intimacy between Jansen and Wilt appeared as would make it reasonable to suppose that Jansen might desire the counsel or assistance of Wilt in a matter of such a personal nature as that suggested by him. His testimony as to the letter he claimed to have received from Jansen asking him to come, and its contents (such a letter never being produced), and as to his consequent arrival at Jansen's home between 9 and 10 o'clock the night of February 13th and his conversation with Jansen, and with Jansen and deceased, from that time on until shortly before the homicide, when the three took a walk down the railroad track together, was of such a nature that the jury were fully warranted in rejecting it as false. In addition to its inherent probability it was absolutely opposed to the testimony given by both Mr. and Mrs. Jansen as to the whereabouts of Jansen during the night of February 13th. We have stated this much for the purpose of showing our reasons for the conclusion that the record is not such as to raise in our minds any doubt as to the correctness of the verdict.

[2, 3] 2. Mrs. Masterson, at whose house defendant boarded for a time in January, 1914, and Mrs. Peterich, her daughter, testified as to certain threats then made by him against Jansen. Mrs. Masterson testified substantially that he went out one evening with the avowed purpose of seeing his baby, was away about 30 minutes, and came back pale and angry, and said:

"Well, it is certainly rough; they have even turned my own baby against me;" and "now to-night they wouldn't even allow me in the house. I tell you right here, I will get my revenge on that bunch. I will kill that Swandt woman and Jansen. I will get my babies."

Mrs. Peterich said substantially that on this occasion defendant said they had refused to let him see his baby, and that he would get Jansen and the Swandt woman, that he would kill them, and that about two months later he repeated this threat. Complaint is made that this evidence was improperly admitted, the objection made to Mrs. Masterson's evidence being, according to the record, that it was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial," and no objection apparently having been made to Mrs. Peterich's testimony which was given after Mrs. Masterson had testified. It is earnestly urged that the admission of this evidence was prejudicial error. We are satisfied that as to the claim that the making of these threats was too remote the objection is one that goes to the weight rather than to the admissibility of the evidence.

As to the claim that the evidence was not admissible because the threats were not against the deceased, it is unnecessary to discuss the many authorities cited by learned counsel for appellant, in view of the admission by them that a terse and clear statement of the rule applicable is contained in our own case of People v. Bezy, 67 Cal. 223, 7 Pac. 643, where it is said:

"While threats against the deceased are admissible in evidence to show malice, threats against another person are only admitted under circumstances which show some connection with the injury inflicted on the deceased." (The italics are ours.)

Where a sufficient connection is shown such threats are clearly admissible. The evidence of Jansen was to the effect that while Smith alone was killed the assault was not upon Smith alone, but upon himself and Smith, and, according to his testimony, he was wounded by another shot from defendant's pistol. Where A. fires shots at B. and C., who are together, killing B. and wounding C., who nevertheless makes his escape, there being nothing except the mere fact that B. was first hit to indicate that the assault was specially directed against him, there would appear to be such a connection between the killing of B. and previous threats of A. against C. as to warrant evidence thereof. Such threats would tend to show a designed assault on the part of A., the primary object of which was the killing of C., and in fact including B. simply because he was with C. If the evidence was that A. only the day before the homicide had threatened to kill C. on sight, and B. (whom A. had never before seen) and C. while walking together were fired upon by A., with the result that B. was killed and C. wounded, we think no one would question the existence of the connection essential to the admissibility of the evidence as to the threat. There is no difference in principle between such a case and the one before us, so far as the question we are discussing is concerned. We are aware of no decision declaring such evidence inadmissible. There was nothing to indicate that prior to going to Jansen's house during the night preceding the shooting, defendant knew anything about deceased or even that there was any man living in Jansen's home other than Jansen himself, or that at any time prior to the homicide he ever had any difference whatever with deceased. We are satisfied that in view of all the circumstances the evidence of threats against Jansen on the part of defendant was properly admitted. As we have said the remoteness of the threats was a matter going solely to the weight of the evidence.

[4] 3. Error is alleged in sustaining an objection to a question asked Jansen on cross-examination, as follows:

"How long after the shooting did you go down and have a chat with Mr. Smith, the uncle of this boy, about this tragedy?"

The objection was substantially that the same was not proper cross-examination. No statement was made to the court as to the purpose of the question, and apparently nothing had been elicited up to that time to show the pertinency of any such inquiry. It was apparently an isolated and immaterial matter concerning which nothing had been asked Jansen on direct examination, and up to this time it had not been intimated that there was any claim that Jansen himself was the guilty party. We see no good ground for holding that the court erred in sustaining the objection. It is proper to note that it was subsequently fully shown by the testimony of Benjamin Smith, the uncle, that on March 12, 1916, Jansen did come to his house in Maxwell to talk with him about the homicide, in pursuance of a request on his (Jansen's) part that he be permitted to see him made two or three days before.

[5] 4. The defendant denied the killing, and there was no attempt to justify, excuse, or mitigate it. The court instructed the jury as follows:

"Upon a trial for murder if the commission of the homicide by the defendant is proved to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, then it devolves upon the defendant to prove circumstances of mitigation or that justify or excuse the act, unless the proof on the part of the prosecution tends to show that the crime only amounts to manslaughter, or that the defendant was justifiable or excusable. This does not mean that he must prove such circumstances by a preponderance of the evidence. He is only bound under this rule to produce such evidence as will create in your minds a reasonable doubt as to whether there were circumstances of mitigation, or that justify or excuse the act."

In so instructing the jury the court was giving a rule declared by section 1105 of the Penal Code. It is claimed that it is error to give such an instruction where the killing is denied. It may be conceded that the instruction was inapplicable; no circumstances of mitigation, excuse, or justification being suggested. See People v. Tapia, 131 Cal. 647, 654, 63 Pac. 1001; People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 592, 91 Pac. 515. But, as said in People v. Tapia, supra:

"Of course, a judgment will not be reversed for an instruction containing a mere abstract principle because it is not applicable to the case, where it appears that no injury was done."

In that case an instruction on this subject, where the killing was denied and the evidence to show that the death of the deceased was due to criminal means used by another person, and not by his own act or accident was said to be "very slight," was held prejudicially erroneous, on the ground that the jury may readily have understood the language "upon a trial for murder, the commission of the homicide by the defendant being proved" as intimating an opinion or belief or statement on the part of the trial judge that the homicide had been proved. Ordinarily this language could not fairly be held to have any such signification. See People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 596, 91 Pac. 515. But in the case at bar the language of the instruction was "upon a trial for murder, if the commission of the homicide by the defendant is proved to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt, then," etc., which entirely obviates the objection suggested in People v. Tapia, supra. We can see no possible prejudice to defendant in the giving of this instruction.

[6, 7] 5. We can see no reason for concluding that the jury may have been misled by certain instructions given in regard to circumstantial evidence. Some criticism is made to an instruction declaring:

"It is not necessary that every fact and circumstance given in evidence should be proven beyond a reasonable doubt, but only that every fact and circumstance necessary to the conclusion of guilt should be so established. * * * It is for you to decide whether or not any particular fact or circumstance is a necessary link in the chain of evidence; and if you decide that such fact or circumstance is a necessary link, then it must be proven to your satisfaction, beyond a reasonable doubt."

The latter part of this instruction, concerning which the principal complaint is made, is exactly in accord with what is said in People v. Ah Jake, 91 Cal. 98, 27 Pac. 595, and as applied to the subject under discussion is unquestionably correct. The learned trial judge had correctly defined circumstantial evidence as testimony "of a chain of circumstances pointing sufficiently strong to the commission of the crime by the defendant," and had further told the jury that whether the evidence was direct or circumstantial, "the final test is the same, to wit: Does the whole evidence, considered together, satisfy the minds of the jurors beyond a reasonable doubt of the truth of the charge?" The language attacked simply told the jury substantially that it was for them to decide whether any particular circumstances concerning which testimony had been given was necessary to complete a chain of circumstances establishing to their satisfaction beyond all reasonable doubt the facts essential to guilt, and that if they decided that it was necessary, it must be proven beyond all reasonable doubt before they could act upon it. In other words, they could not rely upon any circumstance as a link in the chain of circumstances establishing to their satisfaction beyond all reasonable doubt the guilt of the defendant, unless satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt by the proof of the existence of that circumstance; but that it was for them to determine what circumstances were essential to satisfy their minds beyond all reasonable doubt of such guilt, and thus constitute necessary links of such chain. This we think must be correct, and we do not understand that any different rule is declared in any California case. It is certainly in accord with what is said in People v. Ah Jake, supra. We do not think the instruction can fairly be construed, as claimed by appellant, as leaving "to the jury the determination of what was necessary to constitute the crime." It had reference to an entirely different subject-matter, viz. the matter of proof of the facts essential to guilt by circumstantial evidence. As to the facts essential to guilt of murder and the various degrees thereof, the jury were fully and correctly instructed, and they were clearly instructed that they could not convict the defendant of murder in either degree, unless satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt of all the facts essential to such a conviction. We do not think it can fairly be assumed that there may have been any misunderstanding as to this. We see no good ground for criticism as to the first portion of the instruction.

[8] 6. In our opinion the instruction as to the duty of the jurors in the matter of consulting and agreeing upon a verdict cannot fairly be construed as advising them that a juror may properly change his vote from not guilty to guilty in deference to the views of fellow jurors, when not satisfied beyond all reasonable doubt of such guilt. They were expressly told thereby that if any juror entertained a reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt he should vote to acquit, and should continue to so vote "until convinced" to the contrary. The word "convinced," as here used, and as used in the last sentence of the instruction, "A juror should not hesitate to change his views or opinions of the case when convinced that they are erroneous," clearly means "convinced beyond all reasonable doubt," and could not fairly be otherwise understood by the jurors.

[9] 7. The evidence was not such as to warrant instructions on manslaughter or the submission to the jury of a "manslaughter verdict." What we have said disposes of all the points made in the briefs. We have fully examined the record, and find no other matters requiring notice.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Frank Spivok against the Independent Sash & Door Company. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Patterson Sprigg, of San Diego, for appellant. Luce & Luce, of San Diego, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff recovered judgment following the verdict of a jury for injuries sustained under the following circumstances: He was a carpenter, in the employ of the defendant. There was a scaffold called a "canopy" used in connection with the work. This canopy was a platform attached to the building and about 14 feet above the ground level. The canopy was used in connection with the wooden forms employed to hold the concrete in the construction of the building. The floor of the canopy could be reached by a stairway inside of the building leading to an upper floor; the canopy floor being 4 or 5 feet lower than the floor of the structure. There were ladders, however, which could be used for the descent, or a workman could jump or swing himself down. Instead, however, the workmen, for their own convenience, seemed to have adopted another method of reaching the canopy. This was by a stepladder 9 or 10 feet long, which reached a "transom bar" 3 or 4 feet below the canopy floor. The workmen stepped from the ladder to the transom bar, and, standing on the transom bar, climbed onto the platform, which was about 3 feet higher than the transom bar. This climb was of course not difficult for any man and not unusual for one in the employment of a carpenter. Plaintiff had used this method of access to the canopy. Indeed, he had been at work upon the canopy for a day or two previous to his accident. Upon the canopy, and, indeed, this was one of the purposes of its use, were the forms for the concrete work, which were there piled up. The plaintiff upon the occasion of the accident had climbed the ladder, stood upon the transom bar, put one knee upon the canopy floor and seized (doubtless by inadvertence) one of these forms in the effort to pull himself onto the platform. The form, of course, being loose, gave way and he was precipitated to the floor beneath, sustaining injury to his ankle.

The complaint charged a negligent construction of the scaffold because of which "the floor fell apart from said scaffold when grasped by the plaintiff." But all the evidence, including that of the plaintiff, discredits and disproves this charge; plaintiff himself and all of his witnesses testifying that the scaffold was properly constructed and was and remained perfectly firm. The second charge of negligence against the defendant avers:

That the defendant "furnished to the said plaintiff as a means of climbing upon said scaffolding a stepladder of such a defective and improper length, size, and construction as to compel him to reach from the top of said ladder a considerable distance to the floor of said scaffold in an effort to climb upon said scaffold, and the said defective and improper stepladder, together with the said above-mentioned unsafe, defective, and dangerous scaffold, caused the said plaintiff to fall to the ground."

It has been said that the scaffold was neither defective nor dangerous. It has been shown, and indeed must be conceded, that plaintiff did not meet with any injury because the ladder was defective. Indeed, at the time of his injury he had left the ladder and was standing securely on the transom beam. It cannot successfully be contended that there was any hazard worthy of the name in a climb from the transom beam to the canopy floor. It is manifest that the proximate cause of the injury was the negligence of the plaintiff in grasping the loose form, which doubtless he thought was a fixed stanchion on the canopy. He was familiar with the work, with the place of labor, with the condition of the canopy platform, and from a better and safer means of approach to his work he himself deliberately selected this particular one. He could have gone up the stairway, as other of the workmen did, but he did not do so.

[1, 2] An absolutely safe place of labor is not, of course, required of an employer. It is to be reasonably safe, having regard to the character of the work itself. Carpenters walk freely and unhesitatingly, and expect to walk, over floor joists before the floor is laid. One would not expect to see a cause of action for injuries occasioned by an inadvertent slip of a carpenter walking over such floor joists, predicated upon the fact that the employer had not caused the floor to be laid so as to make the place of labor safe. So in this case it was not because the ladder was short that the plaintiff was injured. His cause of action might as well have been founded upon the fact that the defendant furnished him no elevator nor inclined plane to reach his work. Adequate appliances and methods were at hand. If the employes, for their own convenience, refuse to use them and adopt methods involving a needless risk, the employer is not liable. Brymer v. Southern Pacific Ry. Co., 90 Cal. 496, 27 Pac. 371; Thompson v. C. C. Construction Co., 148 Cal. 35, 82 Pac. 367.

[3] The conclusion is unescapable that the employer in this case was without fault, and that the injury occurred solely through the negligence of the employé. The case therefore does not come within the provisions of the Roseberry Act. Stats. 1911, c. 399, p. 796. The foundation of the rights under the Roseberry Act was the "want of ordinary or reasonable care of the employer." When the existence of this fact was proven, then the employer was not entitled to avail himself of the plea of contributory negligence of his employé, nor the latter's assumed risk of the hazard complained of; nor yet of the want of reasonable care of a fellow servant. But in the case at bar no want of ordinary or reasonable care upon the part of the employer is shown.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore reversed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by Dora Mellor against the Bank of Willows and another, wherein John Mellor and others intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order overruling motion for new trial, interveners appeal. Affirmed.

W. T. Belieu, of Willow, and Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, for appellants. A. J. Zumwalt and Frank Freeman, both of Willow, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This action was brought by Dora Mellor, the plaintiff and respondent, to recover from the Bank of Willows the sum of $5,162.50, representing a certificate of deposit for $5,000, and the interest thereon, issued by the defendant bank, and payable to George Mellor, the deceased husband of the plaintiff, or order. The plaintiff claims that she received the money as a gift causa mortis from her husband. By leave of the court, a complaint in intervention was filed on behalf of certain heirs of the decedent who are contesting the plaintiff's claim. The defendant bank deposited the money in court to be delivered to the successful party in accordance with the decree. The case was tried without a jury, and judgment was rendered for the plaintiff. The interveners interposed a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and from such order this appeal is prosecuted.

The sole question presented is whether Dora Mellor acquired title and right of possession to the funds represented by the certificate of deposit. The court found:

"That on the 25th day of November, 1911, George Mellor, early in the morning of that day, became violently ill, and later, to wit, on or about 8 o'clock p. m. of that day, died; that during said last illness the said George Mellor, while in great pain, and believing that he was about to die, and in the fear and peril of death, delivered into the possession of and gave to plaintiff, Dora Mellor, with intention to make a gift of the same to her, the certificate of deposit, * * * and the said George Mellor died without having revoked said gift of said certificate of deposit."

[1] 1. It is insisted by the appellants that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the gift was made by the decedent in view of impending dissolution from the effect of his last illness. For more than 17 years Mellor had suffered from a serious ailment involving the kidneys. The malady grew worse as time wore on, and in later years was frequently accompanied by attacks during which stones would pass from the kidneys to the bladder, causing intense pain. He was admonished by Dr. Randolph, who had attended him for nearly 20 years, that he was likely to die very suddenly in one of these attacks. The physician, testifying for the appellants, on cross-examination said:

"People die suddenly in those cases. I do not know whether or not he had been suffering a number of weeks prior to that time. I had not called upon him, and he had not called me. Mr. Mellor always thought that he would pass away in one of those spells; he thought they would finally kill him; he said that to me often. I have had conversations with him, and have told him that it would not be more than two or three years that he had to fix up his business. I said: 'George, you are going to quit on the sidewalk, and you had better fix up your business.' I told him that from the very nature of his ailment."

His wife said that he was impressed by these warnings. She testified:

"He had talked about it more than once, and he said if he ever got a rough one he wouldn't live; as he was getting older it worried him more."

Mellor's attorney testified to like effect. In the early morning of the day of his death Mellor was again stricken with "one of his old spells." He suffered intensely, but recovered sufficiently to go to the garage, of which he had charge, only to return a few moments later in a condition of great agony.

"When he first came home," his wife testified, "he looked agony and seemed to have a death pallor on his face and he said, 'it is a rough one.'"

She assisted him to undress and helped him to bed. It was at this time he handed her a purse containing $150 in cash and three certificates of deposit, including the one involved in this action. Subsequently he repeated the remark, which must be regarded as significant:

"It is a rough one, Dora."

After getting into bed he laid over on his side and said:

"Dora, the taxes are due Monday. See that they do not become delinquent if I do not awake."

Although the physician made several visits to Mellor during the day, he did not recover from the attack, and died about 8 o'clock in the evening. It is provided in the Civil Code that:

"A gift made during the last illness of the giver, or under circumstances which would naturally impress him with an expectation of speedy death, is presumed to be a gift in view of death." Section 1150.

But, unaided by this presumption, the evidence is amply sufficient to support the finding of the court that the decedent acted in contemplation of death.

[2, 3] 2. The appellants next contend that the court was not warranted in finding that the decedent intended to make and did make a gift to the plaintiff. They claim that:

"The evidence is wholly insufficient to justify the finding of the court in favor of the plaintiff, for the reason that she is asserting title to certificates of deposit on her unsupported statement that her deceased husband, George Mellor, made a gift causa mortis of them."

The rule is, as argued by them:

"He who attempts to establish title to property through a gift as against the estate of a decedent takes upon himself a heavy burden which he must support by evidence of great probative force which clearly establishes every element of a valid gift." Denigan v. Hibernia, etc., Society, 127 Cal. 137, 59 Pac. 389.

No one else was present at the time the plaintiff claims the decedent gave her the certificate of deposit. It is well established that under such circumstances the testimony of the claimant should be viewed with caution, and even with suspicion, in order to prevent fraud. Freese v. Odd Fellows Savings Bank, 136 Cal. 662, 69 Pac. 493. But, while this is true, the trial court in this case has found in favor of the testimony of the plaintiff, and we cannot assume that in making its finding the court ignored the rules above stated.

[4, 5] Her testimony follows:

"Saturday morning, the 25th day of November, 1911, when he gave them to me, he was sitting on the edge of the bed. I was undressing him. I took off his shoes. I helped him take off his overalls, and he puts his hand in his pocket and takes out his purse, and says: 'Here, Dora, here are the certificates of deposit. I should have attended to them before.' He said: 'Take them to Clarence [referring to the cashier of the defendant bank] and they will be all right.' It was about 8 o'clock in the morning when he said this. He was very sick, suffering a great deal at this time. I took the purse and put it between the mattresses of the bed he was lying on, and they remained there until he died. He died about 8 o'clock in the evening. I did not open it until Sunday morning; then I looked in the purse. The purse had been in my possession all the time. At the time I opened the purse I found these certificates of deposit, and they have been in my possession ever since."

She also testified that this was the first time he ever mentioned the certificates to her. He did not refer to them again.

"Upon this expression of the decedent, assuming it to have been made," insist the appellants, "the court must base a finding that the deceased made a gift of the certificate to Mrs. Mellor."

It is argued:

"There was no word spoken indicating an intention to give the certificates to any one. Mellor did not employ the language that is usually used to indicate an intention to give. He did not say, 'These are yours,' or 'I give these to you,' or 'Take these for yourself.'"

But the intention to give need not be manifested solely by the particular words employed by the donor. It is a question of fact to be determined like other questions of fact upon all the evidence in the case—the situation of the parties, their relationship, the circumstances surrounding the transaction, the apparent purpose in making the gift, the words spoken at the time, and the like. Estate of Hall, 154 Cal. 527, 98 Pac. 269. See Follmer v. Rohrer, 158 Cal. 755, 112 Pac. 544. If the words accompanying the delivery of the thing can be said to be expressive of a gift, and, in the light of the circumstances, consistent with the intention to give, the execution of the gift is established. In considering a similar question, the court remarked in Vandor v. Roach, 73 Cal. 614, 15 Pac. 354:

"The counsel says that the operative words of a gift are, 'I give,' or 'I have given,' and that these words are wanting. But we do not think that any formula or set phrase is necessary. It is sufficient if there was delivery, and any words importing an intention to give."

While it is not necessary that the words used shall be exclusively language of gift, when tested by all the circumstances of the case, they must be susceptible of that meaning. In this case, possibly, as contended by the appellants, the bare words employed by Mellor might constitute a direction merely to deliver the certificates to the cashier of the bank. But the language is also consistent with an intention to make a gift, and, as we will presently show, the decedent's intention to make a gift is well established by the evidence. It must therefore be held that the language used constitutes words of gift.

[6] For more than a quarter of a century Mellor and his wife lived together, during the greater part of which time he was afflicted with the kidney trouble which eventually caused his death. The warnings of his physician that he was likely to die suddenly, and the admonition to fix up his business caused him unceasing worry. But there is no evidence that he had previously made any attempt to provide for his wife's future. When, however, the final attack came, and he realized his life would soon end, it is apparent that the duty of providing for her was uppermost in his thoughts. It was then he handed her the certificates of deposit. As is said in Davie v. Davie (Wash.) 91 Pac. 950:

"It would seem to be but a natural thing for a man in the expectation of near approaching death to make a gift of this kind to his wife."

There are circumstances where the presumption of gift arises from the moral obligation to give. See Spitler v. Kaeding, 133 Cal. 500, 65 Pac. 1040. It seems to us that such a case is presented here. No creditors are complaining. The only parties contesting the claim of the wife are heirs of the decedent, residents of England, whom he had not seen for 40 years. Nor is it suggested that any will was made by the decedent, the terms of which are inconsistent with the gift. The appellant's suggestion that perhaps Mellor intended the plaintiff should pay the taxes which were due out of the money on deposit is without merit.

[7, 8] It is also argued that had Mellor intended to make a gift he would have clearly expressed his intention in apt words, and that the absence of such words must be taken as evidence that he had no such intention. But his failure to use more elaborate language cannot be construed against the gift. When he gave the plaintiff the certificates of deposit he was suffering intensely, and apparently was unable to converse or concentrate his mind to any extent. While this circumstance did not dispense with the necessity of using appropriate words of gift, it may be considered in explanation of his failure to employ formal or conventional language. The trial court therefore may well have concluded that but for his physical condition he would have said, in effect:

"Dora, I make you a gift of the certificate of deposit, and Clarence will give you the money."

It is also quite evident that he trusted to the cashier of the bank to recognize the right of the plaintiff to receive the money, and considered more specific directions to her as unnecessary. Nor was it necessary for his wife to ask him whether the money was intended as a gift, to insist upon full particulars as to the action expected of the cashier, or to suggest that the certificate of deposit be indorsed. It was sufficient that both parties to the transaction understood that a gift of the money represented by the certificate of deposit was intended to be made, and that it was given and accepted in this spirit. We think the evidence fully sustains the finding that the decedent gave the certificate of deposit to the plaintiff, and that he did so with the intention of making a gift of the money to her.

[9] 3. The certificate of deposit was undorsed. The appellants contend that this was a fatal defect to the validity of the gift.

"Assuming for the sake of argument," they say, "that Mellor intended to make a gift, and that he actually delivered the certificates with the intention that they should be the property of Mrs. Mellor, still there is no gift, because the certificates were not indorsed."

But the wife testified:

"At the time Mr. Mellor delivered these certificates of deposit to me, he was too sick to write. * * * He was very sick, suffering a great deal at this time."

Where there is no opportunity to make an indorsement or written assignment of an instrument, such as a certificate of deposit intended as a gift causa mortis, the absence of an indorsement does not raise a presumption against the validity of the transfer. The certificate was payable "to self or order." Its delivery constituted an equitable assignment of the money on deposit. Basket v. Hassell, 107 U. S. 602, 2 Sup. Ct. 415, 27 L. Ed. 500. This clearly brings the case within the principle of the prevailing authorities that a gift of a deposit in a bank is a proper subject of a gift causa mortis, and may be evidenced by the delivery of the certificate of deposit without indorsement. Royston v. McCulley (Tenn. Ch. App.) 59 S. W. 525, 52 L. R. A. 899; Caldwell v. Goodenough, 170 Mich. 114, 135 N. W. 1057; Connor v. Root, 11 Colo. 183, 17 Pac. 773; First National Bank, etc., v. O'Bryne, 177 Ill. App. 473; 12 R. C. L. p. 965, § 38; 20 Cyc. 1238. The conditions of transfer printed upon the certificate calling for an indorsement do not alter the rule. Ridden v. Thrall, 125 N. Y. 572, 26 N. E. 627, 11 L. R. A. 684, 21 Am. St. Rep. 758. The authorities relied upon by the appellants to establish the necessity of an indorsement or actual delivery of the funds on deposit are, for the most part, concerned with checks, drafts, and other evidences of money on deposit in banks of issue, discount, and deposit. These cases are not in point; for a different rule generally prevails where the money can be drawn from the bank by the depositor's check or draft. In this state it has been well settled that "negotiable paper payable to order is the subject of a donatio causa mortis, even though it is not indorsed by the payee." Edwards v. Wagner, 121 Cal. 376, 53 Pac. 821. This rule has been applied to a promissory note (Druke v. Heiken, 61 Cal. 346, 44 Am. Rep. 553), United States bonds (Vandor v. Roach, supra), and bills of exchange (Edwards v. Wagner, supra). It applies with equal force to a certificate of deposit, payable to order, when transferred as a gift causa mortis.

We find no error in the rulings of the court admitting the testimony complained of.

The order is affirmed.

I concur: SLOSS, J.

SHAW, J. I am of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence, direct and circumstantial, to support the findings, and that the equitable title to the certificate of deposit passed by its delivery with the intent thereby to make a gift of it. I therefore concur in the judgment.

EARL v. SAN FRANCISCO BRIDGE CO.
(Civ. 1573.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 4, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT — INJURIES TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER—UNSAFE PLACE TO WORK.

It is negligence for a master to change the switch cutting off an electric current from its wires so that it did not entirely cut the current off, and then to direct an employé, who had previously inserted fuses in the connections after cutting off the current at the switch, to insert a switch without warning him that the switch had been changed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 291-294; Dec. Dig. ¶ 149(1).]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT — INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Though the employé knew of the danger of working around wires carrying a current of such voltage, he was justified in assuming that the switch would still cut the current off from the wires, the difference in its appearance not being so palpable as to compel the conclusion that in the exercise of ordinary care he would have discovered it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 714; Dec. Dig. ¶ 235(7).]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT — INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—SUPERVISION OF SUPERIOR.

A rigger employed in a plant, whose machinery is operated by electricity and who was directed by the engineer to replace a fuse, was entitled, in doing so under the immediate supervision of the engineer, to rely on the superior knowledge of the latter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 713; Dec. Dig. ¶ 235(4).]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT — INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—OBEDIENCE TO ORDERS.

An employé, who had knowledge that the cut-off switch had been changed so as not to cut off the entire current, is not contributorily negligent in attempting to replace a fuse under the direct supervision of the engineer where the change merely rendered the attempt more dangerous, but did not make it inevitably or imminently dangerous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 781; Dec. Dig. ¶ 245(4).]

5. DAMAGES — AMOUNT—PERSONAL INJURIES—DISCRETION OF JURY.

In cases of personal injury, there is no certain and absolute measure of damages, but the amount must be left largely to the discretion and sense of justice of the jury, subject to the supervision and correction of the trial court to determine what will be a fair compensation for the suffering and misery and financial loss.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 54, 64, 68, 533, 534; Dec. Dig. ¶ 208(1).]

6. DAMAGES — AMOUNT—ELECTRICAL INJURIES.

The severity of injuries caused by electricity is a matter of general observation, and courts have been liberal in upholding verdicts for large amounts in such cases.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 357, 363, 364, 366; Dec. Dig. ¶ 130(1).]

7. TRIAL — MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS—CURE BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that the jury should assess the damages in such sum as they believed, under all the circumstances in evidence, the plaintiff ought to recover, even if misleading when standing alone, could not have been misunderstood, where it was supplemented by the specific directions as to all the elements of damage for which the plaintiff could recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 715; Dec. Dig. ¶ 296(11).]

8. TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS—STATEMENT OF ISSUES.

It is not error for the court to state plaintiff's claim in the language of the complaint, instead of using equivalent phraseology.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by William Earl against the San Francisco Bridge Company. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. B. M. Miller, of San Francisco, for appellant. Walter Shelton and J. C. Campbell, both of San Francisco, and Frank R. Devlin, of Fairfield, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The interesting argument of appellant is based largely upon the theory that we must discredit and reject the testimony in favor of respondent's contention. It should hardly be necessary to add that we are not permitted to do so, since the statements therein contained are not improbable. Indeed, after a careful reading of the entire record, we can only say that at most a substantial conflict is presented as to the material elements of the alleged cause of action.

[1] The facts, as substantially stated and shown by respondent, are as follows: Appellant at the time of the accident was engaged in dredging a channel near Pinole Flats at Mare Island in Solano county, and for said purpose was using dredgers, pumps, and other machinery and equipment operated by electricity. On the 7th of November, 1913, plaintiff was in the employment of the defendant as an operator in and about one of its pumping stations or substations, and it was his duty, under said employment, "to work with, use, handle and repair the machinery, apparatus and equipment in and about said pumping plant or station." While he was so engaged, "he was required by defendant to replace a fuse or connection in the aforesaid apparatus and equipment, and plaintiff, before proceeding to do so, turned or threw the switch provided by defendant to disconnect the electrical current from that portion of said electrical apparatus or equipment where plaintiff was about to insert the aforesaid fuse or connection, but owing to the unsafeness, unsuitableness, unfitness, defectiveness, and dangerous and unrepaired condition of said wires, * * * devices and electrical equipment, a powerful and dangerous electrical current of high potential, used by defendant on said electrical apparatus and equipment for the purpose of supplying power to be used as aforesaid, was not disconnected from the aforesaid electrical apparatus and equipment, but said electrical apparatus and equipment remained surcharged therewith and defendant carelessly and negligently and knowingly, but without the knowledge of plaintiff, failed to disconnect or cause to be disconnected the aforesaid electrical apparatus and equipment from the aforesaid current, so that, when plaintiff undertook to replace the aforesaid fuse or connection as required by defendant, he came in contact with the aforesaid powerful and dangerous current and received the same into and through his body, and suffered great shock and injury." Defendant's machinery and apparatus where plaintiff was employed was protected from unusual electric currents by means of fuses which melted or "blew out" and thus automatically disconnected the current when it became too strong. Whenever a fuse blew out, it was the duty of plaintiff to insert another.

Until just prior to the accident, defendant had furnished a switch or cut-off which could be used to disconnect the current, and a fuse could then be put in without any danger; and while this condition prevailed plaintiff had restored many of these fuses. A few days before the accident, that part of the switch disconnecting the middle phase of the three incoming high-tension wires burned out, so that it had to be repaired in order to re-establish the connection on the middle wire. The duty to make this repair devolved upon defendant's chief engineer and not upon plaintiff. Instead of restoring the switch to its original condition, the chief engineer connected the middle high-tension wire directly to the middle transformer wire by means of an ordinary wire called a "solid" or "jumper" so that the middle phase could not thereafter be disconnected. As a consequence, the middle wire was always alive so that, when the two outside high-tension wires were disconnected by throwing the switch, the corresponding wires below the switch, where the fuses had to be inserted, were always charged by a return current from the transformer. Although the fuses in the two outside wires were still kept in use to protect the machinery and had to be replaced when they blew out, the switch to protect the employees while putting in fuses no longer performed its function. While the switch appeared to accomplish its purpose on the wires where the fuses had to be inserted, and apparently disconnected the current in those wires as it had always done, there was a way left open for the current to become a hidden and disguised peril. We must conclude from the record that plaintiff had no knowledge nor notice of this change in the condition of the switch, but, to the contrary, had every reason to believe that, by manipulating the switch, the current would be turned off completely so that the fuse could be inserted without danger. Herein lies the negligence of defendant. It consisted manifestly in making such change in the electrical appliances without notifying plaintiff. Of course, if it had not been the duty of respondent to restore the fuses, a different question would be presented. But from the showing made, we must accept it as true that such was the duty of respondent, and, moreover, that the chief engineer specifically ordered him to put in the fuse and in effect assured him that he was not incurring any danger.

Reduced to its simplest form, the case seems clearly to be that a safe place was furnished to plaintiff for his work with certain appliances that he could and did use in a certain manner without danger; that said appliances were changed in a material way without his knowledge; that thereby they could not be safely operated as before; and that, while performing his duty, he was greatly injured in consequence of said change having been made.

The essential features of the situation are covered in the following narrative of plaintiff:

"I am 33 years old. My occupation has been that of rigger, and for that work I have received from $90 to $125 per month. * * * I was operator on the relay station. My duties were to see that the pump was oiled, well greased and oiled, and running. * * * If anything happened, a fuse blown out, we were supposed to put it back in place, supposed to keep the thing running. I had been employed there about a month. I had been in the employ of the San Francisco Bridge Company about 2½ months. During that time I had worked there on the machine, on the dredger as a handy man. I was off about 4 days before the morning on which I was hurt. I reported for duty on the dredger, on board the launch, at 7 o'clock, and I was told to go over aboard the Booster and pack the pump and get ready to start up, and I did so. Two hours later Mr. Purcell, the chief engineer, came by in the launch and said he was going to cut in the power from Vallejo and when he did to start the pump. I started the pump immediately as soon as the power came into the building. We ran for about 10 minutes when the motor burned out. I shut off the power and stopped the motor and hoisted up the flag to call the launch up, and they came back; that is, Mr. Purcell and Mr. Squires. I called them back. It was my duty to accept instructions in regard to my work from these two men I called back. After I had thrown the controller so that the power went on and the motor did not run, Mr. Purcell went out in the back of the Booster where the transformers are, and he came in directly afterwards and said: 'Earl, there is a fuse blown; go put one in.' I took the key to the cut-out and went outside and unlocked the cut-out or switch—that is, the disconnecting switch—and pulled it out and disconnected the power from the fuse platform and locked it out. When I pulled the arm of the connecting switch down and locked it, Mr. Purcell was there. I asked him if all was ready, and he said, 'Yes.' Then I went up and caught hold of the thumbscrew and was caught. The thumbscrew was on the inside wire; that is, the one nearest the building. I just stayed there burning. I first felt a sensation in the throat here, then the burns down here (indicating), then I felt the legs burning, both of my legs from here down here. The key that I had I put in my mouth and had it there when I was on the wire, I tried to spit it out, but could not. I was tense on the wire and could not do anything except to hang there. I was in the hospital about five months. I had to undergo one large operation and three minor ones. I have not been able to work since that time. Some nights I sleep pretty good, and some nights I don't sleep a single wink. That did not exist before the accident. Before my injury I weighed 168 or 170 pounds, and when I got out of the hospital I weighed 105; now I weigh about 140 pounds. I was not nervous before the accident. My doctor's bills and expenses at the hospital were between $1,300 and $1,400. I had put in fuses lots of times before I was hurt. The correct method of putting in one of these fuses was to take the key and go out and unlock the cut-out and pull down the switch. The cut-off switch is a pole running up the height to the three cut-off leaders. It cuts off the power from the coming-in wires to the fuse wire. I had been in the habit of doing that before this time. When I went up that day to put that fuse in, I had never been told or advised by any one and did not know that the cut-out or switch that I had undertaken to disconnect had been changed or modified in any way. I did not notice at any time that morning any change or modification in the cut-off or switch. At the time of the accident when I was up there I saw the wire then at that time, running from the high-tension wire that brings the current in. It ran to the lower fuse bracket and switch. It was connected with the center wire. I saw that wire from above the switch to the lower fuse bracket. It was joined at one end to the main feed wire and then across the cut-off switch, the middle arm, and extended down below the middle fuse and attach to the lower fuse bracket. It was four days before I was hurt that I had seen that cut-off or switch. It was not then in that condition; it was in good condition."

He further testified that he caught hold of the thumbscrew to put in the fuse when he got to the top of the ladder, and the accident happened immediately, and that he did not know that it was dangerous to come in contact with the wire while "the cut-off was thrown out," nor was he told that "in the condition affairs were in on that platform that the cut-out did not cut the current off."

Applying to the foregoing testimony the familiar legal principles involved in such cases, we reach the conclusion that appellant was rightfully charged with the burden of responding in damages for the injury suffered by plaintiff. Those principles need not be restated, and it is probably sufficient, without quotation, to refer to Stephens v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 16 Cal. App. 512, 117 Pac. 559; Giraudi v. Electric Improvement Co., 107 Cal. 120, 40 Pac. 108, 28 L. R. A. 596, 48 Am. St. Rep. 114; Reeve v. Colusa Gas & Electric Co., 152 Cal. 99, 92 Pac. 89; Dow v. Sunset Telephone Co., 157 Cal. 182, 106 Pac. 587; Grimm v. Omaha Electric Light & Power Co., 79 Neb. 387, 112 N. W. 620.

[2] It is, however, insisted that respondent was guilty of such contributory negligence as to prevent recovery. The real basis for the contention is that respondent is chargeable with knowledge of the dangerous character of the element with which he was dealing. That he was not ignorant of the peril involved in coming into contact with a current of such voltage must be conceded, and that he should be required to exercise care in operating the appliances cannot be disputed; but these considerations are only remotely, if at all, connected with the controversy here. The real danger, the proximate cause of the injury, was, as we have already seen, the failure of the switch to disconnect the current, and this by reason of a change made by appellant. It was not negligence on the part of respondent to assume that conditions were as before, and that the switch would disconnect the current. Having the right to assume that the appliance was in the same condition, he was excusable for his failure to make an examination or inspection whereby he might have ascertained what had been done; nor was the difference in the appearance of the equipment so palpable and obtrusive as to compel the conclusion that, while hastening to perform his duty, if he had exercised ordinary care he would have discovered the change.

[3] Moreover, plaintiff, as testified to by him, was acting under the direct supervision of the chief engineer and was entitled to rely upon his superior knowledge. In Price v. Northern Electric Railway Co., 168 Cal. 173, 142 Pac. 91, it is said:

"He was working under the immediate supervision of a foreman, and was not erecting trestle bents or creating them on his own judgment and at his own risk. In the absence of actual knowledge to the contrary, or circumstances under which he would be held to be required to have such knowledge, he had the right to assume, when directed to assist in removing the scaffolding, that the bent had been so braced that it would not fall when the scaffolding was removed. And it cannot be held as matter of law, under the circumstances, that he was guilty of contributory negligence in not observing the absence of bracing, however obvious that fact might have been if he had made an examination to see what the actual condition was."

See, also, Cumberland Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Graves' Adm'x (Ky.) 104 S. W. 356; Chicago Suburban W. & L. Co. v. Hyslop, 227 Ill. 308, 81 N. E. 381; Green v. Varney, 165 Cal. 347, 132 Pac. 436; Lee v. Woolsey, 109 Pa. 124.

[4] Moreover, if plaintiff had full knowledge of the change, he would not be chargeable with contributory negligence in obeying orders unless performance thereof was inevitably or imminently dangerous. Martin v. California Central Ry. Co., 94 Cal. 326, 29 Pac. 645; Anderson v. Seropian, 147 Cal. 201, 81 Pac. 521; Patterson v. Pittsburg & C. R. Co., 76 Pa. 389, 18 Am. Rep. 412; Van Duzen Gas, etc., Co. v. Schelies, 61 Ohio St. 298, 55 N. E. 998.

There is room for the application of this principle, since there was testimony on the part of appellant that the work done by respondent was not imminently and necessarily dangerous. The chief engineer testified that after the repairs he put in a fuse on the outside wire without injury and that he, an electrical and steam engineer of 20 years' experience, "did not consider it taking a chance" to put in a fuse. Defendant's superintendent, a civil engineer, who was present at the time of the accident, testified that he knew the middle wire was through solid and that he did not warn plaintiff, but that he "did consider that a man had to exercise more care up there after the middle wire was through solid." From this statement it is quite clear that he did not consider putting in the fuse as particularly and obviously dangerous, or else he would have cautioned plaintiff. Upon this theory it is a reasonable conclusion that plaintiff was justified in believing that he could perform the duty intrusted to him without danger if he exercised the care necessarily required in directing and controlling an electric current of such voltage.

In this connection, it might be well to state the suggestions of respondent that, since plaintiff proceeded carefully and skillfully, there was no more than an assumption of risk if he realized the danger, and that this defense was not open to defendant; the Employers' Liability Act having been in force at the time of the accident. Crabbe v. Mammoth Channel G. Mining Co., 168 Cal. 500, 143 Pac. 714.

Another point urged upon our attention is that the verdict is excessive, and therefore should be set aside. The amount awarded is quite large, but respondent was grievously injured, and we cannot say that it is so disproportionate to the damage done as to compel the conclusion that the jury were controlled by passion or prejudice. We may supplement the testimony of plaintiff on the subject already quoted, by the following statement of Dr. E. A. Peterson, one of the attending physicians:

"It was January 15th when I first saw the plaintiff. Dr. Klotz asked me to come over there and help him operate on a man he was going to leave in my charge, as he was going away. I assisted him in the operation, removing the internal condyle of the tibia. He was in my charge from then on. He was in a very critical condition from the inflammation which he had in the bone, which caused a good deal of pain, and we had to remove it, and other bone became infected, and it was necessary to operate on him three times about, to remove pus from under the periosteum, the covering of the bone, and there is nothing more painful, so excruciatingly painful. He was suffering a general condition, as I understand it, he was very much run down, and he had to be put under an anæsthetic three times more. The cause of his condition was the generally weakened vitality, especially as the bone had been burned and rendered very inactive and unhealthy from being burned; this is what we call a complication after a burn. The complications which occurred in this case were unavoidable, and the condition I have described was not due to any neglect that the plaintiff may have received. His pain was so great that opiates would not relieve it. This condition continued from about January 17th to—well, it was a month, anyway, that he was in awful agony. * * * The plaintiff, in my opinion, will never be able to perform labor such as a rigger, or any structural work owing to his present condition."

Dr. Klotz described minutely the patient's condition, and, among other things, said:

"The bone was diseased from the electric shock, that is the necrosis, the live bone, was destroyed. * * * The nervous condition was due, of course, to the shock and electrical burns that he had. If a person were to receive enough electricity to throw them down and to require artificial respiration and of course burns like the patient had, it would leave him in an awful state afterwards. * * * He never will be able to perform such services as a rigger, a person who has formerly worked with his feet, arms, and hands."

[5, 6] Of course, in cases like this, there is no certain and absolute measure of damages. It must be largely left to the discretion and sense of justice of the jury "subject to the supervision and correction of the trial court" to determine the amount that will be a fair compensation for the suffering and misery and financial loss endured by the injured party. The severity of the injury caused by electricity is a matter of general observation, and the courts have been quite liberal in upholding verdicts for large amounts in such cases. As illustrating this tendency of the courts, we may refer to the following cases cited by respondent: Tedford v. Los Angeles Electric Co., 134 Cal. 76, 66 Pac. 76, 54 L. R. A. 85; Reeve v. Colusa Gas & Electric Co., 152 Cal. 99, 92 Pac. 89; Southwestern Telegraph & Telephone Co. v. Shirley (Tex. Civ. App.) 155 S. W. 663; Hill v. Union Electric Light & Power Co., 260 Mo. 43, 169 S. W. 345; New Omaha Thompson-Houston Electric Light Co. v. Rombold, 68 Neb. 54, 93 N. W. 966, 97 N. W. 1030; Goetzke v. City of Chicago, 174 Ill. App. 446.

Some errors in the matter of instructions and rulings of the trial judge are claimed, but they seem to be without substantial merit.

[7] The instruction to the jury that they should assess the damages, if any, in such sum as they believed under all the circumstances in evidence the plaintiff ought to recover, if standing alone might have been misleading, but it was supplemented by specific directions as to all the elements of damage that the plaintiff could recover, and therefore could not have been misunderstood as claimed by appellant. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513; Harmon v. Donohoe, 153 Mo. 263, 54 S. W. 453; Lamb v. City of Cedar Rapids, 108 Iowa, 629, 79 N. W. 366; Denver City Tramway Co. v. Martin, 44 Colo. 324, 98 Pac. 836.

[8] There was no error in stating the claim of the plaintiff in the language of the complaint. It was certainly proper to inform the jury as to the issues, and it is a mere question of rhetoric whether for this purpose the language of the pleadings or equivalent phraseology should be used.

There is no merit in the contention by appellant of the alleged failure of the court to define "affirmation of the issue" and "preponderance of evidence." As a matter of fact, they were sufficiently defined in the instructions given on behalf of defendant, and, if any further elucidation was desired, it should have been requested. O'Connor v. United Railroads, 168 Cal. 43, 141 Pac. 809.

The instructions as a whole were very fair and presented every legal phase of the case that was needed for the enlightenment of the jury. Every instruction requested by defendant was given, and in those given on behalf of plaintiff we find no prejudicial error.

The court properly refused to strike out the testimony on cross-examination of Dr. Klotz as to the value of the hospital services incurred by plaintiff. The motion was upon the ground that he was testifying as to what the usual charges were and not the actual charge in this case, but he had so testified on direct examination without objection, and the motion came too late. Moreover, the testimony of plaintiff as to that point was uncontradicted, and hence the doctor's testimony could not have prejudiced defendant.

Objection is made to the ruling of the court excluding a written report to the company made by William J. Knoll, a witness for defendant. The only purpose of the evidence was to show that the witness was at the station in No. 5. The witness had testified from memory with this report before him that he was there at that time, and the report itself was not admissible as corroboration of his testimony. People v. Eliyea, 14 Cal. 145; Baum v. Reay, 96 Cal. 462, 29 Pac. 117, 31 Pac. 561; Wigmore on Evidence, § 763; Elliott on Evidence, § 872.

Two or three other assignments of error are made, but they are so inconsequential as to merit no specific attention.

From an examination of the whole record, we think it can be safely declared that defendant's rights were carefully protected, and that the proceedings were free from prejudicial error.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE'S WATER CO. v. BOROMEIO et al.
(Civ. 1813.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION ⇨86—DESTRUCTION OF LEGAL RIGHT OF POSSESSION—STATUTES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 318, 322, 323, 325, providing when occupation under written instrument or judgment is deemed adverse, and what constitutes adverse possession under unwritten claim of title, the seisin in law which plaintiff had on bringing ejectment, and for four years immediately preceding, though a mere right of possession, could be destroyed only by the ripening of defendants' title by adverse possession prior to that time through their compliance with all legal requirements, including payment of taxes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 504; Dec. Dig. ⇨86.]

2. TAXATION ⇨428—"LEVY" AND "ASSESSMENT"—NEGLECT OF AUDITOR.

The work of the county auditor, relative to the computation and entry in a separate money column in the assessment book of the respective sums to be paid as a tax on property, after making changes in such book, etc., required by Pol. Code, § 3731, is no part of the "levy" and "assessment" of taxes within Code Civ. Proc. § 325, which words apply to the acts of the supervisors in making the levy and the assessor in making the assessment, and failure of auditor to perform this duty for two years does not make the taxes illegal.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Levy; Assessment.]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION ⇨95—INVALIDITY OF LEVIES AND ASSESSMENTS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In ejectment against parties claiming by adverse possession, where plaintiff introduced in evidence assessment rolls for certain years, showing that taxes were levied and assessed upon the land, the burden was then cast upon defendants to show that such levies and assessments were invalid to entitle them to the benefits of the sections of the Code relative to adverse possession.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Action of ejectment by the People's Water Company against Harry Boromeo and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Judgment affirmed.

Milton Shepardson and L. A. Kottinger, both of Oakland, for appellants. Tom Bradley and Harry E. Leach, both of Oakland, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in an action of ejectment. The plaintiff alleges seisin or right of possession in itself for the period of five years last past, and also alleges possession on the part of the defendants at the time of the commencement of the action. The answer of the defendants denies the plaintiff's possession and right of possession for the period claimed, and alleges that the defendants have been in the adverse possession of the premises for more than 12 years. The trial court found in favor of the plaintiff's seisin during the past five years, but also found that the defendants had been in the open, notorious, exclusive, and uninterrupted possession of the premises during the period from 1901 up to March 22, 1912, the date of the filing of the complaint. The court, however, found that the taxes had been duly levied and assessed upon said premises for the years 1903, 1904, 1907, 1909, and 1911, which had not been paid by the defendants or any of them or by any person on their behalf; and thereupon found as a conclusion of law that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the premises in question.

[1] The appellants contend that the finding by the court of the plaintiff's seisin within five years and of the defendants' adverse possession for the period of 12 years prior to the filing of the complaint are inconsistent, and also contends that the latter finding by the court is sufficient to bar the plaintiff's recovery under section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There is no merit in either of these contentions. The seisin which the plaintiff had in the premises at the time of the commencement of the action, and for the period of four years immediately preceding that date, was merely the right of possession which could only be destroyed by the ripening of the defendants' title by adverse possession through their compliance with all of the legal requirements, including the payment of taxes necessary to produce that result; section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure is to be read in connection with sections 322, 323, and 325 of the same Code, which set forth the legal prerequisites of the creation of such a title by adverse possession as would defeat the plaintiff's seisin in law.

The final and only substantial contention involved in this appeal arises out of the appellants' admission that the taxes levied and assessed upon the premises for the years above set forth were not paid by them, but their insistence that said taxes were not legally assessed or levied, and hence that they were not bound to pay them. This contention is based upon a number of alleged irregularities in the levy and assessment of the taxes for said years, but in the closing brief of appellants these are finally refined down to the single contention that section 3731 of the Political Code was not complied with by the officials charged with the duty of making a proper and legal levy and assessment of the taxes to be charged against the premises in question.

[2] In this section of the Political Code the county auditor, after receiving from the state board of equalization a statement of whatever changes have been ordered by said board in the assessment book of the county, and after making the corresponding changes, if any, in said assessment book, must then compute and enter in a separate money column in the assessment book the respective sums to be paid as a tax on the property, and segregate and place in their proper columns of the book, the respective amounts due in installments. The record shows that this duty was not performed by the auditor in respect to the property and for the years in question; but the respondent insists, and we think correctly, that this work of the auditor as required by the foregoing section of the Political Code is no part of the levy and assessment of the taxes, but is merely a step in the process of their collection. The terms "levied" and "assessed" employed in section 325 of the Code of Civil Procedure in relation to taxes have been considered to have reference to the act of the board of supervisors in making the levy and of the assessor in making the assessment, and have no reference to the acts of the auditor in making the computations and carrying out the columns and segregating installments required by section 3731 of the Political Code. Allen v. McKay, 120 Cal. 332, 52 Pac. 828; Waterhouse v. Clatsop, 50 Or. 176, 91 Pac. 1083.

The argument of the appellants that every step in the process of making up the assessment roll is strictissimi juris and must be complied with to the letter before a valid obligation to pay taxes is imposed upon the property owner, while no doubt true in its application to the proceeding leading up to a valid levy and assessment of the tax, has not been held to apply with the same degree of strictness to the mere ministerial acts of the clerk of the board of supervisors and of the auditor in making the affidavits and carrying out the computations after the taxes have been duly levied and assessed. Steele v. San Luis Obispo, 152 Cal. 785, 93 Pac. 1020.

[3] The plaintiff having introduced in evidence the assessment rolls for the years in question, showing that taxes were levied and assessed upon the property, the burden was then cast upon the defendants to show that these levies and assessments were not valid

In order to entitle them to claim the benefit of the sections of the Code relating to title by adverse possession. In our opinion they have not sustained this burden, and it follows that the trial court was not in error in its conclusion of law that the plaintiff was entitled to possession of the premises in dispute.

Judgment affirmed.

JENNINGS v. JORDAN. (Civ. 1775.)
(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Aug. 31, 1916.)

1. BROKERS — 61(1) — COMPENSATION — WHEN EARNED.

A broker employed to procure a binding agreement for the exchange of property has earned his commission when he has procured the agreement, though no exchange takes place because of defective title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 77, 78, 92; Dec. Dig. 61(1).]

2. BROKERS — 60 — COMPENSATION — WHEN EARNED.

Defendant and a third person contracted for an exchange of their lands and each agreed to pay commissions to a broker. The broker had brought the parties together, and had proposed different lines of trade, one of which was finally agreed on. Held, that the provision for payment of commissions was not separable from the remainder of the contract, and where the third person failed to perform, the broker could not recover any commission from defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 91; Dec. Dig. 60.]

3. PROPERTY — 9 — TITLE — PRESUMPTIONS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 32, declaring that a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature, proof that title to land was in one person less than a year before another should perform his contract to convey the same in exchange for other land, raises the presumption that the title so remained when performance was due under the contract, and the party asserting the contrary has the burden of proving it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Property, Dec. Dig. 9; Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 78.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Action by Samuel Jennings against F. R. Jordan. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Dunn, White & Aiken, of Oakland, for appellant. Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought to recover $1,825 alleged to have been earned by Hermann Eppinger, Jr., the assignor of the plaintiff, as a commission upon a proposed exchange of certain lands. Judgment went for defendant, and the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal therefrom, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

On the 2d day of May, 1914, John Fletcher and the defendant entered into a written contract, under the terms of which Fletcher was to convey to the defendant some 333 acres of land, to be chosen by the defendant from a certain described larger tract of 436 acres in Yuba county, in exchange for a certain apartment house in Alameda county belonging to the defendant, the respective parties agreeing to convey their properties free and clear of all incumbrances. The contract contains various covenants and conditions, and also a provision—the one principally involved in this case—reading as follows:

"The parties hereto further mutually covenant and agree that they will each pay to Herman Eppinger, Jr., a commission of eighteen hundred and twenty-five dollars."

The contract was executed in triplicate, and a copy of it was left with Eppinger. It appears that this contract was entered into as a result of the efforts of Eppinger, but was never consummated by an exchange of the properties; notwithstanding which it is the claim of the plaintiff that he is entitled, as the assignee of Eppinger, to recover from the defendant the sum of $1,825 under the clause of the contract above set out.

The evidence shows that the defendant was ready, able, and willing to carry out his part of the contract, and that he made several ineffectual efforts to that end, and on July 3, 1914, made a formal tender of his deed, and thereupon deposited it in the Oakland Bank of Savings, with instructions to deliver it to Fletcher at any time within ten days upon receipt of Fletcher's deed to the land agreed by him to be conveyed. Fletcher was immediately notified of this deposit, and like notice was given to plaintiff's assignor; but Fletcher, within the time limited by the contract or by the aforesaid notice or at all, made no conveyance to the defendant of the lands agreed by him to be transferred, nor any tender of a deed; and the evidence upon the trial showed that as to part of the land he possessed no title, and that subsequently Fletcher, by his attorney in fact, and the defendant entered into an agreement rescinding the contract of May 2, 1914, and reciting that Fletcher was unable to carry out its terms. The question to be decided is whether under these circumstances the defendant is entitled by virtue of the provision of the contract already set forth to recover from the defendant the sum of $1,825. The trial court held, and we think correctly, that he could not.

[1, 2] There can be no doubt that if A. employs B. to procure from C. a binding agreement to exchange his property for that of A., B. has performed his contract and earned his compensation when he has procured such agreement, notwithstanding the fact that C.'s title proves to be defective, and no exchange of properties takes place. Jauman v. McCusick, 166 Cal. 517, 137 Pac. 254; Roche v. Smith, 176 Mass. 595, 58 N. E. 152, 51 L. R. A. 510, 79 Am. St. Rep. 345; 19 Cyc. 270. But that is not this case.

While the theory of the plaintiff, as stated in his brief, is that there was an employment of Eppinger, by the defendant and Fletcher, the evidence discloses no such employment, and Eppinger's rights must depend entirely upon the contract actually entered into between the two contracting parties. Eppinger's connection with the matter is testified to by himself as follows:

"* * * I brought Dr. Jordan and Mr. Fletcher together and introduced them, and proposed different lines of trade to each one of them * * * and we finally got down to a basis of trade. Dr. Jordan wanted to go to see the land a second time. I told him I would not go and make a trip the second time until they drew up a contract what they were going to do if the land was satisfactory, and also showing me where I would come in, that I wanted my commission. On the strength of that this contract was drawn up before we went on the second trip."

The plaintiff's right to recover, then, must depend entirely upon the terms of the contract entered into between Fletcher and Jordan, to which Eppinger was not a party. Up to that point, so far as the evidence discloses, there was no obligation upon them to pay him anything. The object of the contract actually entered into was to provide for an exchange of the properties of the parties thereto, each agreeing to convey title free of incumbrances, and the provision there in for the payment of a commission to Eppinger must be construed in its relation to the whole contract. Quite apart from the evidence of Jordan, one of the parties to it, that as to him it was not his intention that any commission should be paid unless the exchange of lands was actually effected, such would be the natural and logical construction of the instrument. Unless and until the exchange was consummated the parties would receive no benefit from Eppinger's efforts; and, as we have seen, there was no obligation existing to pay Eppinger anything except that arising from the written agreement under consideration. The provision relating to such payment is not separable from the remainder of the contract; and certainly as to Jordan, when the other party to it found himself unable to comply with its terms and consented to its cancellation (Jordan already having a right to rescind it) the whole contract fell, the provision relating to Eppinger's compensation with the rest. If the broker should suffer any hardship from such construction it is one inherent in the form of the contract entered into, and which was the only means he chose for his protection. It would certainly be a greater hardship upon the defendant to require him to pay $1,825 for services from which he had received no benefit and which were for the greater part voluntarily rendered.

The case of Jauman v. McCusick, supra, cited by appellant, though very similar to the case at bar, contains one important difference, which renders the case inapplicable as an authority in plaintiff's favor. There the undertaking to pay the brokers was in terms for the procuring of a certain agreement of exchange which they in fact procured. In that case the court said (page 521 of 166 Cal., page 255 of 137 Pac.):

"It is no doubt the general rule that a broker authorized to sell real estate is not entitled to recover the agreed commission unless he shows that he has, in pursuance of his employment, and within the time limited therein, found a purchaser ready and willing to purchase the property on the terms specified (citing cases). Here, however, the defendant's agreement was not simply to pay a commission to the brokers upon their making a sale or exchange of the property. Her agreement was to pay $1,850 for their services in securing the particular agreement which was secured."

There is another material distinction to be noted between the two cases. In the one cited there was merely a mutual abandonment of the contract of exchange because of differences arising between the parties to it; whereas in the case at bar, in addition to the evidence of mutual rescission, it was shown that Fletcher was unable to perform, the title to part of the land, to wit, 50 acres, agreed by him to be conveyed being in another person.

[3] As to this 50 acres, the appellant asserts that there was no showing that Fletcher did not have a conveyance from the parties in whom title was shown to be, and consequently no showing that he was unable to comply with the contract. It is true that a man may take an option on land and agree to sell the land while the title is in another; but that doctrine has no application to the facts of this case, for here the defendant introduced in evidence a deed dated October 28, 1913, showing the title to the 50 acres in question to be in one Josephine Collins, and the prima facie presumption is that the title remained in that person at the time when performance was due from Fletcher, less than a year later. Section 1963, subd. 32, Code Civ. Proc.; Hohenshell v. South Riverside L. & W. Co., 128 Cal. 627, 631, 61 Pac. 371. It was incumbent upon the defendant to overcome the presumption. Dyar v. Stone, 23 Cal. App. 143, 145, 137 Pac. 269. It follows that no attempt having been made to do so the presumption is that Josephine Collins still held the title to that property, and the finding therefore of the court that Fletcher was unable to convey the 50 acres must be upheld.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SHELTON v. MICHAEL et al. (Civ. 1452.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 30, 1916.)

1. CONTRACTS — 184 — CONSTRUCTION CONTRACTS—JOINT AND SEVERAL LIABILITY.

A contract for the employment of a contractor to construct a road recited that "the parties of the first part" agreed to pay the contractor a specified compensation for building the road. The names of the persons who were to sign the contract as parties of the first part were not stated in the body thereof, and were only referred to as "settlers" of a named school district. It was signed by nine settlers, all of whom would be benefited by the construction of the road. Held that, under Civ. Code, § 1659, providing that where all the parties uniting in a promise receive some benefit from the consideration, their promise is presumptively joint and several, the contract was joint and several.

3. TRIAL — 252(12) — INSTRUCTIONS — APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where in an action on a joint and several contract signed by the 9 defendants, a witness testified that it was supposed that there would be about 12 who would sign, and one of the defendants told plaintiff, the other party to the contract, that he would not sign unless it was understood that 12 persons should sign, a requested instruction that if the writing was delivered by the 9 who signed it for the purpose of having plaintiff secure 12 signatures thereto, and it was the intention of the parties that the contract was not to become binding until 12 signatures were secured, there was no delivery, and the verdict must be for defendants, was properly refused because too broad under the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 604; Dec. Dig. —252(12).]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR — 216(1) — QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE — QUESTIONS NOT RAISED IN TRIAL COURT.

The court on appeal need not inquire whether an instruction directed to one of several defendants should have been given, where no such instruction was asked, but an instruction applicable to all the defendants was requested and properly refused, at least as to some of them, for want of evidence to justify it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Dec. Dig. —216(1); Trial, Cent. Dig. § 660.]

5. CONTRACTS — 183 — CONSTRUCTION CONTRACTS—AMOUNT OF LIABILITY OF PARTIES.

Where in the body of a contract for the construction by plaintiff of a road for defendants, defendants without limitation promised to pay for the work at a specified rate, the figures $25 after the signature of one of the defendants and the words "for the swamped road" after the signatures of two other defendants were too indefinite to limit the liability of the defendants to plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 780-785, 788; Dec. Dig. —183.]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR — 197(4) — QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE — QUESTIONS NOT RAISED IN TRIAL COURT.

Where the complaint, in an action on a contract, pleaded a contract to build a road and the answer did not allege a contract different from the one stated in the complaint, and when the contract was offered in evidence counsel for defendant objected on the ground of variance, in that the complaint alleged a joint and several contract, while the contract offered was joint, but said nothing about a variance because of a provision in the contract for building bridges, and no motion was made for nonsuit on the ground of variance, and no instruction was requested to the effect that plaintiff could not recover because he had not built bridges, the question of variance between the contract pleaded and the contract proved, which called for the building of a road and bridges, would not be considered because not sufficiently raised in the trial court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by George Shelton against D. B. Michael and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Charles Kasch, of Ukiah, for appellants. Robert Duncan, of Ukiah, for respondent.

ELLISON, Judge pro tem. The complaint in this action sets forth: That in October, 1914, the defendants (there are 9 of them) entered into a written contract with plaintiff, in and by which he agreed to construct a wagon road in Mendocino county (describing it), and for his compensation therefor the defendants agreed to pay him $2 per rod for all that portion thereof that had not been swamped out, and $1.50 per rod for all that had been swamped. That in pursuance of said contract he built 489 rods of road that had been swamped out, and 316¼ rods of road which had not been swamped out, and that the agreed price therefor was $1,367.50. That he had been paid on account thereof $300, and there is still due and unpaid to him for constructing said road the sum of $1,067.50, for which amount judgment was asked. The answer is: First, a general denial of all the allegations of the complaint. It then affirmatively alleges that defendant, on October 17, 1914, entered into a contract with plaintiff to build the road for the prices per rod stated in the complaint, and this is followed by:

"That it was expressly understood and agreed by and between the plaintiff and these defendants that before said contract should be made effective and binding on these defendants, or any of them, plaintiff should procure the signatures to said contract of A. E. Arens, Mrs. Ollie Sparks, and Mike Lynch, and it was an express condition and part of the consideration for the signatures of these defendants that plaintiff should secure 12 signatures to said agreement before these defendants, or any of them, should be bound by their said signatures; that it was never intended by plaintiff and these defendants that said contract should be made until at least 12 signatures were appended thereto."

It also alleged that the defendant did not construct the road in a good and workmanlike manner, and did not grade it seven feet wide, as provided in the contract. That large trees were left in the road, making it impossible for travel. Trial was had with a jury, which found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the amount sued for. This was followed by a judgment, from which this appeal is taken, as well as from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

No point is made on this appeal that defendants sustained the defense alleged of improper work being done, or that the roadbed was not graded according to contract. The principal point relied upon for a reversal is that defendants, by their evidence, sustained the defense set forth in their answer to the effect that the contract was not to be considered executed until at least 12 settlers had signed it, and that it was delivered to the plaintiff upon condition that it was not to be effective until such number of signatures had been obtained, and that the court erred in not giving certain instructions requested by them applicable to such defense.

For a proper understanding of counsel's position, and the ruling of the court in refusing to instruct as requested, it becomes necessary to consider the legal effect of the contract sued upon and the testimony bearing upon its alleged execution and the instructions requested.

[1] 1. The contract appears in full in the record, and upon a reading of it, it is noticed: First, that the names of the persons who were to sign it as parties of the first part are not stated in the body thereof. They are only referred to in the first paragraph as "settlers" of a certain named school district in Mendocino county. It contains no provision that it is not to become a binding contract until signed by at least twelve settlers. Upon this point it is silent. It creates a joint and several liability:

"The parties of the first part agree to pay George Shelton, party of the second part, $2.00 per rod for building the road," etc.

The record shows that there were some 12 or more persons owning land in Mendocino county, upon which was timber suitable for making ties and tan bark. There was no road leading from any public highway to these lands, and no way to get the ties and tan bark out. All these settlers and landowners were interested in getting a road to these lands. Witness George Shelton testified:

"I know all the defendants. They own redwood lands in this county and some tanbark."

Some of these settlers met at the store of one McFaul to take steps to get the road constructed to these lands. All of the 9 persons who signed the contract were settlers, and would be benefited by the construction of the road. Section 1659 of the Civil Code provides:

"Where all the parties who unite in a promise receive some benefit from the consideration, whether past or present, their promise is presumed to be joint and several."

From the facts disclosed by the record, considered in the light of this code provision, it must be held that the contract is joint and several.

[2-4] 2. The testimony bearing upon the execution of the contract may be summarized as follows: C. A. McFaul, a witness for the defendants, testified that the contract was drawn in his office, and first given to Mr. Michael, one of the defendants, to get signatures. He was to get particular signatures in a particular part of the county. Mrs. Olive Sparks was expected to sign. Mike Lynch was supposed to sign. After Mr. Michael succeeded in getting some signatures, the contract was turned over to Mr. Shelton. He was to get signers and see Mike Lynch. "It was supposed there should be 12 at least who would sign." The defendant, D. B. Michael, testified:

"I had an understanding with Mr. Shelton relative to getting signatures to it. We had a contract drawn up, and I signed it first, and was to take it and get all the signatures I could in my neighborhood, and he was to take it and get the rest down the coast. I secured the signatures I agreed to get. Mr. Shelton and I had a conversation relative to the number of people who should sign the contract before it would become binding. There were supposed to be 12 signatures. I said to Mr. Shelton that if we could not get over one half dozen, or something like that, I didn't want it, because I could not afford to pay that much for the road. After I procured the signatures I agreed to procure, I sent the contract to Mr. Shelton."

The defendant Ben Bond testified:

"I told him (plaintiff) that I would not put my name to the contract unless it was understood that all of 12 signers should be on the contract. That was agreeable to Mr. Shelton. Mr. Michael had the contract when I signed it, and Mr. Shelton was not present. There are 12 settlers in that country who would be benefited by the road, and I thought they probably all would sign it."

The above is the substance of all the evidence bearing upon this feature of the case.

3. Several instructions were asked by the defendants as to this phase of the case, but they were all refused; and this refusal is assigned as reversible error. The instructions were all similar to instruction 8, and a quotation of it will be sufficient. It is as follows:

"Gentlemen, a delivery on condition is not a complete delivery until the condition is fulfilled. If you find in this case that the writing in evidence was delivered by those who signed it for the purpose of having Mr. Shelton secure 12 signatures thereto, and that it was the intention of the parties that it was not to become binding until 12 signatures were secured, then I charge you, there was no delivery, and you must find for the defendants."

It is not reversible error to refuse a requested instruction that is not applicable to the evidence, or that presents an erroneous theory of the case.

Referring back to the testimony, it will be observed that the witness McFaul is not one of the defendants. His testimony is not to the effect that there would be no contract unless so many as 12 signed it. His language is indefinite. "It was supposed there would be about 12 who would sign." The defendant Michael used no language as a witness from which the conclusion can be drawn that he signed it upon the condition that it was to be inoperative unless 12 signatures were obtained to it. The defendant Bond used language more definite and certain. No one of the other 7 defendants gave any testimony of any understanding or agreement as to the number of signatures it was expected there would be to the contract, or that any of them ever heard of the matter before the trial.

The instruction requested embraced all of the defendants. It is apparent from the evidence above referred to that the instruction was not applicable to it and was too broad. There was no evidence (as the instruction assumed) that any one of 8 of the defendants signed the paper for the purpose of having Mr. Shelton secure 12 signatures to it, and no evidence that it was the intention of said eight defendants, or any of them, that the contract was not to become binding until 12 had signed it. These 8 defendants signed a joint and several contract without any limitation or condition and it would have been error for the court to have instructed the jury as to them and their liability in the language of the refused instruction. Whether such an instruction directed to the defendant Bond alone should have been given, we need not inquire, as no such instruction was asked.

In the notes to Benton Company v. Boddicker, 105 Iowa, 548, 75 N. W. 632, 45 L. R. A. 321, 67 Am. St. Rep. 310, is found quite a full collection of decisions upon the signing of contracts upon an understanding that they were not to be operative until signed by others. We make the following quotation therefrom:

"One who signs a joint and several bond cannot excuse himself from liability upon the ground that it appears on the face of the bond that it was intended to be signed by others who did not sign, unless he declared at the time that he would not be bound unless such signatures were obtained."

"The requirement that others shall sign must amount to a condition that the bond shall not take effect without its performance, as distinguished from a mere expectation that others shall sign."

See, also, City of Los Angeles v. Mellus, 59 Cal. 444.

4. There was no error in admitting the contract sued upon in evidence. The alleged error is predicated upon the assumption that the complaint alleges a joint and several contract, and that the contract introduced was not such. The complaint nowhere attempts to designate the contract as either joint or several or joint and several. We have already declared that, in our opinion, the contract was joint and several.

[5] It is claimed that as the figures "$25" appear after the signature of the defendant Stevens and the words "for the swamped road" after the signatures of defendants Bond and Moller, the contract shows they had only assumed a limited liability, Stevens only for the sum of $25 and the other two named defendants only for money to become due on the part of the road designated as "swamped." In the body of the contract, those defendants, without limitation, promised to pay for the construction of the road, and the words following their signatures are too indefinite to limit their liability. As counsel for respondent suggests, they may have been intended as mere memoranda to be used in some settlement to be made between the defendants.

The case is readily distinguishable from Moss v. Wilson, 40 Cal. 162, relied upon by appellant. In that case the contract provided:

"The undersigned settlers * * * will pay the sum annexed to their names."

No such provision is found in this contract. In that case it does not appear that the signers had a joint interest in the act to be accomplished. The record in this case abundantly shows that all the signers were decidedly interested in having the road constructed.

[6] In the brief of appellant, it is stated:

"There is a variance in that a different contract was proved than the one alleged. The plaintiff pleaded a contract to build a road, and proved a contract to build a road and bridges. The plaintiff testified that he did not build any bridges, and that it was understood at the time that he was not to."

This is followed by the statement that the plaintiff did not prove performance of the contract he introduced in evidence.

No point is made in counsel's brief that the court erred in admitting proof that it was understood that plaintiff was not to build the bridges. He could not well make such claim, in view of the fact that most of the evidence along this line was brought out by him upon cross-examination of witnesses. Waiving the question whether the contract as to building road and as to building bridges is severable, we think appellant did not raise the point now contended for with sufficient seriousness in the trial court to permit him to ask for a decision upon it here. The answer set up two separate defenses, but in neither did it allege the contract was different from the one stated in the complaint. When the contract was offered in evidence, counsel objected on the ground of variance, in that the complaint alleged a joint and several contract, and the contract offered was joint, but said nothing about a variance because of the provision for building bridges. No motion was made for a nonsuit upon the ground of variance. No instruction was requested to the effect that plaintiff could not recover because he had not built the bridges. Neither court nor counsel were in any way apprised that this point was relied upon or would be. If timely notice had been given thereof in some of the ways suggested, perhaps plaintiff would have asked leave to amend his complaint to show why he had not built the bridges. An examination of the record fails to disclose that the trial court ruled upon the point, or was asked to except by objections to two questions near the end of the trial, and counsel in his brief does not assign these rulings as error, and could not well do so, in view of the condition of the record at the time the objections were made. Besides, the evidence that was admitted without objection makes it clear that it was never intended the plaintiff should build the bridges, or if such intent existed at the time the contract was written, it was waived and abandoned by mutual consent. The plaintiff testified:

"I did not build the bridges. I had nothing to do with the bridges. It was the understanding that Michael was to put them in. All the parties said I was not to build the bridges. At the time the contract was signed, it was understood I was not to build the bridges."

The witness McFaul testified:

"Michael said he would build them [the bridges] on the same day the contract was drawn up."

The defendant Michael testified:

"At the time the contract was drawn, I said we should have some arrangement made about these bridges, and said at the time I would build the bridges for $300 if no one else wants to. I heard Mr. Shelton say that he would not have anything to do with the bridges. I have heard these others say they have heard him say so."

It was not error to admit evidence to prove that money was not deposited in bank as provided in the contract.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

SAN DIEGO COUNTY v. UTT et al.
(L. A. 3689.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 18, 1916.)

1. PLEADING — 37 — AVERMENTS — FACTS NOT AVERRED.

A pleading cannot be aided by reason of facts not averred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 87, 88; Dec. Dig. — 37.]

2. PLEADING — 8(15) — CONCLUSIONS OF PLAIDER — FRAUD.

Fraud cannot be charged epithetically, but the facts showing the fraud, and not a mere conclusion, must be pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 28½; Dec. Dig. — 8(15).]

3. DISTRICT AND PROSECUTING ATTORNEYS — 10 — ACTIONS AGAINST COUNTY OFFICERS — FRAUD — COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY.

A complaint alleged that defendant, the assistant district attorney of a county, who occupied a position of trust and confidence, and whose duty it was to represent the interest of the county in all matters pertaining to easements or rights of way and for the construction of highways and in contracts between individuals and corporations dealing with or conveying to the county easements over their lands, induced the highway commissioners of the county to change the route of a road for which bonds had been voted, so that it crossed a ranch owned by a corporation in which defendant was interested at a different place, and that he induced the commissioners, in consideration of receiving a grant of a right of way, to fence the right of way; the cost of the fencing greatly exceeding the value of the land conveyed. There were general averments of fraud. Under Laws 1907, p. 666, the highway commission, consisting of three members, required to give bonds for the faithful performance of their duties, was required to prepare specifications and plans for the highway, which were to be submitted with recommendations to the board of supervisors, who might either adopt or reject them. The supervisors were authorized, on recommendation of the commission, to cause any highway to be widened, straightened, or altered. Held, that, as the district attorney was the legal adviser of the board of supervisors, and there was no averment of fraud on his part or on the part of the highway commission or supervisors, the complaint did not state a cause of action for the fraud of defendant authorizing the county to recover the difference between the value of the highway and the fences erected.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

Action by the County of San Diego against Lewis J. Utt and another. From a judgment sustaining a general demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. S. Utley, Dist. Atty., of San Diego (James O'Keefe and E. L. Davin, both of San Diego, of counsel), for appellant. Lewis J. Utt, of San Diego, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. The complaint herein sought to charge a breach of trust upon the part of the defendant Utt, resulting in injury, to the plaintiff and in advantage to defendant Utt, as a stockholder in the Utt Investment Company, defendant. The breach of trust charged was the asserted fraudulent efforts of defendant Utt, resulting in success, whereby the plaintiff was induced to enter into a contract with the Utt Investment Company, by which the defendant investment company conveyed to the county a certain strip of land as and for a main highway, which land it is asserted was worth but $260. In return for this the plaintiff agreed to fence and did fence the line of this highway, at an expense of $1,000. A decree was sought declaring the contract to be void ab initio and awarding the plaintiff a large sum as damages. A motion to strike out certain paragraphs of the complaint was made and granted. Thereafter a general demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and plaintiff, refusing to amend, has appealed from the judgment which followed.

It first complains of the court's ruling in striking out portions of the complaint. This consideration may be addressed to the complaint as it originally stood; for, if the original complaint did not state a cause of action, the court's ruling in striking out portions of it need not be reviewed. The essential allegations are:

That the defendant Utt Investment Company, a corporation, owned a ranch known as Agua Tibla ranch, situated some 70 miles from the city of San Diego. The capital stock of the corporation "was distributed amongst the said defendant Lewis J. Utt and his relatives, and is still held by them." Defendant Utt at all the times mentioned was the duly appointed, qualified, and acting assistant district attorney of the county of San Diego. As such officer he occupied a position of trust and confidence in his dealings with the county. Amongst his duties was to represent the interests of the county "in all matters pertaining to the county in all easements or rights of way for the construction of highways, * * * and in all contracts had between individuals and corporations dealing with or conveying to the said county of San Diego easements over their lands for the construction of said public highways."

The county of San Diego had voted bonds in the sum of $1,250,000 for the construction of public highways in the county, "according to the report of the highway commissioners appointed by the board of supervisors of the county of San Diego to lay out main public highways in the said county." As a part of this system there was projected "a main public highway running through the said ranch and over and along the old road theretofore and for many years prior thereto used as a public highway." "At the instance and request of Utt the route prescribed in the report to the highway commissioners, was changed and altered so that the same, instead of running about a mile and a half or two miles south of the house of said defendants on the Agua Tibia Ranch, was moved to within a distance of approximately a quarter of a mile of said house, which change necessitated the building and construction of about four miles more road than would have been necessary had the preliminary route selected and designated by the highway commissioners been followed. That in the building and construction of the new route so changed at the instance and request of the said defendant Lewis J. Utt, as aforesaid, it was necessary to build and construct certain bridges at a cost to the county of San Diego of the sum of $2,000, or thereabouts, which bridges would have been unnecessary had the said old line been followed, as was intended by the highway commissioners appointed to lay out the route of roads to be built and constructed pursuant to the provisions of the statute, under which said bonds were voted, and which bridges so constructed were of great use and benefit to the said defendant and improved and benefited lands of said defendants, and rendered the same more valuable. That the said highway commissioners, intended to improve the old road so running through the said Agua Tibia ranch as a part of the main public highways to be constructed under the said bond election, and not to lay out or build a new road through the said Agua Tibia ranch, and not acquire any new right of way through said ranch of defendant." While defendant Utt was acting in his official capacity as assistant district attorney of the county, and while he was acting as counsel for and representing the interests of the county "in the matter of any change of routes of highways to be built pursuant to said bond election, and while the said defendant Lewis J. Utt, was a member of and acting as counsel and agent for the said Utt Investment Company, he, the said defendant Lewis J. Utt, prepared a contract and procured the same to be executed, to which contract the said county of San Diego and the Utt Investment Company were parties, whereby it was agreed and provided that the new public highway" should be built along the new route. The Utt Investment Company agreed to convey to the county of San Diego the necessary land for a right of way. It did so, and conveyed 13.2 acres of land, of the value of $260 and no more. The contract further provided that the county should build a hog wire fence, two cattle passes, and one hogway for the transportation of stock on the lands of the Utt Investment Company across the highway. The county did this, at an actual cost of $1,000, and "by reason of the change of said route the cost of the new bridges rendered necessary thereby was the sum of $2,000 or thereabouts." That at the time of the execution of this agreement the cost and value of the improvements agreed to be erected by the county "were not known to the said county of San Diego, nor to the board of supervisors thereof, nor to any officer or person authorized to represent the said county of San Diego other than the said defendant, said Lewis J. Utt," and the same allegation is made touching the cost of the construction of the bridges. "That the said county of San Diego, at the time of the making of said contract herebefore alleged, was induced in the making of the said contract by the fraud of the said defendant Lewis J. Utt, and that the execution of the said contract on the part of the said Utt Investment Company and the said Lewis J. Utt was a fraud on the said county of San Diego, and the said action on the part of the said Lewis J. Utt in the making and executing of the said contract was a breach of the trust relation then existing between the said Lewis J. Utt and the said county of San Diego."

The defendant Utt knew that the land which the Utt Investment Company conveyed to the county of San Diego was of no greater value than $260, and knew that the reasonable value of the fencing constructed in pursuance of the agreement was $1,000, and "he fraudulently, and in breach of his duty, and in violation of said trust relation to and with the said county of San Diego, caused and procured the said contract to be executed by and between the said Utt Investment Company and the said county of San Diego." The Utt Investment Company executed and delivered to the county of San Diego its deed for the lands for a highway, "and caused said easement to be recorded." "The benefits accruing to said lands belonging to said defendants were and are of the reasonable value of $7,500, and no damage has accrued or will accrue to said lands of said defendants because of the construction of said highway." In doing these things "defendant took advantage of his official position as such assistant district attorney, and took advantage of the confidential relationship which existed between him and the said county of San Diego, and thereby did fraudulently, willfully, and deceitfully, and in violation of said confidential relationship, and of the trust so existing between said county of San Diego and himself as such assistant district attorney, cause and procure the county of San Diego to expend in the building and construction of said improvements" the sum of $3,000. The contract with the county of San Diego "was executed without authority of law," and is "against public policy and void. The said county of San Diego has no authority, right, or power to enter into said agreement, nor to construct or build the said improvements."

For the understanding of the allegations of this complaint something first must be said of a matter treated lightly therein—the duties and powers of the highway commission and of the supervisors of the county in the matter of the construction of the main highways for which the bonds were voted and sold. This will be found in the statutes of 1907 at page 666:

"Said highway commission shall consist of three members, who shall be, * * * especially qualified to have charge of the improvement of highways, * * * shall give a bond for the faithful performance of his duties." Section 2.

When the bonds have been sold the commission proceeds to prepare detailed specifications, plans, and profiles for the work to be done, with power to hire assistance to this end, and when this work is done they present their specifications, plans, and profiles with their recommendations to the board of supervisors, who either adopt or reject them. If the board adopts, contracts are called for after advertisement, and the board may reject any or all bids. The commission, with the consent of the supervisors, hires "all necessary engineers, inspectors, and superintendents to supervise the performance of said contract, or to have charge of the doing of said work without contract." Section 9. Whenever the highway commission shall deem it necessary, the supervisors may, on its recommendation, "cause any highway they propose to improve to be widened, straightened or altered, and for that purpose they may acquire land in the name of the county by donation or purchase, and may order the condemnation." Section 11.

[1, 2] With this statement of the law before us, we are prepared to consider the materiality and sufficiency of the averments of the complaint. Before doing so, however, it becomes necessary to remind the district attorney that the power of this court in dealing with the sufficiency of a complaint is limited to the facts pleaded in the complaint, and, however interesting or however valuable may be his statements of fact de hors the record, it can only be said concerning them that, if they were material to the charge, they should have found their place in the complaint, and if not found in the complaint they have no place in his brief. Also it may be added that if it were enough to charge fraud epithetically the complaint undoubtedly is adequate. But the test of its sufficiency rests, not upon its epithets, but upon its facts.

[3] What, then, are the facts which either distinctly appear by averment, or, being matters of law, must so far as the pleading is concerned be taken as true against the pleader. They may be summarized: The defendant Utt was assistant district attorney of the county, and was in his official capacity the legal adviser of the highway commission. This commission was composed of men especially qualified to have charge of the development of the highways. At the suggestion of the assistant district attorney they made a change in the route of one of the highways. This they had the power to do. Under the arrangement, agreement, and contract to this effect, the defendant Utt was to secure the conveyance of some 13 acres of land as a route for the highway. This he did. The highway commissioners, subject to the approval of the supervisors, were to build a fence along the line of the highway. The value of the land conveyed was $260, while the cost of the fence was $1,000. Pleading here, it is to be noted that no reflection in this pleading is cast upon the highway commissioners. Yet, if there is any foundation for the charge of fraud against defendant Utt, his evil machinations could have been accomplished only because the highway commission itself deliberately joined with him in the fraud, or else because the members of the commission were utterly incompetent to fill their positions. Neither of these things is charged, nor are the members or their bondsmen made defendants, and it is a necessary inference, therefore, that these highway commissioners were both upright and competent, and, with knowledge of all these matters, agreed to the contract, and did not find in it the disparity in values here alleged, or that, if there were such a disparity in values, the public interests, for other reasons (as the delay and expense and uncertainty of condemnation), made the contract desirable. But this is not all. The highway commission, under its powers, does nothing more than report to the supervisors. They in turn, with expert advice and legal assistance, adopt or reject these plans and contracts. Since it is charged that the work under this agreement, which up to this time was purely executory, was performed, it is an unescapable conclusion that the supervisors did so approve. It is not charged that defendant Utt deceived the supervisors. It is not even charged that he advised them, and their legal adviser was the district attorney himself. Presumptively the latter advised them. We have therefore a second review of the equities of this contract and the adequacy of its consideration by a second discerning board, which body approved this contract. But the only way this is met is by an averment of ignorance upon the part of the supervisors and other county officials of a knowledge which in the performance of their duties they were bound to possess. Nor is this all. For, waiving this consideration, the supervisors, their agents, and the agents of the highway commission, could not have been ignorant of the cost of this work at the time when they were about to enter upon the actual construction of the fence. Here was ample opportunity for withdrawal and rescission; yet there is no withdrawal nor rescission and the fence is constructed.

What, then, does this complaint amount to? The defendant Utt was the legal adviser of the highway commission, composed of upright, qualified men; they agreed to a change of highway; in consideration of a fence which the county should build there should be conveyed by the land company, in which the defendant was interested, a strip of land for this highway. The contract to that effect was submitted to and approved by the commission and board of supervisors. The county, with full knowledge of the cost of the consideration which was to pay for this strip of land, paid that consideration by constructing the fence. After all this has been done the county institutes an action charging fraud because of an asserted disparity between the value of the land and the cost of the fence. In so doing it fails to implead the highway commissioners and the board of supervisors. Yet there could have been no fraud excepting through their gross ignorance or deliberate design, and the county seeks to exculpate itself upon the ground that its officers were ignorant of that which it was their legal duty to know. True it is that it is declared that the county of San Diego was induced to execute the contract by the fraud of defendant Utt, but no fact is stated showing how, in what way, he did or could have so induced the county to enter into it, or could have caused them to perform it after they had entered into it. An abuse of confidence is asserted, but it is accompanied by no single averment of fact showing how defendant Utt—merely the legal adviser of the commission—could have abused its confidence in the matter of land values and added cost of construction, knowledge of which it was their especial duty to have. Kisling v. Shaw, 33 Cal. 441, 91 Am. Dec. 644. Fraud is not to be inferred even when epithetically charged, and, saving for the epithets, there is nothing in this complaint that militates against the uprightness and fair dealing of the defendant Utt. The demurrer was therefore properly sustained.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WILLIAMS v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO.
(Sac. 2240.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 14, 1916.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT — 137(4) — OPERATION OF TRAINS—CARE REQUIRED.

An engineer operating a train on the railroad right of way at the usual speed and with adequate working equipment need not watch for an employé conversant with the tracks and the traffic, and his duty is fulfilled if, on the discovery of the employé's presence on the tracks, he adopts reasonable precautions to avoid injuring him.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT — 236(15)—INJURIES TO PERSON ON TRACK — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A boy 17 years old employed as night watchman by a railroad company was struck by a train while walking with his back to the train along a track with whose use he was familiar, as to the danger of which use he had been warned, and as to which danger he knew. Held, that he was guilty of contributory negligence as a matter of law.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT — 13—REGULATION OF EMPLOYMENT — "MANUFACTURING, MECHANICAL, OR MERCANTILE ESTABLISHMENT, OR OTHER PLACE OF LABOR."

St. 1911, pp. 282, 910, limiting the hours of employment of minors when employed "in laboring in any manufacturing, mechanical, or mercantile establishment, or other place of labor," to nine hours a day, except when it is necessary to make repairs to prevent the interruption of the ordinary running of the machinery, forbid the employment of minors for more than nine hours a day in manufacturing, mechanical, mercantile, and other like establishments, but does not forbid the employment by a railroad company of a minor as watchman to watch a tunnel and to keep suspicious characters from loitering in or about the same.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT — 13—REGULATION OF EMPLOYMENT—HOURS.

St. 1911, pp. 282, 910, providing that no minor under 18 shall be employed or permitted to work between 10 o'clock in the evening and 5 o'clock in the morning, forbids the employment of any minor under 18 in any occupation between the hours of 10 p. m. and 5 a. m.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 14; Dec. Dig. —13.]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT — 13—REGULATION OF EMPLOYMENT—STATUTES—CONSTRUCTION.

A statute forbidding the employment of minors for more than a given number of hours a day or during certain named hours is enacted within the police power for the protection of minors, and the statute is violated only by the illegal time of employment, and not merely by an illegal contract of employment when under it no illegal period of employment has taken place.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT — 356 — REGULATION OF EMPLOYMENT — STATUTORY PROVISIONS—LIABILITY.

Under the provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1911, p. 796), that it shall be conclusively presumed that an employé was not guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation by the employer of any statute enacted for the safety of employés contributed to his injury, an employer who has violated a statute enacted for the safety of his employés is deprived of the defense of contributory negligence only where the violation contributed to an injury, and where an injury to an employé results during the course of employment under a contract forbidden by law as to certain of its terms, it must appear that the doing by the employé of the act forbidden to the employer contributed in some manner to his injury, to defeat the defense of contributory negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. —356.]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT — 356—REGULATION OF EMPLOYMENT—VIOLATION BY EMPLOYER —LIABILITY.

A boy under 18 years was employed by a railroad company as watchman from 12 o'clock noon to 12 o'clock midnight, in violation of St. 1911, p. 282, declaring that no minor under 18 shall be employed or permitted to work between 10 o'clock p. m. and 5 o'clock a. m. The boy was struck by a train about 9:30 p. m. Held, that that the violation by the railroad company of the statute did not in any way contribute to the accident, and it was not deprived by Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1911, p. 796) of the defense of contributory negligence.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkert, Judge.

Action by Theodore Williams against the Southern Pacific Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

George F. Buck, of Stockton, for appellant. J. W. Hawkins and F. O. Hoover, both of Modesto, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought by Theodore Williams in his own behalf and that of his wife, seeking a recovery for the death of their son, charged to have been occasioned by the negligence of the defendant. The complaint alleged that Glen L. Williams, the son, was on the 8th day of October in the employ of the defendant as a watchman on its railroad right of way near the station of Tormey in Contra Costa county, Cal., and that he had been employed by the defendant for some time prior to the 8th day of October; that by the terms of his employment he was required "to work and be on duty as such watchman daily from 12 o'clock noon to and until 12 o'clock midnight," and that he was "employed by the defendant to act as such watchman and to work and to be on duty from 12 o'clock noon of each day to and until 12 o'clock midnight of each day"; that on the 8th day of October Glen Williams was 17 years, 4 months, and 20 days of age; that on the 8th day of October, "while said Glen L. Williams, was employed by said defendant as a watchman, as aforesaid, and while the said Glen L. Williams was on duty as such watchman, and while said Glen L. Williams was regularly performing his duties as such watchman, he was struck by a train operated by the defendant," and on the following day died of the injuries thus sustained. Plaintiff alleged "the fact to be that the defendant was negligent in the operation of said train which struck said Glen L. Williams in that the said defendant did not warn the said Glen L. Williams of the approach of said train, and no warning bell or whistle was sounded, and by reason of the failure of the defendant to so warn the said Glen L. Williams and to sound a whistle or to sound a bell the said Glen L. Williams was unable and did not observe the approach of said train, and was run down and struck by said train, and died as a result of the injuries received thereby." The answer admitted that Glen L. Williams was on the 8th day of October in the employ of the defendant as a watchman on the railroad right of way of defendant, and that he had been so employed for some time prior to the 8th day of October. It also admitted that "by the terms of said employment Glen L. Williams was required by said defendant to work and be on duty as such watchman daily from 12 o'clock noon to and until 12 o'clock midnight," and that he was "employed by the defendant to act as such watchman and to work and to be on duty from 12 o'clock noon of each day to and until 12 o'clock midnight of each day." The answer admitted that Glen L. Williams was struck by a train operated by defendant, but denied that at the time he was so struck he was acting in his employment as watchman, and denied that when he was so struck he was on duty as watchman, and denied that when struck he was in any way acting in the service of or performing any service for the defendant. And in this connection the answer affirmatively alleged that at the time he was so struck and injured he had left his place of duty as such watchman, in violation of the duties of his employment, and was a mere trespasser upon the railroad track when struck by the train. The answer further denied the allegations of negligence in the operation of the train, denied all negligence, and averred that the deceased "was struck by said train by reason of his own carelessness and negligence in failing to inform himself of the approach of defendant's train in time to step from defendant's railroad track and avoid being struck." The evidence disclosed that the deceased was of the age pleaded; that, at the solicitation of his uncle, who was the station agent at Tormey, he was employed as an extra watchman at tunnel No. 1, near the station of Tormey. His duties were to watch tunnel No. 1, and to keep all suspicious characters from loitering in or about the tunnel, so that no injury might be done to it. His hours of duty were from 12 o'clock noon to 12 o'clock midnight. He had been employed and had worked for about a week. Over this division, in railroad parlance, the trains move east and west, over double through line tracks, one being the track for the east-bound traffic, the other for the west-bound traffic. The station of Tormey by the railroad men is described as west of the station of Selby, and tunnel No. 1 is still further west of Tormey station—west being toward the city of Oakland, east being toward the city of Sacramento. The deceased's uncle, who had secured his employment, testified that he sent for the boy and when he came "looked him over and considered that he was a wide-awake lad, and so reported to the agent of the railroad company, who replied that it was all right and put him to work." Instructions touching his conduct and work were given to the deceased by his uncle. The uncle emphasized his instructions to the boy to keep off the "working tracks" and not to walk on a "live track." He was further instructed that if he walked on a live track to walk "facing the traffic," thus to walk to the west upon a track carrying eastbound traffic, and to the east upon a track carrying the west-bound traffic, so that any train would be visible because approaching him from the front. He was told of the imminent danger of walking on the live tracks because trains were liable to pass at any time, "and I told him that if he walked on a dead track he would never get hit." "If a man goes and kills himself by carelessness, that is up to him."

The deceased was killed by an east-bound express train, while walking with his back to the traffic; that is to say, while walking from the tunnel toward Selby upon the east-bound track. He was struck by a regular express train running at its schedule rate of speed and passing the place of the accident on schedule time, about 9:30 o'clock of the evening of October 8th. He was, of course, not at his post of duty—the tunnel—but had walked from the tunnel easterly past the Tormey station, and well on to the Selby station when the train struck him. He had been furnished a night lantern and instructed to get oil for his lantern from a Greek known as Nick Paul, whose home was on the line of the railroad between Tormey station and Selby and near to Selby. It is in evidence that he had stopped at Nick Paul's on his way to work to secure oil, but Paul was away, and he did not get it. It is fairly inferable from the evidence and from the condition of the oil cup of his lantern found after the injury, that his lantern had burned or was on the point of burning out, and that he had left the tunnel to go to Nick Paul's to secure more oil. In addition to the physical conditions already pointed out, it should be added that there was a bypath leading from the tunnel to Selby along the line of the railway tracks, over which one could walk with perfect security, and that the deceased's older brother had advised him to take this footpath or trail.

Touching the operation of the train, the uncontradicted testimony is that the engine was equipped with a powerful electric headlight, which was operating perfectly. Also it was equipped with an automatic bell which rang continuously. The engineer sounded his whistle after leaving the tunnel and taking the curve at Tormey. The train was moving at about 33 miles an hour. As near as the engineer could estimate, he was about 50 feet distant from the man when first he discovered him upon the track; his bell was ringing; he immediately sounded his whistle and applied the brakes, but not in time to prevent the accident. Because of the curve, the headlight did not illumine the track for any great distance ahead.

In addition to the general verdict which the jury returned in favor of the plaintiff, it was called upon to answer certain special issues submitted to it. The jury found that the deceased was struck while he was on the defendant's east-bound track, and that the defendant's engine bell was ringing as the train approached him; also that the whistle of the engine had been sounded after leaving the tunnel. The jury declared its inability to say whether or not the deceased was "in the possession of his faculties of sight and hearing" at the time of the accident, notwithstanding the fact that there was no evidence to show that he was not, and there was evidence to show that he was a wide-awake lad. It returned the same answer, "We do not know," to interrogatories asking them to declare whether or not Glen Williams "was unable to observe the approach of the train," and whether "as a matter of fact he was unable by the use of his eyesight or sense of hearing to observe the approach of defendant's train in time to have escaped injury." The jury further found that the defendant warned Glen Williams of the approach of the train by its bell only, and to the following compound question: "If you find that the defendant did not warn Glen Williams of the approach of the train and no warning bell or whistle was sounded, was the defendant negligent in any of those respects?" answered "Yes."

So far as we have gone the case presents no exceptional features. It is the usual one of damages for the death of an employé of a railroad, predicated upon allegations of the railroad's negligent operation of its train, and met in answer by a denial of this negligence, and a charge that the accident occurred solely through the negligence of the employé. We have thus at length set forth these evidentiary matters to illustrate the importance of certain instructions which the court gave, which instructions in their legal bearing differentiate this case from similar actions for damages.

[1, 2] Thus it is clear that the evidence fails to establish the negligent operation of the train charged against defendant. The train was being operated upon the defendant's private right of way at a usual speed, at a usual time, and under adequate working equipment. Upon the engineer of such a locomotive is not imposed the duty of watching for trespassers upon this right of way. His duty is fulfilled if upon the discovery of such a trespasser, at and after the time of the discovery, he adopts reasonable precautions to avoid injuring him. It is unquestioned that in this case the discovery was made at a time and under circumstances when, using the appliances at hand, it was impossible to stop the train in time to avoid striking the young man. We have used the word "trespasser." If the deceased be not regarded as a trespasser, but as an employé, conversant as this deceased was with the tracks and their traffic, still less reason had the engineer to suppose that such an employé would be upon the track at all, or, if upon the track, would not avail himself of the means ready at hand to step to one side to a place of safety. When all these matters are considered, in connection with the unquestioned negligence of the deceased in walking with his back to the traffic along a track with whose use he was perfectly familiar, as to the danger of which use he had been warned, and which danger he must have known, the conclusion is unescapable that he met his death solely through his own negligence, and that his uncle's language is sadly in point, "If a man goes and kills himself by carelessness, that is up to him."

Coming now to the matters which differentiate this case from the ordinary, at the time of this accident there stood upon our books two laws: First, an act regulating the employment and hours of labor of children, and prohibiting the employment of minors under certain ages. This law declared as follows:

"Section 1. No minor under the age of eighteen shall be employed in laboring in any manufacturing, mechanical, or mercantile establishment, or other place of labor, more than nine hours in one day, except when it is necessary to make repairs to prevent the interruption of the ordinary running of the machinery, or when a different apportionment of the hours of labor is made for the sole purpose of making a shorter day's work for one day of the week; and in no case shall the hours of labor exceed fifty-four hours in a week.

"Sec. 2. No minor under the age of eighteen years shall be employed or permitted to work between the hours of ten o'clock in the evening and five o'clock in the morning."

The remaining provisions of this law provided for permits, under which children of the specified ages might be exempted from the operation of the law and allowed to labor. No penalty was imposed for the violation of its terms. Stats. 1905, p. 11, as amended by Stat. 1911, p. 282. A similar enactment is found in the Statutes of 1911 at page 910. This later act contains language identical with sections 1 and 2 above quoted, and provides as a penalty for a violation of its terms a fine of not less than $50 or more than $200, and imprisonment for not more than 60 days, or both fine and imprisonment.

The second of these laws is an act relating to the liability of employers for injury or death sustained by their employés, section 1 of which is as follows:

"In any action to recover damages for a personal injury sustained within this state by an employé while engaged in the line of his duty or the course of his employment as such, or for death resulting from personal injury so sustained, in which recovery is sought upon the ground of want of ordinary or reasonable care of the employer, or of any officer, agent or servant of the employer, the fact that such employé may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery therein where his contributory negligence was slight and that of the employer was gross, in comparison, but the damages may be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employé, and it shall be conclusively presumed that such employé was not guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation of any statute enacted for the safety of employés contributed to such employé's injury." Stats. 1911, p. 796.

The court gave to the jury instructions tendered by both the defendant and the plaintiff. Those tendered by the defendant treated of the law of negligence and of contributory negligence in unobjectionable form. They were addressed, as usual, to different phases of the evidence. They declared, for example, that:

"The jury are instructed that if they believe from the evidence that the defendant exercised ordinary and reasonable care in warning the said Glen Williams of the approach of its train, then your verdict must be for the defendant."

Again:

"All that is required of the defendant is that it produce enough evidence to offset the effect of plaintiff's evidence, and if at the end of the case the plaintiff has not shown by a preponderance of evidence that the defendant was guilty of carelessness or negligence directly causing the accident or injury complained of, or if the evidence is equally balanced, then I instruct you that your verdict in this case must be in favor of the defendant."

Upon the other hand, at the request of the plaintiff, the court gave instructions which destroyed all the force and effect of the instructions to which we have just adverted. Or, if it be said that they did not destroy all their force and effect, then they left the law of the case before the jury in hopeless contrariety and confusion.

It is of the giving of these instructions last referred to that appellant complains. Their nature will be shown by the following extracts:

"III. You are instructed that the law provides that no minor under the age of eighteen years shall be employed in laboring in any manufacturing, mechanical or mercantile establishment or other place of labor more than nine hours in one day except when it is necessary to make repairs to prevent the interruption of the ordinary running machinery, or when a different apportionment of the hours of labor is made for the sole purpose of making a shorter day's work for one day of the week, and in no case shall the hours of labor exceed fifty-four hours in a week. The law also provides that no minor under the age of eighteen years shall be employed or permitted to work between the hours of ten o'clock in the evening and five o'clock in the morning.

"The law also provides that it shall be conclusively presumed that a person so employed was not guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation of a statute enacted for the safety of employés contributed to such employé's injury and it shall not be a defense.

"The law makes it unlawful to employ a minor under the age of eighteen years to work between the hours of ten o'clock in the evening and five o'clock in the morning, and making it unlawful to employ minors in places and establishments above named for more than nine hours in one day as I before instructed you are statutes enacted for the safety of employés.

"IV. Under the admissions of the defendant as to the age of the deceased at the time of his employment and as to the terms of the employment as regards the hours he was to work, you are instructed that the defendant violated the terms of the statute before referred to, and you are therefore instructed that the defendant is liable in damages regardless of the imprudence or negligence of the deceased if he was killed by defendant's train while he was engaged in the line of his duties or the course of his employment by defendant as appears by admissions of the defendant."

"VII. In this state the employment of a minor under the age of eighteen years to either work between the hours of ten p. m. and five a. m., or to work more than nine hours in a day in a manufacturing, mechanical or mercantile establishment or other place of labor, except when it is necessary to make repairs to prevent the interrupting of the ordinary running of machinery, or when different apportionment of the hours of labor is made for the sole purpose of making a shorter day's work for one day of the week or to work more than fifty-four hours in one week, is contrary to the law and unlawful and constitutes negligence per se; that is, it is negligence of itself. In case of such unlawful employment it is presumed that the employé is not guilty of contributory negligence and the employer is responsible to the father for the death of a minor child employed contrary to such law, if such minor child is injured while it is engaged in the line of its duty or the course of its employment.

"VIII. You are instructed that the defendant's allegation of contributory negligence cannot be considered by you if you find that the deceased met his death by reason of his employment by defendant in violation of the statute heretofore referred to regulating the hours during which a minor may be employed to work, and as the result of an accident which occurred while he was engaged in the line of his duty or the course of such employment."

The legal import of these instructions and the others of like character is this: That regardless of the imprudence or negligence of the deceased and of defendant's own negligence, the defendant is liable in damages under the provision of the Employers' Liability Act above quoted (Stats. 1911, p. 796), because of the admissions in the pleadings that the deceased was under 18 years of age, and by the terms of his employment was to labor more than nine hours a day, and by the terms of his employment was to labor between the hours of 10 p. m. and 5 a. m. These admissions the court by its instructions charged the jury met the conditions prescribed by the Employers' Liability Act, in that they established a violation of the statute enacted for the safety of employes, which violation "contributed to such employé's injury." Also by these instructions, as matter of law, the court told the jury that a minor employed as was this one, to watch a tunnel along a railroad right of way, came within the provisions of paragraph 1 of the act regulating the employment and hours of labor of children in this, that Glen Williams was, within the meaning of the law, "employed in laboring in a manufacturing, mechanical or mercantile establishment or other place of labor." And, finally, the court instructed the jury, as matter of law, that even though the employé's injury occurred before he had labored more than nine hours, in violation of the law, or although the employé's injury occurred earlier than 10 o'clock p. m. and not within the inhibited hours between 10 p. m. and 5 a. m., nevertheless if the contract of employment contemplated labor for more than nine hours, or during the inhibited hours, the employer was responsible because of this contract, even though in fact the injuries did not result when the employé was laboring more than the prescribed nine hours, or between the hours of 10 p. m. and 5 a. m., and without regard to the question whether his laboring during these forbidden times contributed to his injury.

That we have in no respect misunderstood and so misstated the purport of these instructions is conclusively established by the position which respondent's attorney, who proposed them, takes in regard to them. Thus he says:

"The court would certainly not, if this case were a prosecution for the violation of the statute, allow the defendant to say: 'Yes, we employed the boy to work twelve hours and he went to work under that understanding; but we are guiltless of unlawfully employing him, because the boy was killed just before he had completed nine hours of work.' Our contention is that every minute of the time of the engagement to work by the minor would have been of the prohibited character."

And again:

"The other branch of the statute is still less open to question as to its meaning. When it says no minor shall be 'employed or permitted to work between the hours of ten o'clock in the evening and five o'clock in the morning' it can mean nothing other than that the minor shall not be employed to work, or permitted to work, during the prohibited hours. That statute would certainly be violated the minute the minor became employed so to work."

That we may come directly to a consideration of the legal propositions thus presented, we will pass over appellant's contention that the complaint is legally insufficient to charge upon the matters covered by the instructions, and that it rests solely in its allegation of negligence upon the operation of the train.

[3] The first proposition which invites attention is this: Was the employment of the deceased within the purview of section 1 of the act prohibiting the employment of minors? That act, it will be noted, limits the hours of employment of minors to nine hours a day only when those minors are under the age of 18 and when they are employed "in laboring in any manufacturing, mechanical or mercantile establishment or other place of labor." Clearly this minor was not laboring in any manufacturing, mechanical, or mercantile establishment. The employment of a watchman to look out for a tunnel upon a railroad track is as foreign to employment in a manufacturing, mechanical or mercantile establishment, as would be the employment of a minor to herd sheep. What then is meant by the added phrase "or other place of labor"? If, as respondent contends, this throws wide open the door and includes all employments, then the previous limiting words "manufacturing, mechanical or mercantile establishment" become useless surplusage, and the law should have read and would have read, no minor under the age of 18 shall be employed "in any place of labor" or "at any labor." Unquestionably the statute meant to forbid the employment of minors for more than nine hours a day in manufacturing, mechanical, mercantile and other like establishments. Such is not only the uniform rule of construction under all of the authorities under the application of the familiar doctrines of noscitur a sociis and ejusdem generis, but it is borne out and made peculiarly cogent in the present statute by virtue of the language which immediately follows, by which language the law is not violated if the minor is employed for more than nine hours "when it is necessary to make repairs to prevent the interruption of the ordinary running of the machinery." So plain do we take this proposition to be, that it requires no further amplification, and it is sufficient to cite in its support Chapman v. Piechowski, 153 Wis. 356, 141 N. W. 259, 45 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687; Bucher v. Commonwealth, 103 Pa. 528; Raeder v. Bensberg, 6 Mo. App. 445; United States v. 1,150½ Pounds of Celluloid, 82 Fed. 627, 27 C. C. A. 231; Jensen v. State, 60 Wis. 577, 19 N. W. 374; Whitfield v. Terrell Compress Co., 26 Tex. Cr. App. 235, 62 S. W. 116; City of Lynchburg v. Norfolk & W. R. Co., 80 Va. 237, 56 Am. Rep. 592; Wicker v. Comstock, 52 Wis. 315, 9 N. W. 25. Since, then the deceased's employment did not come within the class where the hours were limited to nine hours a day, the consideration of this proposition comes to a close with the necessary declaration that the instructions to the jury so declaring were manifestly erroneous.

[4] However, it is indisputable that the law did forbid the employment of this or any minor in any occupation between the hours of 10 p. m. and 5 a. m. It is conceded that, under the terms of this minor's employment, it was contemplated that he should work during the forbidden hours between 10 p. m. and 12 midnight. And, finally, it is indisputable that he was not working during these forbidden hours when he met his death, that death by all the testimony, having occurred before 10 o'clock, and at about half past 9 o'clock. The next question presented for consideration, then, is the soundness of the court's instructions holding that by virtue of the defendant's admission that the terms of employment did include these two inhibited hours, the defendant had violated a statute designed for the protection of the employé, was therefore as matter of law conclusively guilty of negligence and was debarred from tendering in defense of this negligence any issue of the negligence of the deceased.

[5] We need not here be at great pains to discuss the question propounded by respondent and above quoted touching the meaning of the law if this action were an action to enforce a liability imposed for a violation of the statute (Stats. 1911, p. 910, supra), for this is not an action to enforce a penalty for a violation of the act. If it were so, the judgment could only be a judgment of fine, imprisonment, or both. Therefore we need not delay to consider whether the act is violated so far as concerns its penal provisions by a mere contract of employment, without illegal labor under that contract, or whether the forbidden labor must have been performed before liability under the contract attaches. Suffice it here to say that such laws are enacted in the exercise of the police power for the protection and well-being of minors, that protection and well-being taking the form of forbidding employers to use the services of such minors for more than a given number of hours or during certain named hours. And with this manifest purpose of the act in view, the uniform holding is that the law is violated by the illegal time of employment, and not merely by the illegal contract of employment when under it no illegal period of employment has taken place. Enough here to cite In re Spencer, 149 Cal. 396, 86 Pac. 896, 117 Am. St. Rep. 137, 9 Ann. Cas. 1105, where the statute declared that "no minor under the age of sixteen * * * shall be employed or permitted to work in any mercantile institution, etc.," and this court declared that the language meant "that no child under sixteen years of age shall work at any gainful occupation" during the inhibited hours, and that "* * * no minor under sixteen shall work in any mercantile institution" during the inhibited hours. In addition it is sufficient to cite State v. Deck, 108 Mo. App. 292, 83 S. W. 314; Fortune v. Hall, 122 App. Div. 250, 106 N. Y. Supp. 787; Commonwealth v. Riley, 210 Mass. 387, 97 N. E. 367, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 388; School Dist., etc., v. Dilman, 22 Ohio St. 194; People v. McKinney, 10 Mich. 54.

[6] We have said, and of course it is indisputable, that this is not an action to enforce a penalty for a violation of the statute. What in fact respondent's counsel here has sought to do, and what in the trial court he successfully did, was to invoke as applicable to the facts of his case the provision of the Workmen's Compensation Act above quoted, to the effect that:

"It shall be conclusively presumed that such employé was not guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation of any statute enacted for the safety of employés contributed to such employé's injury."

The meaning of this language is perfectly plain. It is that if an employer shall have violated any statute enacted for the safety of his employés, and this violation shall have contributed to an employé's injury, the employer shall not be allowed to avail himself of the defense of contributory negligence which otherwise would have been open to him. In the case of an action to enforce a penalty for the violation of the statute, the right of action is in no wise dependent upon the circumstances of injury or noninjury to the employé. In the civil action to recover damages, not only must injury be shown, but it must further be shown that the employer's violation of a statutory duty contributed to this injury. This language is not unusual, nor is any doubt left by the adjudications as to what is meant when the law declares that the violation of a statute must contribute to an employé's injury. Endless illustrations come readily to mind.

The law requires an automatic door or gate to be placed in front of every elevator used in business establishments. An employé, engrossed in reading a bill of lading, and forgetful of the absence of the gate, walking to the elevator falls down the shaft and is injured. The violation of the statutory duty to maintain the gate has contributed to the employé's injury, and the employer is forbidden to defend upon the ground that the negligence of the employé in reading the bill of lading when he approached the elevator contributed to his injury. But, upon the other hand, the same employé under the same circumstances, while walking to the elevator, stumbles over a box and so is injured. The employer is still in the same position touching his violation of a statutory duty, but that violation in no wise contributed to the employé's injury. So far as that particular accident was concerned, notwithstanding his violation of the statutory duty, the employer was not only not guilty of any negligence per se, but he was not guilty of any negligence at all, and he would not therefore be forbidden by the law to tender the issue of contributory negligence. Such has been the holding of this court, and of every court whose decisions have come under observation. Thus in McKune v. Santa Clara V. M. & L. Co., 110 Cal. 486, 42 Pac. 980:

"That the failure of any person to perform a duty imposed upon him by statute or legal authority is sufficient evidence of negligence has been repeatedly declared by this court. Siemens v. Eisen, 54 Cal. 418; Driscoll v. Market Street, etc., Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 553 [32 Pac. 591], 33 Am. St. Rep. 203. But the principle has this very obvious limitation: The act or omission must have contributed directly to the injury, or, however improper or illegal it may have been in the abstract, no action for damages can be founded upon it."

To like effect are Manning v. App. Con. Gold Mining Co., 149 Cal. 45, 84 Pac. 657; Thomas v. German General Benevolent Society, 168 Cal. 183, 141 Pac. 1186; Monson v. La France Copper Co., 39 Mont. 50, 101 Pac. 243, 133 Am. St. Rep. 549; Inland Steel Co. v. Yedinak, 172 Ind. 423, 87 N. E. 229, 139 Am. St. Rep. 391; St. L. & Iron Mt. Ry. v. McWhirter, 229 U. S. 265, 33 Sup. Ct. 858, 57 L. Ed. 1179; 21 Am. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 480.

Under this plainly established rule the determinative questions calling for answer are: Did defendant violate the statute, and, if it did, did this violation contribute to the deceased's injury? For, as is said in Inland Steel Co. v. Yedinak, supra, a case relied on by respondent:

"Appellant's insistence that a causal connection must be shown between the negligence charged and the injury complained of is undeniably true. A violation of these penal statutes constitutes negligence per se, but to make such negligence actionable it must be a proximate cause of the injury for which the action is brought."

[7] From what has been said it clearly follows that a mere contract of employment can never be a contributing cause to an injury.

Equally plain is it that if an injury results during the course of employment under a contract which is denounced and forbidden by the law as to certain of its terms, it must be shown that the employé's doing of the act, forbidden to the employer, in some manner contributed to his injury. To illustrate: A minor is employed to labor from 8 o'clock in the evening until 12 o'clock night. On the first day of his employment he labors for the full period. In engaging and permitting this employment the employer has violated the statute. On the second evening of his employment at 9 o'clock he is injured. He was not, at the time of his injury, working during any forbidden hour. His injury in no way could have been occasioned by the fact that he was employed to work between 10 and 12 o'clock at night because he was not even working between those hours when injury resulted. There is, therefore, no possible causal connection between the injury and the withdrawal of the protection of the statute. The fact that upon the day previous he had worked during illegal hours, and that his employer had thus violated the statute, was in no sense a contributing cause to his injury upon the following day at an hour of labor which the law did not forbid. The only connection between his injury and his labor was his contract of employment, or, in other words, that he was there laboring because he was there employed to labor. But this connection is not the causal connection—the contributing cause—which the law declares. So fundamentally true is this that even in statutes like this, where the hours of labor are limited by law, it must be shown not only that the employé was laboring during the forbidden or excessive hours, but that his injuries in some proximate way resulted from this fact. Such is the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in St. L. & Iron Mt. Ry. v. McWhirter, supra, where the statute prohibited a railroad from permitting an employé to remain on duty for a longer period than sixteen consecutive hours. The complaint specifically alleged that the employé was injured after he had remained on duty for more than sixteen hours. The judgment in his favor was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States because it was not sufficiently alleged nor shown that the violation of the statute was the proximate cause of the injury, that court saying:

"We say this because although the act carefully provides punishment for a violation of its provisions, nowhere does it intimate that there was a purpose to subject the carrier who allowed its employes to work beyond the statutory time to liability for all accidents happening during such period without reference to whether the accident was attributable to the act of working overtime. And we think that where no such liability is expressed in the statute it cannot be supplied by implication. It requires no reasoning to demonstrate that the general rule is that where negligence is charged, to justify a recovery it must be shown that the alleged negligence was the proximate cause of the damage."

The character of evidence necessary to prove such causation we need not point out, as it must depend upon the circumstances of each case. Conceding that a case could be presented where the mere proof of permitting work beyond the statutory time and the facts and circumstances connected with an accident might be of such a character as to justify not only the conclusion of negligence, but also the inference of proximate cause, such concession can be of no avail here, since the instruction of the trial court and the ruling affirming that instruction were based upon the theory that the mere act of negligence in permitting an employé to work beyond the statutory period created liability irrespective of the connection between the alleged negligence and the injury complained of."

So here we say that conceivably a case might arise where merely by virtue of the fact that the minor was laboring between the hours of 10 p. m. and 5 a. m. (the natural hours of repose for youth) he sustained injury in some manner, as from sleepiness and fatigue. But no such cause of action is attempted here either to be pleaded or proven. The conclusion may not be avoided that the court's instructions upon the matter were seriously erroneous and gravely prejudicial, for the case bears no aspects of similarity to those cases where the employment of a minor in a given character of work being absolutely prohibited, the employer is held responsible in damages when he has put the minor to work at the prohibited task and injury results. In such cases, upon very familiar principles of justice, it is held that the employer, if injury shall result, shall not be allowed to raise the defense of contributory negligence. Lenahan v. Pittston Coal Min. Co., 218 Pa. 311, 67 Atl. 642, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 461, 120 Am. St. Rep. 885; Casperson v. Michaels, 142 Ky. 314, 134 S. W. 200. In these and all such cases injury resulted while the minor was performing the prohibited work. Here the only limitation upon his labor fixed by law were its hours, and he was injured at an hour when it was legal for him to be at work, and for him to be at work in the kind of employment in which he was engaged.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore reversed.

In re MUMFORD'S ESTATE. (L. A. 4605.)
(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 14, 1916.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — APPOINTMENT—CREDITORS—EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding to have letters of administration granted on the local estate of a non-resident decedent at the instance of petitioning creditors, it is only necessary to make a prima facie showing that petitioners are creditors; the question of the validity of the asserted claim being one to be determined on appropriate litigation between the creditors and the representatives of the estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 96; Dec. Dig. —20(7).]

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT — COMPENSATION—QUANTUM MERUIT.

To support a recovery for services rendered by an attorney, upon the quantum meruit, there must be evidence showing that the services were rendered with some understanding or expectation by both parties that compensation was to be made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 369; Dec. Dig. —166(2).]

3. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS — APPOINTMENT—CREDITORS—EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding by attorneys to admit to probate the foreign will of deceased and for the granting of letters of administration with the will annexed on the ground that the attorneys were creditors, evidence held insufficient to establish prima facie any indebtedness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 96; Dec. Dig. —20(7).]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Edgar Huidekoper Mumford, deceased. From an order, admitting to probate the foreign will of deceased and granting letters of administration with the will annexed, on petition of G. R. Jones and another, alleged creditors, the foreign executrix appeals. Order reversed.

J. W. McKinley, of Los Angeles (Walter L. Mann, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. John W. Hart and A. I. McCormick, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order, admitting to probate the foreign will of the deceased and granting letters of administration with the will annexed.

There is no dispute about the facts. Abel Stearns died testate in the county of Los Angeles in 1871, leaving to his widow by his will large property, including certain real estate in Los Angeles county. The widow later married one Robert Baker who predeceased her. Mrs. Baker died in this state in Los Angeles county in 1912, leaving surviving her neither husband, ascendants, or descendants, and leaving a large estate in said county, including what is known as the "Laguna Rancho," which had been devised and bequeathed to her by her first husband, Abel Stearns. This Laguna rancho Mrs. Baker had contracted to sell in her lifetime, and in October, 1912, the Title Insurance & Trust Company of Los Angeles, as administrator of her estate and in execution of her contract conveyed the same to the purchaser, taking in part payment therefor a certain promissory note and mortgage, further herein referred to. When Abel Stearns died he left surviving him as heirs at law besides his widow certain brothers and sisters. Five of these left issue surviving at the death of Mrs. Baker, one of whom was Edgar H. Mumford, deceased herein, who became entitled to a one-fifth interest in any right that the descendants of the brothers and sisters of said Abel Stearns had under the succession laws of the state of California in or to the estate of said Mrs. Baker. On November 14, 1913, these heirs of the brothers and sisters of Abel Stearns, all of whom were nonresidents of this state, transferred their interests in the estate of Mrs. Baker to certain trustees for the purposes—specified in the instrument—of taking legal proceedings to establish title to the property in the trustees by legal proceedings, to sell and dispose of it and divide the proceeds among the heirs in proportion to their interests in the estate of Mrs. Baker. Subsequently the trustees applied to the superior court in the matter of the estate of Mrs. Baker for a decree of partial distribution, claiming that as successors in interest of the brothers and sisters of said Abel Stearns they were entitled to have distributed to them all of the estate of said Mrs. Baker, on the ground that she had received it from her deceased husband, Abel Stearns, whose separate property it had been in his lifetime. The superior court sustained a demurrer to the petition for partial distribution, and entered judgment against said petitioners, who thereupon took an appeal from said judgment. Pending the appeal a compromise was effected between the heirs of the blood of Mrs. Baker, and said trustees received a promissory note for $750,000, payable in February, 1918, secured by a mortgage on said Laguna rancho and owned by the estate of Mrs. Baker, being the note and mortgage heretofore referred to, which was by the decree of distribution distributed to said trustees. Said note was executed in Los Angeles by R. A. Rowan & Co., a California corporation, and was payable to the Title Insurance & Trust Company, also a California corporation, and administrator of the estate of Mrs. Baker, and is in the possession of said Title Insurance & Trust Company in escrow to be delivered to the trustees. Subsequent to the decree of distribution, and on April 18, 1915, Edgar H. Mumford died, a resident and citizen of the state of New Jersey, leaving a will which was duly admitted to probate in that state. Mumford was never a resident of this state.

It is the validity of the order and judgment admitting this will to probate in the superior court of Los Angeles county as a foreign will which is involved in the present appeal. The petition for the probate thereof was filed by G. R. Jones and J. S. Bennett, who alleged that they were creditors of the estate of E. H. Mumford on an account for services rendered during the lifetime of said decedent, and that he left estate in the state of California, consisting of a one-fifth interest in a promissory note secured by mortgage on the Laguna rancho heretofore mentioned. The widow of Mumford, to whom letters of administration had been issued on the probate of the will in New Jersey as executrix thereof, objected to the admission of the will to probate here as a foreign will, denying that the petitioners were creditors of the estate or that decedent had left any property in this state. Upon a hearing upon the issues thus made the court found that G. R. Jones and J. S. Bennett were creditors of said decedent in his lifetime and are creditors of his estate; that the deceased left property in the county of Los Angeles, and made an order admitting the will to probate as a foreign will and appointing an administrator with the will annexed in accordance with the prayer of the petition. The executrix appeals from this order, and in a bill of exceptions specifies the insufficiency of the evidence to support the findings.

It is insisted by appellant that there is nothing in the evidence to warrant the finding of the court that G. R. Jones and J. G. Bennett are creditors of deceased, or that the deceased left any property in this estate.

Proceeding first to a consideration of the attack on the finding as to creditors: The parties, G. R. Jones and J. G. Bennett, found by the court to be such creditors of deceased, were attorneys practicing law in the city and county of Los Angeles at the time of the death of Mrs. Baker, and their claim is that they performed legal services for the deceased relative to the interest of said deceased in the estate of Mrs. Baker as one of the heirs at law of Abel Stearns. This claim is based entirely upon correspondence which passed between them and Mumford, disclosing what they did and the circumstances under which it was done; correspondence also between them and T. L. Frothingham, an attorney of New York representing Mumford, and two conversations between them and Frothingham in the city of Los Angeles.

As to the correspondence: This was initiated by Jones and Bennett through a letter dated October 10, 1912, addressed to Edgar H. Mumford at Elizabethport, N. J. They had no personal acquaintance with Mumford when they wrote to him. This letter opened as follows:

"We are interested in tracing the heirs of Arcadia Bandini Stearns Baker who recently died intestate in the county leaving an estate estimated to be worth four million dollars."

The letter then proceeded to inform him that under the law of this state the heirs of the brothers and sisters of Abel Stearns, the first husband of Mrs. Baker, were entitled to the portion of Mrs. Baker's estate acquired by her from him; that they were informed that the grandmother of Mumford was a sister of Abel Stearns, and that as her representative either the mother of Mumford if she was alive, or he himself if she was dead, was entitled to an interest in the estate of Mrs. Baker. It then closed:

"We shall be glad to take this matter up in detail either directly with you or through your local attorney upon authority from you, it being understood that you are to be put to no expense and that our compensation is to depend on establishing a substantial interest in the estate for either your mother or yourself."

Mumford, on October 18, 1912, replied to this letter, stating that his mother had died in 1897, and that he was the only heir of his grandmother, the sister of Abel Stearns, mentioned in their letter to him, and closing with:

"You are the first to advise me of the situation and if I find upon investigation that you are desirable attorneys, and that attorneys are either worth while or necessary, I shall be glad to employ you as you suggest."

On October 23, 1912, Jones and Bennett wired Mumford the names of local and eastern parties as reference. The next day they received from Mumford a telegram reading:

"Message received my counsel Theodore L. Frothingham 32 Liberty street, New York, if matter urgent communicate with him forward reference."

On October 24, 1912, Jones and Bennett wrote Mumford, acknowledging receipt of the message and giving additional references, and closing as follows:

"We suggest the following as a reasonable and proper basis for our compensation, contingent upon recovery: All reasonable and proper disbursements actually paid out to be repaid to the party advancing same, and as our compensation for services fifteen per cent, of value of estate recovered in case settlement is had without contested litigation; and additional ten per cent, if there is actual contested litigation in our superior or probate courts but no appeal is taken, and a further ten per cent, if an appeal shall be taken to the Supreme Court."

On October 25th Jones and Bennett received a letter from Frothingham, stating that his client Mumford had consulted him with reference to their recent letter to him concerning the estate of Mrs. Baker, and then (quoting the pertinent part of the letter) proceeds:

"In order that I may advise Mr. Mumford in the matter, I shall be greatly obliged if you will send me a general statement regarding the situation; indicating the date of Mrs. Baker's death, the administrators, if any, that have been appointed, the bonds given by them, their counsel, the general character and amount of the estate, the proportion which would probably pass to the next of kin of Abel Stearns, the probability of controversy as to the division of the estate, and generally any information necessary to give a fairly complete outline of the situation. I note that in your letter you suggest that you would be glad to represent Mr. Mumford in this matter; and that you would be willing to undertake the matter upon a contingent basis. In case Mr. Mumford should wish to have the matter placed upon such a basis, I shall be obliged if you will let me know what your views are as to terms."

On October 25th Jones and Bennett wrote to Frothingham in reply to his letter, inclosing copies of correspondence with Mumford and explaining the situation with reference to his interest in the Baker estate, but nothing was said in this letter about terms of employment that Frothingham had asked for. However, on October 30, 1912, they wrote again to Frothingham informing him of the proceedings in the estate of Mrs. Baker up to date, sent a copy of the will of Abel Stearns, a copy of the inventory in his estate, a copy of the petition for letters of administration in the estate of Mrs. Baker, mentioned the Laguna rancho as the principal portion of the estate of Mrs. Baker to which the heirs of Abel Stearns had a claim, and its probable value. They also sent copies of the code provisions under which in their judgment, the rights of the Stearns heirs were to be determined, with some information as to other property in the estate of Mrs. Baker to which the Stearns heirs might assert a claim. As to their views of the terms of employment they wrote:

"Our letter to Mr. Mumford, inclosed in our letter to you of the 26th inst., contains our views as to terms of employment based on a contingency agreement. We should be pleased to consider the matter of a retainer in association with you, or a contingent compensation where Mr. Mumford would pay the necessary disbursements."

On November 4, 1912, Jones and Bennett received the following telegram from Mumford:

"Have yours thirtieth to Frothingham Appreciate your sending full information may cooperate with Massachusetts heirs and may agree on joint counselor may retain separate counsel. We think your suggested terms too high but may make proposition to you do not consider yourselves retained until definite arrangements made."

While this correspondence just mentioned was going on Jones and Bennett were also corresponding with Hamilton Mayo, an attorney representing certain of the Stearns heirs residing in Massachusetts. On November 4, 1912, probably before the receipt of Mumford's dispatch just referred to of the same date, Jones and Bennett wrote Frothingham, inclosing a sketch of the Laguna rancho, showing the portion owned by Abel Stearns at his death and a copy of a letter written to Mayo explanatory of the sketch. The copy of the letter to Mayo also contained additional information with regard to the property left by Abel Stearns at his death. On November 5, 1912, Jones and Bennett telegraphed Mumford, acknowledging the receipt of his message, and stating that they had forwarded Frothingham a copy of their correspondence with Mayo, who represented the Massachusetts heirs, and said:

"If you desire to retain this firm the matter of fees can be arranged. All we desire is to be well paid for the character of professional services we render."

On the next day they wrote Mumford and said:

"In regard to terms of compensation, we think of no better arrangement than that suggested in our night letter to you and in the last paragraph of letter to Mr. Mayo, viz. that until the attitude of the blood heirs of Mrs. Baker is ascertained we arrange for the necessary disbursements and a reasonable fee contingent or otherwise as you wish, with a fixed minimum. Then if litigation becomes necessary the question of further compensation may be separately agreed upon, which can then be done with greater fairness to both attorney and client as the probability of success and the value of services will be more apparent. We shall be pleased to receive the proposition you refer to in your night letter and to represent you either independently or in conjunction with the Massachusetts heirs. A preliminary arrangement will enable your counsel here to search for evidence in support of your claim to property, title to which was taken in the name of Arcadia B. Stearns without obligating you to pay a fee based on the costs, risks and services attendant upon protracted litigation which may or may not take place."

On December 27, 1912, Frothingham telegraphed Jones and Bennett that he was leaving for Los Angeles, and would arrive there about January 1st, and would see them shortly thereafter. This constitutes the correspondence referred to.

In conformity with his dispatch Frothingham, accompanied by a Mr. Onthank, came to Los Angeles and called on Jones and Bennett on two occasions, January 3 and 7, 1913. The conversations on these two occasions in so far as they are material here were conducted between Frothingham and Mr. Bennett. They were, to some extent, relative to the extent of the interest which the Stearns heirs might have in the estate of Mrs. Baker, but principally in regard to the employment of attorneys. Bennett testified he discussed with them a number of attorneys in Los Angeles, particularly those with whom his firm would like to be associated in representing the Stearns heirs, and expressed a desire that they would investigate both as to their firm and as to associate counsel. Frothingham thanked them for the information relative to attorneys, and stated that they (Mr. Onthank and himself) had come out as a committee representing the five trustees, to whom the Stearns heirs had transferred their interests in the Baker estate, as heretofore referred to, himself and Onthank constituting two of said trustees. Quoting a portion of the testimony of Bennett as to what occurred at the first conversation:

"Q. Was anything said in that conversation as to their expectation or determination of employing you, or whether they had determined that fact, or not? A. Yes; they said that they had not determined whom they would employ to conduct the case. Q. Is that all that you remember that was said with regard to your employment? A. No; there was some further conversation just before we left. I am trying to think just how that occurred. There was another request from Mr. Frothingham as to whether I had further information which would be valuable to them, and I told him, no, that I had stopped gathering information upon receipt of Mr. Mumford's wire that we were not to consider ourselves under retainer; that I had spent considerable time after receiving his request for information until I received that wire from Mr. Mumford, securing information. * * * Q. And did he say to you that the information that they had in the East was not sufficient to enable them to select counsel, and that they had agreed to come to Los Angeles for the purpose? A. No; I think not. We had something of a conversation about that; he reminded me that I had advised them to send some one to Los Angeles before finally determining on counsel and fees. Our whole conversation was based upon the idea that we, meaning Jones & Bennett, would not conduct the litigation alone; we desired to be associated with some one. That question reminds me of something else that was said if I can just place it. The conversation with regard to attorneys here covered considerable time. I referred to other attorneys besides those I have mentioned. I reminded him of the detailed character of the information we had sent with regard to the estate, and Mr. Frothingham said that it had been very helpful. He also said that they had received some information from a Mr. Kemp. I asked him if he had received anything in detail, and he said no. Q. Did he say that you were one of several, but not the first, to communicate with the heirs? A. He did; and I called his attention to Mr. Mumford's letter stating that it was the first information that he had had. And he made some remark about some of the Massachusetts heirs having earlier information than Mr. Mumford's of a general character. * * * Q. Did he say that they understood that nothing that had gone before involved any obligation on their part to retain your firm, or any particular firm, or anything to that effect? A. He did not say just that, or anything to that effect. If it is modified to say that nothing that had gone before obligated them to retain our firm to carry on the litigation, I should think that that was the correct statement, though I cannot give you the exact language. * * * I assented to that as I have restated it."

This was about all of any materiality that took place at this first conversation. Frothingham and Onthank left, saying that they would be in Los Angeles for several days, making inquiry about the various attorneys who had been suggested and would call on Jones and Bennett again and advise them as to their decision in the matter. They returned on January 7th, when a second conversation was had. Frothingham then told Bennett that after a careful consideration of their obligations to the trustees and the people that they (himself and Onthank) represented, they had decided to employ Judge McKinley. He was one of the attorneys favorably discussed at the first meeting on January 3d and with whom Jones & Bennett had stated they would like to be associated. Quoting from the testimony of Mr. Bennett:

"I asked him if he would be associated with Judge McKinley, and he stated that he left that entirely to Judge McKinley's discretion. * * * They said that they had suggested that, but after consulting with Judge McKinley had decided that the better way was to leave it entirely in his hands. He said some more about appreciating what we had done, and about having told Judge McKinley in detail, and expressed the—well, I cannot recall the language. Anyway, he expressed the wish or desire that we might be associated with him; it left the impression on me that it was entirely in the hands of Judge McKinley, but he had made such representation to him that we might reasonably expect an association. * * * Q. Was anything said in either of these conversations by you with reference to your claim for services or disbursements? A. I don't recall that there was anything directly said."

In the first conversation Bennett had testified that he had told Frothingham:

"That they were under no obligations to retain us to conduct the litigation as contradistinguished from work we had already done."

Further, with reference to this last statement, we quote from Mr. Bennett's testimony:

"Q. Now in making the statement, Mr. Bennett, that they were under no obligation to retain you to conduct the litigation as contradistinguished from work that you had already done, do you mean that you said anything about contradistinguishing it from the work that you had done? A. I did not use that language at all. Q. Well, what did you say to that effect? A. That came up a number of times in the course of our conversation in regard to attorneys, and each time it was accompanied with an expression of appreciation for what we had done, on their part, and followed by a statement by me that in selecting an attorney they should have particular regard to his trial experience, and that that was the part of the case that we were looking after now. Q. And you did not specifically express any distinction between the work you had done, and the work that was to be done? A. I think that distinction was carried through nearly all of our conversation, though not expressed in the language I have used, as contradistinguished. We didn't draw the hard and fast boundary line, but that was underlying all our conversations. * * * It was left in view of both parties, as it appeared to me from the conversation, that we would be associated with Judge McKinley here. That was the last expression which Mr. Frothingham referred to and the last thing that we referred to."

On January 28, 1913, Jones & Bennett wrote Judge McKinley, detailing their connection from the beginning respecting the claims of the Stearns heirs and the information they had furnished, stating that Mr. Frothingham on returning to New York had told them that he had recommended their association with him, and asking that they be advised of their present position in the matter. To this letter Judge McKinley replied forthwith, stating that Frothingham had recommended their association if the assistance of associate counsel became necessary; but the matter, however, had been left entirely to his own discretion, and he had not yet determined to associate any one.

[1] The foregoing correspondence and conversations constituted all the evidence in the case bearing on the question whether the deceased, Mumford, in his lifetime had become indebted to Jones & Bennett for legal services performed by them in relation to his claim as one of the Stearns heirs in the Baker estate, and form the basis for the finding of the court that they were creditors of his estate. The contention of the appellant is that no such finding was warranted under the evidence. It is, of course, well settled that in a proceeding to have letters of administration granted on the estate of a decedent at the instance of petitioning creditors, it is only necessary to make a prima facie showing that such petitioners were creditors of a decedent; that on such a showing letters should be granted leaving the matter of the validity of such asserted claim to be determined under appropriate litigation between the alleged creditors and the representatives of the estate. And respondents, meeting the attack of appellant on the finding as to creditors, assert that not only was there a sufficient prima facie showing, at least, that they were creditors, which was all they were required to make to warrant the granting of letters of administration under which their claim might be subsequently tried out, but that the evidence produced shows also a clear case where both parties anticipated compensation to be paid, but failed to agree upon the amount, terms, or conditions of payment before the services were rendered.

[2, 3] We cannot agree with counsel for respondents as to either claim. In our judgment the evidence shows that there was not only nothing approaching a prima facie showing of any indebtedness existing between deceased and respondents at the death of the former, but the evidence shows that there was no plain agreement between them that there should not be unless under their negotiations respondents should be employed as his attorneys and should establish for him a substantial interest in the estate of Mrs. Baker. This was their offer to the deceased in the very beginning of their correspondence when they were seeking employment from him upon a contingent fee depending upon their success. It is not pretended by respondents that the offer of their services as his attorneys was ever accepted by deceased, or that by any correspondence or interviews with his representative they ever became his attorneys for any purpose, or that he had violated any agreement in employing other counsel, or was at any time under any obligation to retain them. Their claim is based on no such theory. They concede that an ineffectual effort was made by them to secure their employment as attorneys for the deceased, or at least their association with other attorneys in asserting a claim for him to the estate of Baker. This, it is apparent, was the purpose sought to be accomplished, as their correspondence and negotiations with Mumford and his representative Frothingham clearly discloses. Having failed to secure this employment, their claim now is they are entitled to payment for services rendered to deceased, consisting of advice and information given to him and his attorney while such negotiations were pending; that the evidence shows sufficient facts and circumstances, notwithstanding the failure of such negotiations, to warrant the inference that there was an implied contract that respondents should be paid for such services as they rendered while such negotiations for their retention as such attorneys were going on. But we look in vain to the evidence to disclose the slightest basis for any such claim. Nowhere in the correspondence or interviews, which constitute all the evidence in the case, do we find any statement or declaration by the parties which could be construed to warrant any offer or expectation that compensation was to be paid or was to be received by respondents for any services rendered, unless they were actually retained as attorneys for deceased, and a contingent fee earned by them consequent on their establishing for him a substantial interest in the Baker estate.

In order to support a right for recovery for services rendered upon a quantum meruit, which is the claim of respondents here, there must be evidence tending to prove that the services were rendered under some understanding or expectation of both parties that compensation therefor was to be made. We find nothing of that kind here, nor would we expect to do so, when there is taken into consideration the object of respondents in opening up negotiations with deceased; their declaration to him in their first letter that he was "to be put to no expense" unless as a result of their success; their subsequent efforts to arrange terms of employment as his attorneys on a contingent basis, and the apparent purpose for which the information they imparted and for which they now seek compensation was given and received. The situation as disclosed by the evidence amounts to just this: Respondents being advised from some source that the deceased, to whom they were strangers, had a possible interest in the estate of Baker, opened up a correspondence with him, avowedly with the hope of securing employment as his attorneys, informing him, as stated, that he would be put to no expense unless they secured for him a substantial interest in the estate. It is, of course, apparent that any compensation respondents were to receive for services was a matter for future arrangement, and that they would only expect remuneration if successful. Deceased, a layman, properly referred them to his attorney, Frothingham, who immediately opened up a correspondence on the subject of which they wrote. Naturally this was to be expected. It was a course invited by the opening of the correspondence by respondents. Frothingham would obviously need information which respondents were prepared to furnish, for the purpose of determining whether deceased had any interest in the estate of Baker and its probable extent, for the purpose of determining whether there was any necessity of employing attorneys in Los Angeles to represent him, as the respondents wished to be employed. Respondents well understood that the imparting of this information would be necessary for intelligent action on the part of deceased and his attorney, and that they would be expected to furnish it as they did, but it was not furnished under any idea or expectation that it was to be compensated for. It was furnished in order that the deceased might be fully appraised of his interest in the estate, its probable extent, and that the furnishing of it might operate as an inducement to the deceased to employ them as his attorneys. The whole idea of respondents, and all the advice and information given by them, was particularly for their own benefit and advantage, with a view to inducing their employment and with only this object in view in furnishing it. They furnished the information with expectation of being retained under a contingent contract, respecting which they frequently wrote, and which was to embrace the whole subject of their compensation. It was not contemplated that there should be a payment for advice given or information furnished prior to the making of the hoped-for contingent contract and the making also of such contract. According to the theory of respondents, payment for the services for which they now assert a claim accrued immediately when they rendered them, and the deceased was indebted therefor at a time while they were endeavoring to induce him to employ them as his attorneys, and were distinct from any other arrangements which might possibly have resulted from the negotiations. But certainly there is no suggestion of any intention to recede from their original declaration that deceased should "be put to no expense" to be found in the evidence; nowhere in the correspondence between respondents and deceased and his attorney is there the remotest suggestion that there was any intention to charge, or expectation of payment for, information furnished if the negotiations looking to the employment of respondents on a contingent fee were ineffectual. It is further to be remarked that in the interviews which the respondents had later with Frothingham and Onthank, and from which they learned that their hope of employment to represent the deceased was practically gone, and the time for advancing any claim they might have had arrived, they then made no claim that they were either entitled to or should be paid for the services rendered and information furnished while negotiations for employment were pending—a circumstance which only confirms the conclusion, otherwise apparent from a consideration of the entire situation, that services rendered by respondents, advice and information, to the deceased pending their efforts to be retained as his attorneys were voluntarily given, in the hope solely of thereby inducing their employment as attorneys. We fail to find anything in the evidence which would warrant an inference that there was an implied promise on the part of deceased to pay for such services, or which would warrant an expectation on their part that he would do so, or which justified the finding of the court that respondents were creditors of the deceased in his lifetime.

Under this view it becomes unnecessary to discuss the other finding attacked, that the deceased left estate in this state subject to administration.

The order appealed from is reversed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahan, Judge.

Action by Henry I. Kowalsky against O. B. Kimberlin and others. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. E. Borton, of Bakersfield, for appellant. Lucien A. Gray, of Los Angeles, and Keyes & Martin, of Oakland, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Appeal from a judgment in favor of defendant Barlow.

Plaintiff sued to quiet his title to a half interest in section 5, township 26 S., range 26 E., Mount Diablo base and meridian in Kern county. According to the allegations of the amended complaint this half interest was acquired in 1888, when Henry I. Kowalsky furnished one-half of the purchase price to his brother Joseph N. Kowalsky, who bought the land from the Southern Pacific Company, the grantee of the United States government. Joseph took the title in his own name, and held it until 1910, when he sold and deeded the property to respondent John W. Barlow. The contention of the plaintiff at the trial in the superior court and upon appeal was that the property was impressed with a trust in his favor, and that respondent had full notice thereof when the legal title passed to him from Joseph N. Kowalsky. It was not denied that the legal title was and had been, for many years before the sale to Barlow, in Joseph N. Kowalsky, and that there was nothing of record to apprise intending purchasers that Henry I. Kowalsky had paid any part of the purchase price. It is not denied that Joseph represented himself to O. B. Kimberlin, who had a contract to buy the property and through whom respondent purchased, that he (Joseph) was the sole owner. It is not pretended that John W. Barlow ever had personal notice of Henry I. Kowalsky's pretense of interest until long after the deed passed and the money was paid, but appellant's theory of the case rests upon the supposed efficacy of attempted notice to persons and corporations designated by him as "agents" of the purchaser. It appears clearly from the evidence and the court found that on January 19, 1910, Joseph N. Kowalsky and O. B. Kimberlin entered into an agreement in writing, whereby the former promised to sell and the latter to buy the property here in controversy for the sum of $5,472, of which $547.20 was paid at the date of the execution of the contract. This agreement also provided that Kowalsky should place in escrow with the First National Bank of Berkeley a conveyance of the property to Kimberlin, or such person as he might designate, to be delivered upon the payment of the balance of the purchase price. On January 29, 1910, upon Kimberlin's request, Joseph N. Kowalsky executed and acknowledged such a conveyance, which was deposited with the Anglo-London-Paris National Bank of San Francisco, with written instructions to deliver said deed to the First National Bank of Berkeley for surrender to Kimberlin, or to such person as he should nominate, on payment of the balance of the purchase price. It was also found that:

"Said written instructions from said defendant Kowalsky directed said San Francisco bank to direct said First National Bank of Berkeley, that if said Kimberlin, or his order, should so request the said First National Bank of Berkeley, said bank should forthwith forward said deed to any bank in Los Angeles that said Kimberlin might designate, with directions that said deed, should be held by said bank at Los Angeles, Cal., to be delivered to said Kimberlin, or order, on payment of said sum of $4,925, and further directed that if said sum of $4,925, was not paid on or before 30 days after January 29, 1910, either at said First National Bank of Berkeley, or at said bank at Los Angeles, said deed should forthwith be returned to be held subject to the order of defendant Kowalsky."

The bank at Berkeley received the conveyance, and upon Kimberlin's written order transmitted it to the Los Angeles Abstract & Trust Company, to be delivered by that corporation to Robert Barry or his order on payment of $10,560 by February 20, 1910. Barry was Kimberlin's agent, and by his written instructions of January 18, 1910, he authorized the Los Angeles Abstract & Trust Company to deliver the conveyance to Barlow. Prior to February 12, 1910, John W. Barlow had paid all of the sum of $10,560, to the Los Angeles corporation in full compliance with the terms of his agreement to purchase from Kimberlin. On that date Barlow's attorney and agent approved the form of the deed, and authorized the abstract company to finish the escrow when the certificate of title was deliverable according to the instructions of Barlow. Subsequently this money was duly remitted to the bank at Berkeley, and sent to the bank in San Francisco, where Joseph N. Kowalsky received the balance of the purchase price due him from Kimberlin, amounting to $4,925. One-half of this amount he offered to his brother Henry, who declined to accept it, and it was accordingly deposited to Henry's credit. After the receipt of the conveyance by the Los Angeles corporation the document was sent to the Kern County Abstract Company, and on February 17, 1910, that corporation placed the deed of record, and issued to John W. Barlow its certificate, showing the title of all of said section 5 vested in him free from all incumbrances. On the same day, February 17, 1910, Henry I. Kowalsky wired the Los Angeles Abstract & Trust Company as follows:

"San Francisco February 17—10. L. A. Abstract and Trust Company, Los Angeles. Please notify John W. Barlow that I own undivided half of section five township twenty-six south, range twenty-six east, M. D. M. and base, Kern county, California, and decline to sell same. Henry I. Kowalsky."

He also sent registered letters on the same day, directed to respondent at Los Angeles, to Kimberlin at Berkeley, and to his brother. The letter directed to respondent Barlow was never received by him, but was returned unclaimed. On receipt of the telegram a clerk of the abstract company took the matter up with the corporation's counsel, and then communicated by telephone with the Kern County Abstract Company, instructing that corporation to hold the escrow until further notice. The Kern County Abstract Company replied by letter that at the time of the receipt of the message the whole matter had been closed up several hours. On the 18th of February, 1910, the Los Angeles corporation mailed to respondent, in care of his attorney in Los Angeles, a copy of the telegram from Henry I. Kowalsky. Barlow himself was absent from the state. On the 22d of February a draft for the entire purchase price was sent to the bank in Berkeley, and on the 23d that corporation acknowledged its receipt. The court found that Barlow purchased the land in good faith, for a good and valuable consideration, innocently and without any notice in any way of the claims of the plaintiff.

Appellant complains of one of the findings, to the effect that Joseph N. Kowalsky was the owner of the property in fee simple absolute down to the time of the delivery of the deed to Barlow. An examination of the findings reveals that the court was not declaring the fact of the grantor's complete ownership of the land, but had reference to the state of the record—a matter about which there is no dispute.

[1, 2] That Barlow was an innocent purchaser for value without notice of Henry I. Kowalsky's asserted interest was amply shown by the evidence. Plaintiff's contention was that the Los Angeles Abstract & Trust Company was Barlow's agent, and that notice to that corporation at any time before the actual transmission of the purchase money to Berkeley was sufficient to make the grantee a taker with notice of the equities. The Los Angeles corporation was not an agent clothed with full power to act for Barlow in the matter of determining whether or not H. I. Kowalsky's telegraphic assertion, entirely unsupported by the record, should be investigated before the closing of the matter of transferring the title to Barlow and transmitting the money to the record owner. Its duty was to close the deal upon evidence that the record title was subject to the deed from Joseph N. Kowalsky to John W. Barlow. It was not vested with authority nor bound by duty to investigate an assertion of ownership depending upon oral proof of a resulting trust. Indeed Kowalsky did not treat the Los Angeles corporation as an agent. He merely requested it to inform Barlow of his claim of ownership. Nor was Kimberlin an agent of Barlow. The latter was purchasing Kimberlin's interest, evidenced by his contract, but that did not make Kimberlin the agent of Barlow in any sense that would bind Barlow by notice to Kimberlin.

[3, 4] The burden of proof was upon plaintiff to show due and sufficient notice to defendant of matters outside the record title tending to establish any resulting or constructive trust in plaintiff's favor. Wyrick v. Week, 68 Cal. 8, 8 Pac. 522; Bell v. Pleasant, 145 Cal. 410-415, 78 Pac. 957, 104 Am. St. Rep. 61. Plaintiff utterly failed to meet this burden. Section 856 of the Civil Code provides that:

"No implied or resulting trust can prejudice the rights of a purchaser or incumbrancer of real property for value and without notice of the trust."

Appellant's telegram gave no notice of the trust. It was a mere, bald assertion that he owned an interest—a claim unsupported by the records and undefined by the claimant. To hold such notice sufficient in form to defeat the transaction between the owner of the record title and the innocent purchaser, even if the latter were chargeable with having received it before the sale was consummated, would be to permit the gravest injustice. Notice, in order that it may be effectual, should be precise and complete enough to put the defendant upon his guard. Renton v. Monnier, 77 Cal. 449-455, 19 Pac. 820.

We conclude, therefore, that the trial court properly decided that Barlow was a purchaser in good faith, without notice of the trust in plaintiff's favor.

Other matters argued in the briefs do not demand discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨417(5)—INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION—REVIEW—WAIVER—RIGHT TO MAKE.

Where applicant for compensation for personal injuries was a party to a petition for review, the Industrial Accident Commission, or members thereof, cannot waive, so far as the applicant is concerned, time for filing briefs and concede the invalidity of the award.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Dec. Dig. ⇨417(5).]

In Bank. Application by the First Christian Church of Fresno for writ of review against the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California, and A. J. Pillsbury and others, members, and H. Thorwaldsen, as Sheriff of the County of Fresno, and Augustus Cohnhoff, applicant for compensation. Award annulled.

Geo. F. Hatton, W. T. Plunkett, and Hartley F. Peart, all of San Francisco (Gus. L. Baraty, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Certiorari directed to the Industrial Accident Commission of the State of California for the purpose of reviewing an award in favor of one Augustus Cohnhoff and against the petitioner to this court, First Christian Church of Fresno.

Cohnhoff had been employed by a subcontractor, the Thomas & Schneider Art Glass Company, and counsel for the church denied liability of their client for that reason. They also contended that no legal notice of the hearing before the Industrial Accident Commission had ever been served upon any accredited representative of the church until after the testimony had been taken. After the issuance of the writ, the cases of Carstens v. Pillsbury et al., 158 Pac. 218, and Sturdivant v. Pillsbury et al., 158 Pac. 222, were decided. Thereafter counsel for respondent filed a memorandum in which he recited that, as the decisions in said cases determined and ruled all questions raised in this proceeding adversely to respondent's contentions, he waived further time for filing briefs and agreed that the award made against petitioner should be annulled so far as the Industrial Accident Commission was concerned. He properly declined to make any waiver on behalf of Augustus Cohnhoff, who was represented here by his own counsel. No brief has been filed by Cohnhoff or his counsel, probably for the reason that there is no possible way of differentiating the facts involved in this proceeding from those considered by the court in the decisions cited above. We have examined the record and fully agree with learned counsel for the Industrial Accident Commission that those decisions "determined and ruled all questions raised and involved in the instant case."

Therefore the award is annulled.

Rehearing Denied Nov. 16, 1916.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨39 —
STREAMS—RIPARIAN LANDS—SEPARATION FROM STREAM.

The mere fact that a riparian owner whose lands may properly be irrigated from a stream conveys a right of way to a railroad does not cut off his riparian right, where the railroad embankment is cut and the stream permitted to flow through.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. ⇨39.]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨39 —
STREAMS—RIPARIAN LANDS.

That low-lying land slopes downward from a creek bed by reason of deposits of torrential debris by the creek does not deprive the owner thereof of his riparian rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 31; Dec. Dig. ⇨39.]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨138—
IRRIGATION RIGHTS—EFFECT OF PERMISSIVE USE.

Permissive use of waters for irrigation by diversion to another watershed does not create a right to continue such diversion, however long continued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 150, 151; Dec. Dig. ⇨138.]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1011(1)—SCOPE—FINDINGS OF FACT.

A finding of a lower court as to facts on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3983-3988; Dec. Dig. ⇨1011(1).]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨40 —
STREAMS—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—OBJECTIONS TO USE.

The use by one riparian owner of the water of a stream in whole or in part cannot be interfered with by another riparian owner not using the water himself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 32; Dec. Dig. ⇨40.]

6. WATERS AND WATER COURSES 49 — STREAMS—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—APPORTIONMENT—DECREE.

A decree apportioning the waters of a stream between riparian owners, declaring that each riparian owner shall be entitled to a certain share in the water if there is enough in the stream to serve all at that rate, that when there is not enough for all, each shall share in the proportion that his area of land bears to the total area that is irrigable, but that when only 23 miners' inches is flowing, they shall be respectively entitled only to the specific amount so stated, provided that either one may take a greater quantity so long as none of the other parties objects, should be modified to more clearly state the rule that each owner may use the whole or any part of the water on his land at any time when such use does not interfere with the actual use by the other owners of their due shares.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 39, 40; Dec. Dig. 49.]

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES 49 — STREAMS—RIPARIAN RIGHTS—DETERMINATION—SCOPE OF INQUIRY.

In apportioning waters for irrigation purposes, the court may consider the length of the stream, the volume and extent of riparian ownership, the character of soil, the area to be irrigated, the practicability of irrigation, the expense thereof, and the comparative profit of the different uses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 39, 40; Dec. Dig. 49.]

8. WATERS AND WATER COURSES 49 — RIPARIAN RIGHTS—USE OF WATER.

If a riparian owner is allotted a certain amount of water for irrigation purposes, he may nevertheless use it for any other beneficial use, and the apportionment merely furnishes a standard, but is not conclusive of the amount which may be used in any one year.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 39, 40; Dec. Dig. 49.]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR 934(2)—REVIEW—PRESUMPTIONS—FACTS SUPPORTING JUDGMENT.

Where the court found that one riparian owner used waters of a stream for watering stock and for domestic purposes, but made no allotment to him or the other owners for such purposes, and there is no evidence as to the quantity necessary for that purpose or that any is necessary in addition to the quantity allotted, it will be presumed in support of the judgment that the court considered the allowance sufficient for all purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3777; Dec. Dig. 934(2).]

10. WATERS AND WATER COURSES 48—IRRIGATION RIGHTS—LOSS BY USE.

Whether a riparian owner having the right to use waters for irrigation has actually used them or not, is immaterial; the right to such waters not being subject to acquirement by use or to loss by disuse.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 38; Dec. Dig. 48.]

11. WATERS AND WATER COURSES 49—IRRIGATION RIGHTS.

The mere fact that if one riparian owner consented, another could construct a diversion dam and irrigate a greater acreage thereby does not warrant a finding that the greater acreage is irrigable, in the absence of a showing that the other owner's consent could be obtained and that the cost would not render the scheme unprofitable.
